The engine leaped forward, freed of the car, and raced wildly down the long slope which dipped toward the alkali country. For half a dozen miles nothing could stay her flight. It would be half an hour before she could snortingly puff backward to the summit again, and then the car, rushing backward along that swift descent, would lie buried beneath the waters of the Blue River that would receive her when she left the track at the turn below.

But that was not yet to be. For, barring the way, buzzing like a bee, the little gyroscope runabout nobly bore up against the weight of the descending car. Had the latter obtained more impetus before encumbering her, the runabout would have been crushed like an eggshell, broken though never moved from her place until her frame sprang into fragments. But now, with this slow, dead weight leaning against her breast, the gyroscope only hummed and crooned its song of victory; and there they clung, the car and the motor car, locked in that struggle in which neither could gain a yard. The car stood still.

Haynes took the unconscious judge by the arms and dragged him off the car into the snow. The fall had ceased; the cold was terrible upon the mountains. It might have been twenty-five below zero, it might have been more. The rags which the judge wore might as well have been wrappings of straw.

The fearful cold, penetrating to the bone, roused him from his faint. Haynes pulled him to his feet and, propping him against the platform of the car, stood over him.

"Once there was a corrupt Judge," he said with slow and terrible precision. "Sworn to do justice and uphold the law, he plundered the poor, pillaged the strong, and wrought injustice. Once, in the loneliness of a cell to which he had consigned him, one of the victims swore to kill that man, whose name was Charteris. And having so sworn he would not break his oath.

"But Charteris has outwitted him," Haynes continued to the cowering Judge. "He died before his victim's vengeance fell. He died in that car, ten minutes ago, in a drunken slumber. And so his victim's vengeance has been rendered useless and all his schemes of no avail.

"But in his place stands one who is soon to learn what Charteris taught so many other poor souls who stood before him, confident in the honor and majesty of the law which he betrayed. It is Dan Clancy who now waits here in the place of Charteris to receive his punishment. That punishment will be life imprisonment, for it was he who killed Judge Charteris; and in this state, by lucky chance, there is no capital punishment. Clancy," he continued, with an abrupt change of manner, "you can live half an hour, and not much more, in this temperature. In half an hour the guards who are now on that engine will be back. Make yourself known to them and they will spare you, warm you, feed you, and convey you to a place where you will never be cold again."

He left the man in the snow and stepped into the runabout. With a turn of the wheel and pressure of the spring, he backed her, steered her from the path of the released car, and guided her to the roadbed just as the latter, freed from its support, rolled forward. It sped on down the grade, gathering momentum, till the roadbed vibrated, rattled onward and downward, the noise of its progress growing fainter and fainter till only the least sound remained. Above the watchers waited in breathless silence. There came a crash, a roar from far below; then the splash of a cascade of water.

The train car lay fathoms deep in the swift-moving, icy waters of the Blue River.

"Come, Theobald," said John Haynes.

But even as the car leaped forward screams echoed from behind and a figure came running over the snow. It shrieked with idiotic laughter, and gesticulated and danced.

"I'm Clancy!" it cried in mirth, and clapped its hands. "I've killed Judge Charteris."

The rear lights of the returning engine flashed over the hill. Guided by the sounds the guards came hurrying along the track to where the madman danced.

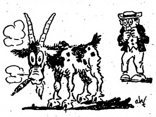
TALES OF GOTHAM AND OTHER CITIES

Central Park Visitor Said He Saw a Goat Smoke

NEW YORK.—Bob Hurton, assistant keeper of the zoo in Central park, was entering the lion house the other afternoon when a young man staggered across the walk and leaned against him for support.



"What's the trouble?" Hurton asked.

"I think I have seen something. I should have a doctor," the agitated visitor said.

The young man explained then that, unless he had been the victim of an illusion, Hurton was needed behind the animal house.

"Have the elephants broken loose?" Hurton asked.

"No," the visitor said. "But I think I saw a goat smoking a cigar."

On the way to the lot back of the elephant house Hurton met Bill Snyder, the head keeper.

"What's this I hear about a smoking goat?" Hurton asked his chief.

Snyder was perplexed by the question, but, with Hurton, he followed the visitor who had discovered the zoological phenomenon.

In the lot was Perfecto, a large ram, presented to the menageries by the manager of a circus. Perfecto was standing in the center of the inclosure. There was a far-away look upon his face, and he was holding in his mouth half of a cigar. In telling the story later, Snyder said that the cigar was burning and that Perfecto was puffing away at it in evident enjoyment.

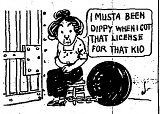
"But, Bill, how did he get a light?" Hurton asked.

"That's nothing," said Snyder. "You remember in 1910 the case of the weeping grampus—"

But Bob had fled.

Substitute for Young Bride Fined for Forgery

NEWPORT, R. I.—If Hattie Belmar of this city ever gets another chance to act as a substitute for a blushing bride who is too young to get a marriage license it is more than likely that before accepting the position she will demand to be introduced to the real bride. It is not by any means certain that she will take the job at all, but if the bride is so constructed that Miss Belmar's clothes do not fit her she will have to look elsewhere for a substitute, for Miss Belmar won't even discuss the proposal. As a matter of fact, she was sent to jail.



I MUSTA BEEN DIPPY WHEN I GOT THAT LICENSE FOR THAT KID

When Albert E. Evans, a cook at the naval station, decided to marry Alfreda Guimond and told her so he was looking into her eyes. When he considered her from afar and noted her size and youthful appearance he felt that there was no chance of getting a license to marry. She is only seventeen and doesn't show her age. So he spoke to Hattie Belmar about it, and she said she would gladly get a license to be used by the youthful bride.

They got it. Albert thanked Hattie and married Alfreda.

Alfreda's parents were amazed and went to Rev. Arthur Crane, who had performed the ceremony, to demand an explanation. All that he knew was that there had been a license and everything looked all right.

Then the parents moved on the city hall. The city clerk, with argument, said that he had never given a license to any seventeen-year-old girl and would like to see her. Alfreda, the bride, got the clothes of Hattie, the substitute, to deceive the city clerk.

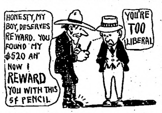
The bride is short, the substitute is tall, and the clothes looked as if they had been thrown on the bride from an upper window.

City clerk wise; parents angry; police alert; bridegroom garrulous; substitute arrested.

When Miss Belmar was arraigned in court, charged with forging the license, she was fined $15, with costs of $2.60.

"Honesty the Best Policy" Brought Into Play

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.—The old slogan, "Honesty is the best policy," was brought into play the other night at the union station when a pocketbook containing $520 was found by a young man, who said he was formerly a bellboy in a St. Louis hotel. The owner of the pocketbook proved to be a wealthy cattle owner of Oklahoma City, who refused to give his name.



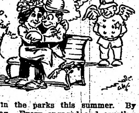
HONESTY, MY BOY, DESERVES REWARD. YOU FOUND MY $520 AN' NOW I REWARD YOU WITH THIS 5¢ PENCIL
YOU'RE TOO LIBERAL

According to the bellhop, he had arrived from Chicago on an evening train, and not knowing the city, had stopped in the station to inquire the location of a hotel when he espied the pocketbook under a bench. After examining it and finding the large amount of money and one of the ranchman's cards, he began to call out the name which the card bore. At the first call the cattle owner responded and grew very excited when he discovered his loss, explaining that he was on his way to Buffalo to be married.

The bellboy then presented the pocketbook to its owner, and after the ranchman had satisfied himself that the contents were all there he proceeded to give the finder a five-cent lead pencil and a lecture that "Honesty is the best policy."

Birmingham Will Aid "Spooners" in the Parks

BIRMINGHAM, ALA.—All embargoes heretofore maintained against "spooning" in the public parks of this city have been lifted, and so long as the habit is confined to legitimate lovemaking, whether it be done in the dark or under the shadow of the electric lights, there is to be no police interference.



For several years young men and women have been complaining that their courting privileges were unreasonably restricted, and many protests were lodged with the city commission against the police.

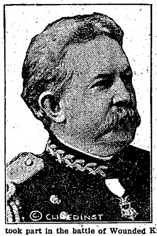
Judge A. O. Lane, commissioner of public justice, determined to change the regulations. He declares that the city will offer every protection and encouragement to "legitimate spooning" in the parks this summer. By "legitimate spooning" he means lovemaking. Every engaged and courting couple will be allowed the use of the parks.

The police are instructed to watch the parks and see that real lovers are not interfered with.

Commissioner of Streets and Parks Weatherly says plenty of benches will be provided in the parks. He declares the city has no right to regulate love affairs, and his department of streets and parks will pursue the policy of "hands off" from these delicate and sacred matters.

Mrs. Wilson Searight, head of the welfare department that protects and assists young girls, believes the new policy of protecting lovers is all right in principle, and she will do her part to help them.

MAJ. GEN. JAMES FRANKLIN BELL



© CLINEDINST

"There never would be a pick or shovel in my regiment, if I had my way," declares Major General Bell, and from this speech one may read the character of the man. "A soldier's weapons should be rifles, not intrenching tools. The minute an army stands still and begins to dig intrenchments the enemy takes courage and begins to attack. The only way to fight them is to keep them on the run."

General Bell was recently assigned to the command of the Second division at Texas City, Tex.

James Franklin Bell was born in Shelbyville, Ky., January 9, 1856. He graduated in 1878 from West Point, but didn't reach the rank of first lieutenant until 1890. In 1881 he married Miss Sarah Buford of Rock Island, Ill., who had attended finishing school in Chicago.

Bell served on the plains with the "Fighting Seventh" cavalry during the Indian wars of 1878 to 1894, and took part in the battle of Wounded Knee, the last great fight of the red men. He became a captain in the regular army in March, 1899, and seven years later reached the position of chief of the staff of the army. On January 3, 1907, he was appointed a major general. He rose with exceptional rapidity, being jumped over the heads of 1,036 officers at the time he was appointed brigadier general.

WIFE OF FRENCH MILITARY ATTACHE

Though some of the largest embassies are presided over by American hostesses who are wives of foreign ministers and ambassadors, the greater number of women in the diplomatic corps are foreigners. One of these who does not as yet speak the English tongue and who has been in America only a short time is the Countess de Bertier de Sauvigny, wife of the military attache of the French embassy at Washington.

© HARRIS & EWING

Count and Countess de Bertier came to America last November, bringing with them their little son Armand, a lad not five years old, and his indispensable English nurse, who, when the countess is simply compelled to converse with some person who does not speak French, acts as interpreter. It is not often, however, that Countess de Bertier needs the services of an interpreter. Ask her how she keeps house in Washington without speaking the English tongue and she raises her hands in horror, as she says in French:

"Ah, but I do not keep house. Why should I do what is so stupid to me? I let others do the housekeeping."

What, then, does the countess like? Is she interested in the question of woman suffrage, the interviewer asks. Here the expressive hands of the countess are again raised in a gesture that bespeaks protest. The vote for women? It does not interest her. Indeed, she is convinced of one fact with regard to it. This is that it would bore her to extinction.

One thing, however, the Countess de Bertier likes very, very much. That is a spirited horse. Riding, she explains, is her favorite recreation.

MRS. POINDEXTER'S BREADTH OF VISION

© HARRIS & EWING

Mrs. Poindexter, wife of Senator Poindexter of Spokane, Wash., is one of the women in the congressional set at Washington who has voted and intends to vote again for a president of the United States. In politics, she agrees with her husband.

All Mrs. Poindexter's friends will tell you that her most characteristic qualities are an abiding sense of humor and that especial brand of moral courage known as "backbone." She watches life at the capital with a twinkle of the eye, and is not one bit afraid to give you her impressions of it. Her viewpoint and her frankness in stating it are typical of the unconventionality and the freshness of vision of the western woman.

Perhaps the constant reading of the newspapers of the country contributes to this breadth of vision. Senator Poindexter's wife is an inveterate reader, not only of the newspapers published in Washington and in her native state of Washington, but throughout the entire nation. She probably keeps as close tab on the pulse of public sentiment as does any man in national politics. She likes political debate, and is always an interested listener in the senate gallery when a big issue is under discussion on the floor. All of which sounds like the most advanced type of new woman.

MISS SUMNER, STATISTICAL EXPERT

"Economy must and will become the watchword of our national life," says Miss Helen Sumner, statistical expert for the children's bureau, superintendent of agents for the United States commission of industrial relations at Washington, and a woman who is internationally known as an authority on labor conditions as they affect women and children.

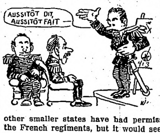
© HARRIS & EWING

"Thrift, as a national ideal," continued Miss Sumner, "will need to have its inception in the home. It will have to be taught at the mother's knee before it can become a principle of American living. The American woman has never learned it. The European woman knows and practises it instinctively, for it has become inherent in her after generations of thrifty people that have gone before her. In this country, as was perfectly natural for any nation of tremendous resources, and at first of sparse population, our people have lived with extravagance. Now it is different. We are coming to realize that conservation is not only an expedient but a necessary thing."

WASHINGTON GOSSIP

U. S. Army Has Ten Officers Training in France

WASHINGTON.—The movement of American troops to Mexico brings to notice the fact that ten United States army officers, representing all branches of the service, are on duty in France for instruction in French military training. They are there by permission of the French government, given upon request of the United States, and are welcomed in the friendliest spirit. It appears to be the intention of the war department at Washington to have six officers continuously on service in France, so that French experience and French military science may from year to year be available for the United States army. Occasionally an English officer or officers from the Balkan and other smaller states have had permission to serve with one or another of the French regiments, but it would seem that no foreign army, not even the Russian, has during this generation had such opportunities to know the French military system as the Americans now have.



Capt. W. A. Castle is in an infantry regiment at Orleans; Capt. N. Margettes and Lieut. A. T. Bishop with other regiments at Chalons, Surgeon T. Marne and T. Martin at the cavalry school at Saumur, Capt. F. H. Pope in the French quartermaster's school and Capt. Frank Parker at the war college. Capt. Morton Henry of the American quartermaster's division and Lieuts. E. S. Greble and Honeycutt of the artillery have just arrived to replace three other American officers and three others are expected. The three latter do not get into the French service until October. In the meantime they are required to live in French families and perfect their knowledge of French.

Captain Parker, in the war college, the exclusive school of higher strategy, has probably the rarest opportunity and one not shared by any other foreign officer.

An armchair has been placed for Captain Parker apart from the other officers and nearest the lecturer's platform, so that the American guest may have a better chance than any one else to follow the exposition of a subject and see the diagrams. The work in the war college is severe and is from 6 a. m. to 6 p. m. Part of it consists in hard riding over battlefields of France, the lecturer of the day explaining the operations of the troops that took part.

Pigeons at Washington Know the Market Days

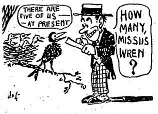
IF YOU stand on the steps of the new National museum you will notice many pigeons on a street. The street divides the museum from the market, and on the far side there are rickety wagons, hitched to droopy horses—mostly white—and many chickens in crates. And if you are lucky enough to meet on the steps a little, old man, who looks like a dried apple that had a soul to it, he will tell you something like this:

"Yes'm, those pigeons know market days as well as the hucksters do. They come from all over the city for the bits of grain and green stuff that get spilled or thrown away. And every pigeon strikes it on time, like gulls follow a train at meal times on the Salt Lake desert. How they get from the seashore precisely in time for the cooks to fling garbage from the diners is something I can't tell you. All I know is they are there. Some folks misdoubt angels on account of their feather wings, but the way I look at it is that the one who put all that cleverness into bird creatures can be safely relied on to run this world and the next without any advice from me.

"Hear them roosters crowing! It's curious the way a rooster can put his state of mind into a crow. Now you listen to that one. That ain't the cockadoodle of a free rooster on his own walk. He's calling out in the only way God gave him for somebody to come and free him from that wire crate. Maybe he don't know what's going to happen to him between this and somebody's Sunday dinner, but he don't need any telling that he's in trouble."

United States to Take Census of National Bird Life

A CENSUS of all the birds of the United States is to be taken this summer by the federal government. In announcing this fact the other day the department of agriculture, which will supervise the work, urges co-operation of all bird lovers. The primary object of the census is the preservation of this important game.



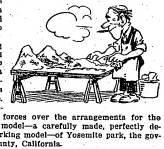
THERE ARE FIVE OF US — AT PRESENT
HOW MANY, MISSUS WREN ?

The count of the bird population is to begin about May 30, and the department hopes to have the final results in hand by June 30. As a beginning 250 correspondents in all parts of the country will assist in taking the census, but voluntary observers are expected to furnish most of the data for this undertaking.

In the enumeration an effort is to be made to determine how many pair of birds of each species breed within definite areas. By comparing these figures with those of subsequent censuses it will be possible to ascertain if state and federal laws are effective and game and insectivorous birds increasing or decreasing.

Uncle Sam Has a Veritable Mountain of Money

FABLE writers have pictured money growing on trees. And the pot of gold at the end of the rainbow has been the traditional will-o'-the-wisp for generations. But never before has there been a veritable mountain of money.



Nature has produced mountains whose buried wealth has entitled them to be called mountains of silver and gold, but it has remained for man to produce a mountain of greenbacks.

Three departments of the United States government have co-operated in this project, which required the united efforts of eleven experts for a period of three months, and, in addition, a cool million of Uncle Sam's macerated greenbacks for its surface.

The interior department, the agriculture and the treasury all joined forces over the arrangements for the million-dollar mountain, which is a model—a carefully made, perfectly detailed and topographically correct working model—of Yosemite park, the government reservation in Mariposa county, California.

This is the largest working model of its kind in the United States today, since it is five feet by twelve and weighs 600 pounds. Some of the great difficulties involved in its construction may be appreciated when it is remembered that it is a perfect reproduction in miniature of a tract of meadows, mountains, chasms, lakes, streams, falls, precipices, forests, vast gorges and huge boulders that cover an area of about the proportions of the state of Rhode Island, for the Yosemite park comprises no less than 1,124 square miles.

OPPOSITION MELTS; TRUST BILLS PASS

THREE ADMINISTRATION MEASURES PASS HOUSE IN A HURRY.

ARE ALL BEFORE SENATE NOW

Trade Commission, Clayton Anti-Trust and Rayburn Bills Get Big Vote When Final Test Comes in Lower Body.

Washington, June 8.—All three bills on the administration trust legislation program have passed the house and are now before the senate for action there.

Voting Done Quickly.

Opposition melted away when the final test came in the lower body and the voting went through quickly and without incident.

The Covington interstate trade commission bill was passed without a record vote; the Clayton omnibus anti-trust measure received 275 votes to 54 against it and the vote on the Rayburn railroad capitalization bill was 325 to 12.

The clerk hardly had finished the last roll call before the house had settled down to consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill, one of several supply measures that must be disposed of before the session ends. The adjournment problem now is squarely up to the senate and the Democratic leaders on that side of the capitol are expected to agree upon a program in the near future.

Action Rather Unexpected.

Action on the trust bills in the house came rather unexpectedly. Three measures had been agreed to in "committee of the whole" after weeks of speech-making, consideration of the Rayburn bill as amended by the committee, being completed late this afternoon.

When the trade commission bill came before the house for a final vote Progressive Leader Murdock moved that it be sent back to the interstate commerce committee with instructions to report the Murdock bill as a substitute. This was rejected, 151 to 15, and the pending bill was passed without a roll call.

Votes in Rapid Succession.

Then the votes on the other two measures were taken in rapid succession.

Representative White of Ohio was the only Democrat to vote against the Clayton bill and all the Progressives voted for it except Representative Chandler of New York. Forty-three Republicans and 16 Progressives joined the majority in supporting the measure.

Senate Committee Reports But One.

Washington, June 8.—The senate interstate commerce committee voted to report out only the trade commission measure of the trust bills. The action was construed by many as an indication of limitation of the administration's program at the present session of congress. There was no record vote. In a general discussion, some senators opposed the motion and others declared themselves opposed even to the bill at the present time. Chairman Newlands said the committee later might take up supplemental legislation.

CANADIANS BAR "MOTHER"

Officials Refuse to Permit Mary Jones to Leave Seattle for Vancouver.

Seattle, Wash., June 6.—"Mother" Mary Jones, organizer of the United Mine Workers of America, was not permitted to board a Canadian Pacific steamer bound for Vancouver, being stopped at the gangplank by a Canadian immigration official.

"Mother" Jones, who had purchased a ticket to Vancouver, presented herself at the gangplank of the steamer and was subjected to the usual questioning by a Canadian immigration inspector. Asked if she was an American citizen, she replied:

"Yes, and proud of it."

She gave Ireland as her birthplace. The inspector looked at her ticket and said, according to Mrs. Jones:

"You're not going to Vancouver. You're going to Nanaimo to kick up a disturbance among the miners, and you can't go."

Dictator Is Very Optimistic.

Mexico City, June 8.—Persons who spoke to President Huerta say that he is very optimistic over the outcome of the peace negotiations at Niagara Falls. The newspapers did not publish reports of any proceedings at Niagara Falls, but the belief was expressed that the end of the difficulty was near and that there soon would be a resumption of diplomatic relations with the United States.

Hindus Adopt Hunger Strike.

Vancouver, B. C., June 8.—Led by three Hindu monks from Golden Temple of Amritsar, Hindus aboard the steamer Womagata Maru are dancing religious dances. The dance is accompanied by total abstinence from food, the Hindus having started a hunger strike as a forlorn hope. Whether the hunger strike is due to the force of circumstances or a desire to compel immigration officials to allow the Hindus to land, there is no doubt that it has commenced.

SLEUTH SAYS HE HAS "GOODS"

DETECTIVE TO RETURN TO SOLVE WINTERS CASE.

Automobile Accident Injures Sheriff and Other County Officials Interested in Case.

New Castle, Ind., June 9.—Developments in the search for Catherine Winters, the 9-year-old daughter of Dr. W. A. Winters, a dentist of this city, who mysteriously disappeared a little more than a year ago, will be only temporarily halted so far as officials here are concerned, by the automobile accident in which Sheriff Bouslog and other officials were badly injured while working on the case.

It is feared the sheriff may not recover. He is said to have been working on some promising new clues, but in the event he does not mend rapidly, his information will be turned over to others and the work continued.

Robert H. Abel, the private detective who caused the arrest of Dr. Winters, his wife, and Ross Cooper, a former boarder in their home, announces that he is coming back to New Castle to continue the fight.

In a message to Mayor Watkins, Abel announced that he "has the goods" beyond any question and that when he returns there will be no further delays.

When he departed after quarreling with the prosecuting attorney, W. R. Meyers, because the latter would not place charges of murder against Dr. and Mrs. Winters and Cooper, he took with him certain dictograph records and other evidence. Following the departure of Detective Abel, Mayor Watkins and Prosecutor Meyers held a conference and decided to drop the charges against the three accused persons.

Mr. Abel, when here a week ago, outlined the discoveries which he made in the basement of the Winters home. "After I took charge of the work at the request of Mayor Watkins and others, I soon exhausted every possible clue to the girl's whereabouts if she were alive. I thus turned attention to the home of the parents and found inside of a cement block in a partition of the cellar a red sweater, similar to the one worn by Catherine the day she disappeared. The sweater was torn, and apparently burned, as if it had been pulled from a fire.

"Next I found a red undershirt, which had evidently been worn by a one-armed man of a build corresponding to that of Cooper. Cooper has but one arm, the lost member having been replaced by a wooden arm."

N. Y. VOTING IRREGULARITIES

Dead Men Have Been Voting According to the Gotham Records, It Develops.

New York, June 8.—District Attorney Whitman's investigation of illegal voting at the special election on April 7, has, Mr. Whitman announces, disclosed the fact that in the 12th assembly district in which Charles W. Murphy, leader of Tammany Hall, makes his home the names of four dead men were registered as having cast votes in favor of the holding of a constitutional convention next year.

The investigation has also disclosed the fact that in the 14th assembly district the names of 15 men were voted as residents of Bellevue hospital. Detectives discovered that not one of the fifteen was known at the hospital.

The inquiry, according to the district attorney's statement, has shown that a large number of men identified with Tammany Hall who are now under indictment for irregularities alleged to have been committed at the special election, have been writing the names of illegal voters at all elections for several years.

Queen Eleanor Announces Coming.

New York, June 8.—Clayton Rockhill, honorary consul general of Bulgaria in New York city, has been advised by cablegram from Sofia, Bulgaria, that it is the intention of Queen Eleanora to visit the United States about the middle of next October. The queen planned to come to the United States last spring, but decided to defer her visit.

First Vera Cruz Pension.

Philadelphia, Pa., June 8.—Mrs. Donnie Smith of this city, mother of Charles Allen Smith, one of the two Philadelphia youths who lost their lives at the taking of Vera Cruz, was the first American to receive a pension as a result of the Mexican embroglio. Mrs. Smith received the first monthly installment of $12 from Washington.

$300,000 Powassan, Ont., Fire.

North Bay, Ont., June 8.—Twenty-five buildings were destroyed and 16 families made homeless in a fire which swept the village of Powassan Sunday, causing a loss estimated at $300,000.

Believed She Was Wife.

Chicago, June 6.—Miss Mary Quinlan, who for almost a year believed herself to be the wife of James J. Brady, state auditor of Illinois, and as such was accepted by Governor Dunne's official family and by society in Springfield, has filed in the circuit court a suit for $50,000 against Brady for breach of promise. Furthermore, Miss Quinlan, who was Mr. Brady's secretary, is writing her own story of the inner workings of the state auditor's office.

BRINGING THE DROWNED TO SHORE

Many of the bodies of those who perished in the sinking of the Empress of Ireland in the St. Lawrence were landed at Quebec by the Canadian government steamer Lady Evelyn. The photograph shows the transferring of the bodies.

CORRECTED DEATH LIST IS NOW 1024

FIFTY-FIVE MORE NAMES ARE ADDED TO EMPRESS OF IRELAND VICTIMS.

MORE ABOARD THAN SAID

89 Additional Reported Among Passengers Than at First Supposed—Storstad Found to Have Been Badly Battered.

Quebec, June 4.—The confusion as to the number of persons who perished in the Empress of Ireland disaster has been one of the distressing features of the tragedy, and the uncertainty was further emphasized when figures, declared by the Canadian Pacific railway steamship company to be official, raised the death list to 1,024 from 969 on Sunday—55 more.

More Aboard Ship.

The company had stated at its Montreal office that the Empress of Ireland carried 1,387 persons when she weighed anchor on her final and uncompleted voyage. It was upon that figure that the list of survivors and missing was based. Now, however, the company asserts that the Empress carried 1,476 passengers, officers and crew. As a partial off-set, the figures giving the number of rescued were raised.

Of the bodies recoverd only 103 have been identified—22 first cabin, 31 second cabin, 38 steerage and 12 officers and crew.

Fourth Commission Member.

The third member of the Royal commission, the official investigating body, will be Lord Mersey, of England, who presided over the British government's inquiry into the loss of the steamship Titanic. The two other members are Ezekiel MacLeod, chief judge of the admiralty of the province of New Brunswick, and Justice Sir Adolph Routhier, judge of the court of admiralty of Quebec. George Vaux, of the legal staff of the British board of trade, will sit as an advisory member.

There will be two nautical assessors, a naval architect and a marine engineer appointed to assist the commission.

Collier Is Badly Damaged.

Montreal. — The collier Storstad, which rammed the Canadian Pacific liner Empress of Ireland in the St. Lawrence has completed unloading her cargo of coal, and it is possible to make a thorough inspection of her bow, shattered by the shock of the collision.

It is seen that her stem was twisted so much to starboard that it almost formed a half circle. Some of the lowermost plates in her bow were also twisted to starboard and torn away. There is a large indentation on either side of the stem and the rivets are torn clear.

Upholds Captain's Claim.

The condition of the Storstad's stem is pointed to in connection with Captain Anderson's claim that when the collision with the Empress of Ireland occurred it was impossible for the collier's stem to remain in the hole because it was twisted by the forward movement of the Empress.

The Storstad is still in the possession of the bailiff, who seized the vessel on the Canadian Pacific company's claim of $2,000,000 loss against the collier.

Much Mail Is Lost.

According to the statement of Montreal postoffice officials the heavy registered mail, something amounting to 1,903 packages, which went down on the Empress is a total loss and there will be no compensation for the senders or addressees of those packages. The postal regulations provide that the department is only to the extent of $25 for each package.

The Empress of Ireland carried 159 bags of newspapers, 51 bags of letters, eight baskets containing 301 parcels and 1,903 registered articles.

BURY 12 OF EMPRESS' CREW

Quebec, June 6.—Twelve of the crew of the steamship Empress of Ireland who perished in the St. Lawrence disaster were buried here with fitting ceremony. The funeral procession, moving to the music of military bands, passed between double rows of sorrowing spectators. Everywhere flags were at half mast.

Ronald Ferguson, the Empress' wireless operator, had only eight minutes in which to call for assistance before the dynamos failed, according to his story.

Directly after the collision, Ferguson says, he ran to the wireless room from his cabin, to which he had retired for the night. He sent out a message to Father Point telling the operator there to "stand by, as the Empress had struck something." A second later First Officer Staid ran into the room and told him to despatch the "S. O. S." call. Father Point answered that help was coming and immediately the wireless of the Empress stopped.

Ferguson went down with the ship, but came up, and, after swimming for three-quarters of an hour, was picked up.

Montreal, June 8.—With further developments in connection with the Empress of Ireland disaster lacking, the public has settled down to await the official investigation that is to be begun on June 16, with Lord Mersey as chairman of the commission of inquiry. There is confusion in the public mind as to whether the investigation is to be held at Montreal or Quebec, but Ottawa dispatches received here mention Quebec as the scene of the inquiry.

It is believed by many here that the Empress may be raised, though the Canadian Pacific railway officials have been careful not to make statements tending to confirm this belief. There is a general desire that all the bodies possible shall be recovered from the wrecked vessel. It is thought that divers may be employed to extricate the imprisoned bodies and the ship blown up after the bullion in it has been brought out.

Lloyds, the insurance underwriters of the sunken steamer, it is said here, will probably investigate the chance of floating the ship, although no official announcement to that effect has yet been made.

Arrangements are being made by the Montreal Board of Trade to open a general fund for the relief of the survivors and sufferers from the disaster.

Wisconsin Towns Threatened.

Greenwood, Wis., June 6.—With the Black river already past its greatest flood height and rising fast, this town and others in Clark county, in central Wisconsin, near the raging torrent are hourly in danger of being swept away.

The maddened waters, swollen by the heavy rains have torn the municipal light and power company's dam from its anchorage and have swept 250 feet of re-enforced concrete levee. Small building have already been washed away.

10,000 Threaten to Strike.

Pittsburgh, June 6.—According to officials of the Allegheny Congenial Industrial union, an organization formed here last February, 10,000 employes of the Westinghouse Electric and Manufacturing company, the Westinghouse Machine company and the Pittsburgh Meter company will go on strike. Officials of the Westinghouse interests questioned, refused to put any credence in the strike report and said it was nothing but the talk of "a few hotheaded workmen."

WAR WITH MEXICO IS AGAIN IMMINENT

HUERTA'S PLAN TO BLOCKADE TAMPICO IS CAUSE OF NEW CRISIS.

U. S. WILL KEEP PORTS OPEN

Policy of This Country as Announced Some Time Ago to Hold Now—Federal Gunboats Pass Vera Cruz Trailed by U. S. Ships.

Washington, June 9.—Another crisis in the Mexican difficulty faced the Washington government, a situation fraught with perils for mediation and with possibilities that may precipitate actual warfare between the United States and Mexico.

Huerta Is Responsible.

General Huerta brought about the new crisis by ordering his gunboats to blockade the port of Tampico, and to seize a cargo of ammunition en route there for the Mexican Constitutionalists aboard the steamer Antilla from New York flying the Cuban flag. Huerta has notified the powers of the intent to blockade the port and that he proposed to seize the cargo consigned to the belligerents against his sovereignty as contraband of war.

The purpose of the United States to suppress the attempt to blockade and prevent interference with the Antilla was indicated when Secretary Daniels issued an official statement announcing that while no new orders had been given Rear Admiral Badger, there had been no change in the policy of the government in reference to its desire that the port of Tampico shall be open to all commerce. The statement follows:

To Keep Port Open.

"The navy department has issued no new orders to Admiral Badger since the Mexican gunboats were reported to be leaving Puerto Mexico. The department has at no time contemplated furnishing a convoy to the Antilla, or any other ship, nor have any orders to that effect been issued. No word whatever has been received as to whether or not warships of other nations have been notified of the blockade, at Tampico, or what their attitude would be toward such a blockade. There has been no change in the policy of the government in reference to its desire that the port of Tampico shall be open to all commerce."

As to whether "all commerce" in this instance includes contraband of war no official of the government will discuss. So far as is known, the only orders relating to Tampico that have been issued went to Admiral Badger on May 18 in the form of a message informing him that, while it was not believed the Huerta gunboats would return to Tampico, it was deemed advisable that the commanders of American naval vessels understand that the government desired that there be no interference with commerce at that port.

To Prevent Blockade.

That the blockade decree will be carried out is verified by Admiral Badger in a report to the navy department from Vera Cruz. He announces that the Mexican gunboats Zaragosa and Bravo, which left Puerto Mexico Saturday night, are standing toward Tampico. The American cruiser Tacoma and gunboat Sacramento are following the Huerta ships. What the American warships will do when the commander of Huerta's ships attempts to seize the Antilla, when she arrives at Tampico Wednesday no officials in Washington will say.

The president conferred over the telephone with cabinet officials and also received important messages from the American delegates to the mediation conference at Niagara Falls. These were believed to have a bearing on the impending delicate situation at Tampico, but no announcement was made concerning the interchanges.

Tampico Anticipates Attack.

Tampico.—In anticipation of an attack on the city by the Federal gunboats Zaragosa and the Bravo, the work of erecting fortifications at the mouth of the river here is being rushed. Five heavy guns already have been placed. Steps also are being taken to block the channel of the river, should such a step be deemed necessary.

Fletcher Praises Officers.

Washington, June 8.—"Resourcefulness, courage and devotion to duty of all officers of the landing force was everything that could be desired and reflected the highest credit upon our naval service," declared Rear Admiral Fletcher in a report accompanying his story of the seizure of Vera Cruz.

Roosevelt Leaves for Madrid.

Paris, June 8.—Colonel Theodore Roosevelt has gone on to Madrid, where Thursday he will attend the wedding of his son Kermit. In Colonel Roosevelt's party were Mrs. Nicholas Longworth, Miss Katherine Page, daughter of Walter Hines Page, United States ambassador to Great Britain, who is to be a bridesmaid, and Oscar S. Straus, former ambassador to Turkey. Colonel Roosevelt had breakfast at his hotel with Edith Wharton, the novelist and afterwards received several callers.

FAMILY FRUIT GARDEN

HAVE A FEW SELECTED VARIETIES AND GIVE PROPER CARE.

Dwarfs Are Excellent, as They Require Less Room Than Standards, and Come Into Bearing the Third or Fourth Year.

(By E. KNEELAND. Copyright, 1914.)

Fruit for the family table through the growing season and a surplus to sell need not mean a large orchard, but only a few well selected varieties properly cared for. First, then, for a small list of fruits, and the dwarfs and half dwarfs are excellent, as they require less room than the standards and come into bearing the third or fourth year and are easily pruned and sprayed. The trees should be set eight feet apart, and eight trees will provide fruit from June to November. The variety will depend on the latitude and altitude. The United States government's "Farmer's Bulletin No. 208" gives a very complete list.

What to Plant.

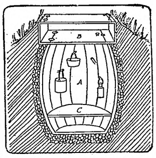
Four sweet cherry trees and one sour one will supply enough fruit for the table and also for pies. The following are recommended: Coe's Transparent (June), Downer's Late (July) Windsor (July) and a Dwarf Montmorency (June) for cooking. Eight pears should be ample and may all be of the dwarf type, such as two Bartletts (August and September), Clapp's Favorite (August and September), Louise Bonne de Jersey (September), Sickel (September), Howell (September), Beurre d'Anjou (October), Vicar of Winkfield (winter). Plums may be grown in the poultry yard and the garden space saved for other fruit. Grapes are always welcome, and one vine of each of the following will provide a good supply: Dutchess, Moore's Early Green Mountain (white), Concord, Niagara, Delaware. For currant bushes try eight Fay's Prolific. There are endless varieties of raspberries, but ten Herberts, ten Cuthberts and ten St. Regises are recommended; for blackberries, ten Eries, ten Snyders and ten Wilson's Early. Gooseberries are as easy to grow as currants, and five Industry and five Smith's Improved will provide a good supply.

Prepare the land thoroughly, provide plenty of manure to start things and keep the soil cultivated under the trees and bushes. Set the standard trees 35 feet apart, the dwarfs eight feet, the fruit bushes six feet and the canes three feet. Fruit trees, bushes, etc., live many years, but their value depends upon their vigor, shape and ancestry, so be sure to buy only from a reliable dealer or nurseryman and when satisfied as to his standing, do not let the price govern the purchase. The saving of a few dollars may often result in a much greater loss later. Finally draw a rough plan of the garden, marking where each tree, bush, etc., is to go, then set them with a line and measure according to the nurseryman's directions.

KEEP DAIRY PRODUCTS FRESH

Large Barrel Sunk in Ground Will Afford Convenient and Serviceable Place for Summer.

A very convenient and serviceable place to keep dairy products may be made by sinking a large barrel in the ground. A shady spot should be chosen, writes G. C. Amb of Beatrice, Neb., in Missouri Valley Farmer. Fill in around the barrel with small stones, gravel and sand, and dampen. Put a box over the barrel and bank up with solid earth, preferably clay. This drains off the water when it rains and also puts the barrel further down which tends to make it cooler. Make a light lid for the top of the barrel, and a strong lid for the outer covering of box. Fit the box as near airtight as possible. Sprinkle a little dampened sand over the bottom of the barrel and the little cellar is finished. Pails of cream, milk and butter may be hung from nails on the sides of the barrel. Air the barrel out occasionally to prevent odors from collecting.



Keeping the Butter Fresh.

Weed Seeds.

In order to have soil that is comparatively free from weed seeds many gardeners begin a year in advance of planting to prepare the soil. If onions are to be planted next year manure is applied freely this year for a cultivated crop such as corn or potatoes and no weeds are permitted to go to seed.

Sow Bugs.

Sow bugs are 14-legged animals and feed upon decayed vegetation. They sometimes attack growing plants. To kill them, slice potatoes, dust with Paris green and lay in places frequented by the bugs.

SYNOPSIS.

Challis Wrandall is found murdered in a road house near New York. Mrs. Wrandall is summoned from the city and identifies the body. A young woman who accompanied Wrandall to the inn and subsequently disappeared, is suspected. Mrs. Wrandall starts back for New York in an auto during a blinding snow storm. On the way she meets a young woman in the road who proves to be the woman who killed Wrandall. Feeling that the girl had done her a service in ridding her of the man who though she loved him deeply, had caused her great sorrow, Mrs. Wrandall determines to shield her and takes her to her own home. Mrs. Wrandall hears the story of Hetty Castleton's life, except that portion that relates to Wrandall. This and the story of the tragedy she forbids the girl ever to tell. She offers Hetty a home, friendship and security from peril on account of the tragedy. Sara Wrandall and Hetty return to New York after an absence of a year in Europe. Leslie Wrandall, brother of Challis, becomes greatly interested in Hetty. Sara sees in Leslie's infatuation possibility for revenge on the Wrandalls and reparation for the wrongs she suffered at the hands of Challis Wrandall by marrying his murderess into the family. Leslie, in company with his friend Brandon Booth, an artist, visits Sara at her country place. Leslie confesses to Sara that he is madly in love with Hetty. Sara arranges with Booth to paint a picture of Hetty. Booth has a haunting feeling that he has seen Hetty before. Looking through a portfolio of pictures by an unknown English artist he finds one of Hetty. He speaks to her about it. Hetty declares it must be a picture of Hetty Glynn, an English actress, who resembles her very much. Much to his chagrin Leslie is refused by Hetty. Booth and Hetty confess their love for each other, but the latter declares that she can never marry as there is an insurmountable barrier in the way. Hetty admits to Sara that she loves Booth. Sara declares that Hetty must marry Leslie, who must be made to pay his brother's debt to the girl. Hetty again attempts to tell the real story of the tragedy and Sara threatens to strangle her if she says a word.

"Not now. Not since I have found you out. The thing I have feared all along has come to pass. I am relieved, now that you show me just where I truly stand. But, I asked: what of you?"

"The world is more likely to applaud than to curse me, Hetty. It likes a new sensation. My change of heart will appear quite natural."

"Are you sure that the world will applaud your real design? You hate the Wrandalls. Will they be charitable toward you when the truth is given out? Will Leslie applaud you? Listen, please: I am trying to save you from yourself, Sara. You will fail in everything you have hoped for. You will be more accursed than I. The world will pity me, it may even forgive me. It will listen to my story, which is more than you will do, and it will believe me. Ah, I am not afraid now. At first I was in terror. I had no hope to escape. All that is past. Today I am ready to take my chances with the big, generous world. Men will try me, and men are not made of stone and steel. They punish but they do not avenge when they sit in jury boxes. They are not women! Good God, Sara, is there a man living today who could have planned this thing you have cherished all these months? Not one! And all men will curse you for it, even though they send me to prison or to the—chair. But they will not condemn me. They will hear my story and they will set me free. And then, what of you?"

Sara stood perfectly rigid, regarding this earnest reasoner with growing wonder.

"My dear," she said, "you would better be thinking of yourself, not of me."

"Why, when I tell my story, the world will hate you, Sara Wrandall. You have helped me, you have been good to me, no matter what sinister motive you may have had in doing so. It is my turn to help you."

"To help me!" cried Sara, astonished in spite of herself.

"Yes. To save you from execration—and even worse."

"There is no moral wrong in marriage with Leslie Wrandall," said Sara, returning to her own project.

"No moral wrong!" cried Hetty, aghast. "No, I suppose not," she went on, a moment later. "It is something much deeper, much blacker than moral wrong. There is no word for it. And if I marry him, what then? Wherein lies your triumph? You can't mean that—God in heaven! You would not go to them with the truth when it was too late for him to—to cast me off!"

"I am no such fool as that. The secret would be forever safe in that event. My triumph, as you call it, we will not discuss."

"How you must hate me, to be willing to do such an infamous thing to me!"

"I do not hate you, Hetty."

"In heaven's name, what do you call it?"

"Justification. Listen to me now. I am saying this for your good sense to seize and appreciate. Would it be right in me to allow you to marry any other man, knowing all that I know? There is but one man you can in justice marry: the one who can repair the wreck that his own blood created. Not Brandon Booth, nor any man save Leslie Wrandall. He is the man who must pay."

"I do not intend to marry," said Hetty.

"But Leslie will marry some one, and I intend that it shall be you. He shall marry the ex-chorus girl, the artist's model, the—the prostitute! Wait! Don't fly at me like that! Don't assume that look of virtuous horror! Let me say what I have to say. This much of your story shall they know, and no more. They will be proud of you!"

Hetty's eyes were blazing. "You use that name—you call me that—and yet you have kissed me, caressed me—loved me!" she cried hoarsely with passion.

"He will ask you tonight for the second time. You will accept him. That is all."

"You must take back what you have just said to me—of me—Sara Wrandall. You must unsay it! You must beg my pardon for that!"

"I draw no line between mistress and prostitute."

"But I—"

"Enough!"

"You wrong me vilely! You must let me—"

"I have an excellent memory, and it serves me well."

Hetty suddenly threw herself upon the couch and buried her face in her arms. Great sobs shook her slender frame.

Sara stood over her and watched for a long time with pitiless eyes. Then a queer, uneasy, wondering light began to develop in those dark, ominous eyes. She leaned forward the better to listen to the choked, inarticulate words that were pouring from the girl's lips. At last, moved by some power she could not have accounted for, she knelt beside the quivering body, and laid her hand, almost timorously, upon the girl's shoulder.

"Hetty—Hetty, if I have wronged you in—in thinking that of you—I—I—" she began brokenly. Then she lifted her eyes, and the harsh light tried to steal back into them. "No, no! What am I saying? What a fool I am to give way—"

"You have wronged me—terribly, terribly!" came in smothered tones from the cushions. "I did not dream you thought that of me."

"What was I to think?"

Hetty lifted her head and cried out: "You would not let me speak! You refused to hear my story. You have been thinking this of me all along, holding it against me, damning me with it, and I have been closer to you than— My God, what manner of woman are you?"

Sara seized her hands and held them in a fierce, tense grip. Her eyes were glowing with a strange fire.

"Tell me—tell me now, on your soul, Hetty were you—were you—"

"No! No! On my soul, no!"

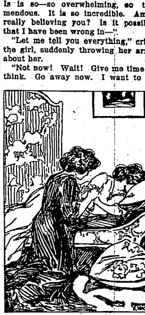
"Look into my eyes!"

The girl's eyes did not falter. She met the dark, penetrating gaze of the other and, though dimmed by tears, her blue eyes were steadfast and resolute. Sara seemed to be searching the very soul of her, the soul that laid itself bare, denuded of every vestige of guile.

"I—I think I believe you," came slowly from the lips of the searcher. "You are looking the truth. I can see it. Hetty, I—I don't understand myself. Is is so—so overwhelming, so tremendous. It is so incredible. Am I really believing you? Is it possible that I have been wrong in—"

"Let me tell you everything," cried the girl, suddenly throwing her arms about her.

"Not now! Wait! Give me time to think. Go away now. I want to be alone." She arose and pushed the girl toward the door. Her eyes were fixed on her in a wondering, puzzled sort of way, and she was shaking her head as if trying to discredit the new emotion that had come to displace the one created ages ago.



"Tell Me—Tell Me, Now—on Your Soul, Hetty—"

Slowly Hetty Castleton retreated toward the door. With her hand on the knob, she paused.

"After what has happened, Sara, you must not expect me to stay with you any longer. I cannot. You may give me up to the law, but—"

Some one was tapping gently at the door.

"Shall I see who it is?" asked the girl, after a long period of silence.

"Yes."

It was Murray. "Mr. Leslie has returned, Miss Castleton, and asks if he may see you at once. He says it is very important.

"Tell him I will be down in a few minutes, Murray."

After the door closed, she waited until the footman's steps died away on the stairs.

"I shall say no to him, Sara, and I shall say to him that you will tell him why I cannot be his wife. Do you understand? Are you listening to me?"

Sara turned away without a word or look of response.

Hetty quietly opened the door and went out.

CHAPTER XIII.

The Second Encounter.

Booth trudged rapidly homeward after leaving Hetty at the lodge. He was throbbing all over with the love of her. The thrill of conquest was in his blood. She had raised a mysterious barrier; all the more zest to the inevitable victory that would be his. He would delight in overcoming obstacles—the bigger the better—for his heart was valiant and the prize no smaller than those which the ancient knights went out to battle for in the lists of love.

It was enough for the present to know that she loved him.

What if she were Hetty Glynn? What if she had been an artist's model? The look he had had into the soul of her through those pure blue eyes was all-convincing. She was worthy of the noblest love.

After luncheon—served with some exasperation by Patrick an hour and a half later than usual—he smoked his pipe on the porch and stared reminiscently at the shifting clouds above the tree tops.

He did not see the Wrandall motor at his garden gate until a lusty voice brought him down from the clouds into the range of earthly sounds. Then he dashed out to the gate, bareheaded and coatless, forgetting that he had been sitting in the obscurity of trailing vines and purple blossoms the while he thought of her.

Leslie was sitting on the wide seat between his mother and sister.

"Glad to see you back, old man," said Booth, reaching in to shake hands with him. "Day early, aren't you? Good afternoon, Mrs. Wrandall. Won't you come in?"

He looked at Vivian as he gave the invitation.

"No, thanks," she replied. "Won't you come to dinner this evening?"

He hesitated. "I'm not quite sure whether I can, Vivian. I've got a half-way sort of—"

"Oh, do, old chap," cut in Leslie, more as a command than an entreaty. "Sorry I can't be there myself, but you'll fare quite as well without me. I'm dining at Sara's. Wants my private ear about one thing and another—see what I mean?"

"We shall expect you, Brandon," said Mrs. Wrandall, fixing him with her lorgnette.

"I'll come, thank you," said he.

He felt disgustingly transparent under that inquisitive glass.

Wrandall stepped out of the car. "I'll stop off for a chat with Brandy, mother."

"Shall I send the car back, dear?"

"Never mind. I'll walk down."

The two men turned in at the gate as the car sped away.

"Well," said Booth, "it's good to see you, Pat!" He called through a basement window. "Come up and take the gentleman's order."

"No drink for me, Brandy. I've been in the temperance state of Maine for two weeks. One week more of it and I'd have been completely pickled. I shall always remember Maine."

Booth sat down on the porch rail, hooked his toes in the supports and proceeded to fill his pipe. Then he struck a match and applied it, Leslie watching him with moody eyes.

"How do you like the portrait, old man?" he inquired between punctuating puffs.

"It's bully. Sargent never did anything finer. Ripping."

"I owe it all to you, Les."

"To me?"

"You induced her to sit to me."

"So I did," said Leslie sourly. "I was Mr. Fix-it sure enough." He allowed a short interval to elapse before taking the plunge. "I suppose, old chap, if I should happen to need your valuable services as best man in the near future, you'd not disappoint me?"

Booth eyed him quizzically. "I trust you're not throwing yourself away, Les," he said drily. "I mean to say, on some one—well, some one not quite up to the mark."

Leslie regarded him with some severity. "Of course not, old chap. What the devil put that into your head?"

"I thought that possibly you'd been making a chump of yourself up in the Maine woods."

"Piffle! Don't be an ass. What's the sense pretending you don't know who she is?"

"I suppose it's Hetty Castleton," said Booth, puffing away at his pipe.

"Who else?"

"Think she'll have you, old man?" asked Booth, after a moment.

"I don't know," replied the other, a bit dashed. "You might wish me luck, though."

Booth knocked the burnt tobacco from the bowl of his pipe. A serious line appeared between his eyes. He was a fair-minded fellow, without guile, without a single treacherous instinct.

"I can't wish you luck, Les," he said slowly. "You see I'm—I'm in love with her myself."

"The devil!" Leslie sat bolt upright and glared at him. "I might have known! And—and is she in love with you?"

"My dear fellow, you reveal considerable lack of tact in asking that question."

"What I want to know is this," exclaimed Wrandall, very pale but very hot: "is she going to marry you?"

Booth smiled. "I'll be perfectly frank with you. She says she won't."

Leslie gulped. "So you've asked her?"

"Obviously."

"And she said she wouldn't? She refused you? Turned you down?" His little mustache shot up at the ends and a joyous, triumphant laugh broke from his lips. "Oh, this is rich! Ha, ha! Turned you down, eh? Poor old Brandy! You're my best friend, and dammit I'm sorry. I mean to say," he went on in some embarrassment, "I'm sorry for you. Of course, you can hardly expect me to—er—"

"Certainly not," accepted Booth amiably. "I quite understand."

"Then, since she's refused you, you might wish me better luck."

"That would mean giving up hope."

"Hope?" exclaimed Leslie quickly. "You don't mean to say you'll annoy her with your—"

"No, I shall not annoy her," replied his friend, shaking his head.

"Well, I should hope not," said Leslie with a scowl. "Turned you down, eh? 'Pon my soul!" He appeared to be relishing the idea of it. "Sorry, old chap, but I suppose you understand just what that means."

Booth's lips hardened for an instant, then relaxed into a queer, almost pitying smile.

"And you want me to be your best man?" he said reflectively.

Leslie arose. His chest seemed to swell a little; assuredly he was breathing much easier. He assumed an air of compassion.

"I shan't insist, old fellow, if you feel you'd rather not—er— See what I mean?" It then occurred to him to utter a word or two of kindly advice. "I shouldn't go on moping if I were you, Brandy. 'Pon my soul, I shouldn't. Take it like a man. I know it hurts, but— Pooh! What's the use aggravating the pain by butting against a stone wall?"

His companion looked out over the tree tops, his hands in his trousers pockets, and it must be confessed that his manner was not that of one who is oppressed by despair.

"I think I'm taking it like a man, Les," he said. "I only hope you'll take it as nicely if she says nay to you."

An uneasy look leaped into Leslie's face. He seemed noticeably less corpulent about the chest. He wondered if Booth knew anything about his initial venture. A question rose to his lips, but he thought quickly and held it back. Instead, he glanced at his watch.

"I must be off. See you tomorrow, I hope."

"So long," said Booth, stopping at the top of the steps while his visitor skipped down to the gate with a nimbleness that suggested the formation of a sudden resolve.

Leslie did not waste time in parting inanities he strode off briskly in the direction of home, but not without a furtive glance out of the tail of his eye as he disappeared beyond the hedgerow at the end of Booth's garden. That gentleman was standing where he had left him, and was filling his pipe once more.

The day was warm, and Leslie was in a dripping perspiration when he reached home. He did not enter the house but made his way direct to the garage.

"Get out the car at once, Brown," was his order.

Three minutes later he was being driven over the lower road toward Southlook, taking good care to avoid Booth's place by the matter of a mile or more. He was in a fever of hope and eagerness. It was very plain to him why she had refused Booth. The iron was hot. He didn't intend to lose any time in striking.

And now we know why he came again to Sara's in the middle of a blazing afternoon, instead of waiting until the more seductive shades of night had fallen, when the moon sat serene in the seat of the Mighty.

He didn't have to wait long for Hetty. Up to the instant of her appearance in the door, he had reveled in the thought that the way was now paved with roses. But with her entrance, he felt his confidence and courage slipping. Perhaps that may explain the abruptness with which he proceeded to go about the business in hand.

"I couldn't wait till tonight," he explained as she came slowly across the room toward him. She was halfway to him before he awoke to the fact that he was standing perfectly still. Then he started forward, somehow impelled to meet her at least halfway. "You'll forgive me, Hetty, if I have disturbed you."

"I was not lying down, Mr. Wrandall," she said quietly. There was nothing ominous in the words, but he experienced a sudden sensation of cold. "Won't you sit down? Or would you rather go out to the terrace?"

"It's much more comfortable here, if you don't mind. I—I suppose you know what it is I want to say to you. You—"

"Yes," she interrupted wearily; "and knowing as much, Mr. Wrandall, it would not be fair of me to let you go on."

"Not fair?" he said, in honest amazement. "But, my dear, I—"

"Please, Mr. Wrandall," she exclaimed, with a pleading little smile that would have touched the heart of anyone but Leslie. "Please don't go on. It is quite as impossible now as it was before. I have not changed."

He could only say, mechanically: "You haven't?"

"No. I am sorry if you have thought that I might come to—"

"Think, for heaven's sake, think what you are doing!" he cried, feeling for the edge of the table with a support-seeking hand. "I—I had Sara's word that you were not—"

"Unfortunately Sara cannot speak for me in a matter of this kind. Thank you for the honor you would—"

"Honor be hanged!" he blurted out, losing his temper. "I love you! It's a purely selfish thing with me, and I'm blowed if I consider it an honor to be refused by any woman. I—"

"Mr. Wrandall!" she cried, fixing him with her flashing, indignant eyes. "You are forgetting yourself." She was standing very straight and slim and imperious before him.

He quailed. "I—I beg your pardon. I—I—"

"There is nothing more to be said," she went on icily. "Goodby."

"Would you mind telling me whether there is anyone else?" he asked, as he turned toward the door.

"Do you really feel that you have the right to ask that question, Mr. Wrandall?"

He wet his lips with his tongue. "Then, there is some one!" he cried, rapping the table with his knuckles. He didn't realize till afterward how vigorously he rapped. "Some confounded English nobody, I suppose."

She smiled, not unkindly. "There is no English nobody, if that answers your question."

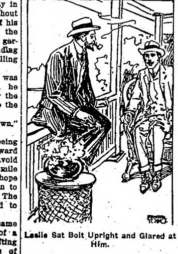
"Then, will you be kind enough to offer a reason for not giving me a fair chance in a clear field? I think it's due—"

"Can't you see how you are distressing me? Must I again go through that horrid scene in the garden? Can't you take a plain no for an answer?"

"Good Lord!" he gasped, and in those two words he revealed the complete overturning of a lifelong estimate of himself. It seemed to take more than his breath away.

"Goodby," she said with finality.

He stared at the door through which she disappeared, his hopes, his conceit, his self-regard trailing after her with shameless disloyalty to the standards he had set for them, and then, with a rather ghastly smile of self-commiseration on his lips, he slipped out of the house, jumped into the motor car, and gave a brief but explicit command to the chauffeur, who lost no time in assisting his master to turn tail in ignominious flight.



Leslie Sat Bolt Upright and Glared at Him.

Hetty was gloomily but resolutely employed in laying out certain of her personal belongings, preparatory to packing them for departure, when Sara entered her room.

They regarded each other steadily, questioningly for a short space of time.

"Leslie has just called up to ask 'what the devil' I meant by letting him make a fool of himself," said Sara, with a peculiar little twisted smile on her lips.

Hetty offered no comment, but after a moment gravely and rather wistfully called attention to her present occupation by a significant flaunt of her hand and a saddened smile.

"I see," said Sara, without emotion. "If you choose to go, Hetty, I shall not oppose you."

"My position here is a false one, Sara. I prefer to go."

"This morning I should have held a sword over your head."

"It is very difficult for me to realize all that has happened."

"You are free to depart. You are free in every sense of the word. Your future rests with yourself, my dear."

"It hurts me more than I can tell to feel that you have been hating me all these months."

"It hurts me—now."

Hetty walked to the window and looked out.

"What are your plans?" Sara inquired, after an interval.

"I shall seek employment—and wait for you to act."

"I? You mean?"

"I shall not run away, Sara. Nor do I intend to reveal myself to the authorities. I am not morally guilty of crime. A year ago I feared the consequences of my deed, but I have learned much since then. I was a stranger in a new world. In England we have been led to believe that you lynch women here as readily as you lynch men. I now know better than that. From you alone I learned my greatest lesson. You revealed to me the true meaning of human kindness. You shielded me who should not. Even now I believe that your first impulse was a tender one. I shall not forget it, Sara. You will live to regret the baser thought that came later on. I have loved you—yes, almost as a good dog loves his master. It is not for me to tell the story of that night and all these months to the world. I would not be betraying myself, but you. You would be called upon to explain, not I. And you would be the one to suffer. When you met me on the road that night I was on my way back to the inn to give myself into custody. You have made it impossible for me to do so now. My lips are sealed. It rests with you, Sara."

Sara joined her in the broad window. There was a strangely exalted look in her face. A gilded birdcage hung suspended in the casement. Without a word, she threw open the window screen. The gay little canary in the gilded cage cocked his head and watched her with alert eyes. Then she reached up and gently removed the cage from its fastenings. Putting it down upon the window sill, she opened the tiny door. The bird hopped about his prison in a state of great excitement.

Hetty looked on, fascinated.

At last a yellow streak shot out through the open door and an instant later resolved itself into the bobbing, fluttering dicky-bird that had lived in a cage all its life without an hour of freedom. For a few seconds it circled over the tree tops and then alighted on one of the branches. One might well have imagined that he could hear its tiny heart beating with terror. Its wings were half-raised and fluttering, its head jerking from side to side in wild perturbation. Taking courage, Master Dicky hopped timorously to a nearby twig, and then ventured a flight to a tree top nearer the window casement. Perched in its topmost branches he cheeped shrilly, as if there was fear in his little breast.

In silence the two women in the window watched the agitated movements of the bird. The same thought was in the mind of each, the same question, the same intense wish.

A brown thrush sped through the air, close by the timid canary. Like a flash it dropped to the twigs lower down, its wings palpitating in violent alarm.

"Dicky!" called Sara Wrandall, and then cheeped between her teeth.

A moment later Dicky was fluttering about the eaves; his circles grew smaller, his winging less rhythmical, till at last with a nervous little flutter he perched on the top of the window shutter, so near that they might have reached to him with their hands. He sat there with his head cocked to one side.

"Dicky!" called Sara again. This time she held out her finger. For some time he regarded it with indifference, not to say disfavor. Then he took one more flight, but much shorter than the first, bringing up again at the shutter top. A second later he hopped down and his little talons gripped Sara's finger with an earnestness that left no room for doubt.

She lowered her hand until it was even with the open door of the gilded cage. He shot inside with a whir that suggested a scramble. With his wings folded, he sat on his little trapeze and cheeped. She closed and fastened the door, and then turned to Hetty.

"My symbol," she said softly.

There were tears in Hetty's eyes.

Forget to Collect Their Money.

The British government every year reaps a huge profit from the people who forget their own government stock when dividends fall due. The fault rests entirely with the stockholders for they even forget to give their addresses, so that they can be notified that money awaits them in the government coffers. In this case, about $5,000,000 is passed on to the national debt commission, and in turn it receives the interest from this money.

THE SUNBEAM.

BY W. G. HUNT.

Published every Friday, at Sunbeam, Pennington County, Minnesota.

Entered as Second-class matter August 30 1905, at the post office at Sunbeam Minn. under the Act of Congress of March 3.1879

Be sure to go to election next Tuesday.

The prospects are that Lee will win out in Pennington County at least.

Vote for the Red Lake and Pennington County candidate for Representative John A. Duffy.

The Twin Cities are the only ones that are not satisfied with Hammond as the Democratic leader and have put up D. W. Lawler as his opponent, but we predict that Mr. Lawler will be badly defeated next Tuesday.

We think that Lattimore of the Eleven Towns is endeavoring to lead the Republican party into a sure death trap in this state, by supporting Eberhart, as Hammond will lace it to him proper in November if he wins out next Tuesday.

Next Tuesday the people will have a chance to decide whether machine rule can run this state or not. Eberhart has got his machine well oiled up and is ready for business next Tuesday, but if the people turn out he will be defeated.

In voting at the Tuesdays election remember that Judge Watts is a candidate for associate Justice of the Supreme Court, and is entitled to your vote. Also remember that Elias Steenerson, a brother of Congressman Steenerson is a candidate for Leiutenant Governor.

Laying party aside Congressman Hammond would make the best governor that is in the field for that position, and if Eberhart wins out next Tuesday, we will pull our coat, or as some might say turn it and tell you why, for we are tired of the present administration of state affairs.

Some of the wise ones are suggesting that as between Thorstad and Nelson in the campaign for sheriff, the lucky one of the two will be the one eliminated at the primaries, as he will be saved the trouble and expense of making the campaign against the present sheriff, whom it is conceded will be overwhelmingly renominated and re-elected.—T. R. Falls News Press.

As Miss Theoline Goodwin, candidate for Superintendent of Schools was the first candidate for office to place her name and request for support before our readers, and as she is a stranger to a large number of them, we will say, that Miss Goodwin is a thorough up to date scholar, and is in every way well qualified for the position. She has held the position of Normal Training School Instructor in the Thief River Falls High School for a number of years, and if she is elected to the office of Superintendent of Schools, there is no question as to her ability to fill the position. As Mr. Mostue, her opponent is well known in this locality it is unnecessary for us to introduce him to our readers. He lived in the town of Deer Park for a number of years, but removed with his family to the city of Thief River Falls last fall, and of course must take his equal chances with the rest of the politicians of that city when he is a candidate for office.

Work is steadily progressing on the Electric Line Railroad, and it will be ready to market the falls crop over.

This is one of the most favorable crop seasons that we have had since 1905, and the farmers are smiling over the prospects of a bumper crop.

That Farmer's Club over in Clearwater County are going after Stenvick's scalp proper, judging from the last week's issue of the Clearbrook Journal.

There are two candidates in opposition to LaBree for sheriff, but he will eliminate one of them next Tuesday, and "elevate" the other one to position on his farm in November.

Superintendent of Schools Mostue made this office a pleasant call last Saturday. He is interviewing voters now days as his office is to be voted on at the Primary next Tuesday.

It seems that Trovaton's candidate for Representative has a bad record among the farmers of Clearwater county, as county attorney over there, and he was overwhelmingly defeated the second time he ran.

A farmer informed us this week that he was going to go to Primary election next Tuesday, so as to vote for LaBree for sheriff, so "Jesse" is sure to get one vote up this way, and we would not be surprised if he got quite a number of them, as he is a first class man for the position.

Ye editor just completed the breaking of ten acres of new land and seeding it to flax today. We did not sit in the office and tell a hired man how to do the work, but got between the plow handles and done the work ourselves, both breaking and seeding. Who says the editor of THE SUNBEAM is not a farmer?

The mail route on this mail line has been changed, so as to have the driver come from Plummer to Rhoda post office instead of Lillo, returning through the south part of the town of Mayfield. This will improve the mail service for a large territory living north of Clearwater River something that was badly needed.

If you see an auto coming, scaring your horses and causing them to run away from your boy who is driving them on a harrow and run into a barbed wire fence and lay one or two of them up for the balance of the season, don't get ugly and swear, but just consider that the man has Autoed clear out from Thief River Falls to hand you a white card with a picture on, and tell you how to vote.

Go to election and vote next Tuesday.

Trovaton is saving auto expenses by writing the farmers how to vote.

Remember you Pennington and Red Lake county voters, that that Normal School is located at Bemidji, but the money is not yet appropriated to build it, but they expect to get it appropriated next winter. John A. Duffy will vote against the appropriation and so will Hanson. If we can hold them from getting the money, we yet stand a chance to get that Normal School located where it belongs at Thief River Falls. Vote for Duffy.

The letters sent out by Andrew Trovaton regarding the candidates for Represntative is misleading and unfair. He says: "Mr. Duffy has after some consideration came out for county option." The above statement is not true, and no one knows it better than Trovaton. Duffy placed county option in his platform when it first came out, and it has stayed there ever since, and John A. Duffy is a man of his word, and will vote for county option. It seems that Trovoton is getting to be a little "tricky" in politics, and it would be just as well to not suck in all of his bait.

D. P. O'Neill is making a vigorous campaign over in Clearwater county telling the farmers about Bob Dunn's good roads law. Dan will not tell them how he voted in the last legislature for the interests of the twin cities, but we will attend to that during the campaign, and give the date he voted, and the page of the legislative record that his vote is recorded on. We never heard a man that could load up a school house full of farmers with "hot air" better than O'Neil but he forgets all about his farmer friends as soon as he steps off the train at St. Paul.

"J. C. R." IDENTIFIED AS EARL W. ILES

"MAN OF MYSTERY" IS TAKEN HOME TO BE UNDER MOTHER'S CARE.

ESCAPED FROM ROCHESTER

Later Found Wandering in Chicago—Was Goldfield Mining Engineer Who Had Been Missing Since September, 1906.

Chicago, Ill. — The man of mystery who has been known only as "J. C. R." by the officials of the Oak Park infirmary and by hospital attaches at Rochester, Minn., has been identified as Earl W. Iles, a mining engineer who has been missing since 1906.

Identification by Mother.

The identification was made by Iles' mother, Mrs. H. E. Pitkin of this city and the proof was considered complete when the man revealed a scar of a cut on his right foot which he had suffered when a boy.

Mrs. Pitkin described the cut which had not hitherto been noticed by the officials. Iles showed feeble signs of recognition although his vocal chords have long been paralyzed and he was unable to speak.

Escaped From Rochester.

The man of mystery was found unconscious on the streets here last November, and was sent to the infirmary. He was unable to speak but wrote the initials "J. C. R." and at times "J. R. R." He was identified as a man who had escaped some time before from a Rochester, Minn., hospital, where he had been for several years, known only as "J. C. R." He was believed to have been at some time connected with the navy.

Mrs. Pitkin said her son never had been in the navy, but had last been heard from in the Goldfield mining district in September, 1906.

"He started for home to visit us," she said, "but never arrived."

He was found dazed in the northern part of Minnesota and was believed to have been injured or suffered paralysis which caused complete loss of memory.

Iles will be taken to his mother's home and cared for by her.

Criticises Southern Minnesota.

Thief River Falls.—Good-natured, but nevertheless severe criticism of "unprogressive" school conditions in Southern Minnesota as marked against progress along the same lines in Northern Minnesota, in an address delivered by E. M. Phillips of St. Paul, state rural school commissioner, was one of the features of the three days' convention of the Northern Minnesota Development association in this city. "School consolidation," said Mr. Phillips, "is my topic. The success of rural school consolidation belongs to the people and there now are 105 places where consolidation has been voted and seventy-six such schools are in operation—and three-fourths of this number are located in Northern Minnesota. You know down South they seem to have the idea that God established the school lines and that they cannot be changed, except by divine interference."

Attended Relative's Funeral.

Litchfield.—Inquiry here revealed that Miss Hazel Pollock, student at the Chicago Conservatory of Music, arrested in Chicago on a charge of taking jewelry and $60 from Mrs. Joseph I. Adler, in order, she said, to obtain money with which to go to her grandfather, who was dying at Litchfield, attended the funeral of O. W. Benson, her grandparent, in this village on May 19 last. She was here only two days.

Children Play With Dynamite.

Duluth.—Frank and John Smoltz, age eight and nine respectively, and Johnnie Cooper, age seven, were injured by an explosion while playing with a dynamite cap. Frank Smoltz was badly injured about the face, neck and arms and hands, and his eyesight may be impaired. Johnnie Smoltz was badly peppered in both his eyes and face and will probably be totally blind. The Cooper boy was injured but not as seriously.

Kasota, Minn., Youth Drowns.

St. Peter, Minn., June 2.—Henry Peel, 20 years old, a young man living at Kasota, was drowned while in bathing at Lake Emily.

Mankato Normal Graduates 101.

Mankato.—The exercises of commencement week were concluded on Thursday evening when the commencement exercises took place. The address was made by W. F. Webster, principal of the East high school, Minneapolis. Governor A. O. Eberhart presented the diplomas. The graduating class numbered 101. To this number should be added fifty who were graduated previously during the year, thus making a total of 151 for the year.

MYSTERY MAN MINNESOTAN

Colorado Enigma Is George E. Bartholomew, Formerly of Sanborn.

Pueblo, Col.—Colorado's man of mystery has been identified. He is a Minnesotan, but not the missing "J. C. R." He is George E. Bartholomew, former postmaster and editor of Sanborn, Minn., and later a resident of Minneapolis.

Bartholomew was found wandering in a dazed condition in Granada county several months ago, examined for his sanity and committed to an asylum at Pueblo.

For the first time since then he recovered his senses and disclosed to asylum attendants his identity.

Bartholomew was taken in charge by the Colorado authorities at his own request several months ago, saying he had lost his memory. At the time of his trial he talked intelligently, with an excelent vocabulary, but had no idea of cities or states of the union. Only once did he exhibit any violent insanity. He fought to keep out of a cell. Five men finally handled him.

He was thought then to be the missing "J. C. R." from Rochester, Minn.

Wife in Minneapolis.

Minneapolis.—Mrs. Bartholomew, who is in Minneapolis, appeared indifferent as to whether Colorado's "man of mystery" was her husband or not. After reading the dispatches from Pueblo she admitted that he was undoubtedly the man, and at the same time hinted that her husband might have been feigning aphasia during the time he spent in the sanatorium in that city.

"He seemed to recover his memory quick enough when he wanted to," she said when asked if she could offer any explanation of his disappearance. Mrs. Bartholomew is a demonstrator.

According to her story, Batholomew left this city about six months ago. He was dissatisfied with home conditions, she said, and when he left declared that "no one would ever hear from him again." Previous to that she said that there had been some domestic trouble and once she attempted to place him in the hands of the police, charging mistreatment.

Mrs. Bartholomew said that she had not heard from him since then, although her attention was called to his picture published in The Tribune in January, when it was believed that he might be the missing "J. C. R." of Rochester, Minn.

"As far as I am concerned, the authorities can do what they like," she said this morning. "He left me after I did all that I possibly could for him."

Remembered in Sanborn.

Sanborn.—G. E. Bartholomew came to Sanborn about 1891 and taught school several years. He was editor and postmaster several years and left here in December, 1909.

MAY BE VICTIM OF PLOT

Man Accused of Arson Confesses Implicating Proprietor of Theater.

Crookston.—A sensation was caused here when State Fire Warden Martin of St. Paul, swore out a warrant for the arrest of Alex Laplante on a charge of arson for setting fire to the Grand opera house which was partially destroyed recently.

Laplante later made a confession which implicated Ernest Brusse, and also said that Fred Simmons, one of the proprietors of the theater, had paid for the job. Simmons denies any implication and there is a strong sentiment that he is the victim of a plot.

Simmons received a letter about three months ago from a former convict of St. Paul, who had just finished a term for connection with a diamond robbery, asking his assistance in getting even with the proprietor of the Grand. Simmons submitted a reply to this letter to County Attorney Hagen. The chief of police was advised at the time of the overtures.

Simmons gave a bond to appear and the whole case is now going before the grand jury. Three previous attempts were made to fire the theater.

Convict Returned to Prison.

Stillwater.—Michael Radovac, the paroled convict who shot Frank A. Whittier, the state parole agent, is back in Prison. Whittier went with a requisition from Governor Eberhart to Utah. Radovac will serve his unexpired term and also will answer to the charge of shooting with intent to kill in the Whittier case before the grand jury in November.

State Postal Exams in July.

Washington.—Competitive examination for fourth-class postmasters in the states of North Dakota and Minnesota will be held during July, it is announced.

Dedicate Fergus Falls Church.

Fergus Falls.—The Church of Our Lady of Victory, a new Catholic edifice has been formally dedicated. The ceremonies were conducted by Rt. Rev. Bishop Trobec, of the St. Cloud diocese, assisted by Rt. Rev. Monsignore Richter, of Melrose, Rev. Wm. Van Dinter of Alexandria and Rev. J. Wilkes of Elizabeth, Rev. Father Welp of Melrose, Rev. Vincent Weigand of St. Joe, Rev. Father Zitur of Staples and Rev. Fred Hinnenkamp of Sauk Center.

REFUGEES TELL OF MEXICO

San Luis Potosi Merchant, at Mankato, Says Mob Robbed Him of $15,000 Goods and Cash.

Mankato.—Julius Paulson, wife and four children arrived in Mankato direct from Vera Cruz, Mexico. They are refugees from San Luis Potosi, and are guests of relatives near this city.

Mr. Paulson predicts that within two months the rebels will have complete control of Mexico, but he believes the Americans must take control to bring order.

The day that Vera Cruz was occupied by the American marines and sailors a mob broke into Paulson's store, stole $15,000 worth of goods and $500 in cash from the cash register, and later the entire factory and stock valued at $75,000 was confiscated by the federals. Mr. Paulson's automobile is now in use by the officers of the federal army.

The Paulson family made their escape over the house tops to the home of a friend. After remaining five days in the British consulate they, with other Americans, were put on a special train for Mexico City.

STATE ELKS MEET AND ELECT

Little Falls Provides Splendid Entertainment—N. A. Nelson Chosen President—Faribault Next.

Little Falls.—Chilling breezes did not serve to dampen the enthusiasm of the hundreds attending the annual convention of the Minnesota State Association of Elks, and this city went on record for its splendid entertainment.

At a business session these officers were elected: President, N. A. Nelson, Stillwater; secretary, F. Eldridge, St. Paul; treasurer, J. E. Samuel, Duluth. Faribault was unanimously chosen for the meeting place in 1915.

An effort was made to have the association favor the adoption of a constitutional amendment of a reforestation building, but the matter was considered political and it was tabled.

The association went on record for grand lodge recognition of state associations.

Bankers Given a Thrill.

Fairmont.—The second district bankers' convention closed with a banquet Friday night at Hotel Hazelmere, a lake resort. Covers were placed for 150. It was rather an informal affair with many short impromptu speeches. The company started back to town at 1 a. m. and met with a thrilling experience. A terrific windstorm came up while the party was aboard the Concord and the good ship drifted out of its course in the darkness and ran aground near the outlet of Budd lake. It was 4 a. m. before the last of the excursionists could be taken off the foundered ship and brought to town in launches. Nothing more happened to anyone than a serious fright.

Barrows Mine May Close.

Brainerd.—The Barrows mine at Barrows will probably be closed in a short time. The Virginia Ore Mining company, a subsidiary of the M. A. Hanna company of Cleveland, Ohio, has served notice on the fee owners that the lease will be canceled on June 29. This action on the part of the operators, it is said, is due in part to the extremely dull market for iron ore and also to the fact that the M. A. Hanna company has opened immense tonnages of practically the same grade of ore in Michigan, which can be mined by the open pit methods and hence a great deal cheaper than by the underground method at Barrows.

Rochester Jury Won't Indict.

Rochester.—John Baker, vice president of the Oronoco State bank, was relieved of a serious charge in district court, now in session here, when the grand jury failed to indict him. He was charged with manslaughter in the first degree. On January 17, at a dance at Oronoco, Allen Pfeiffer was a principal in an altercation. Mr. Baker was a witness of the affair, and struck Pfeiffer a blow with his fist, felling him to the ground. Pfeiffer struck a rock, resulting in concussion of the brain and causing his death shortly after.

Le Sueur Hunter Killed.

Le Sueur.—Carl Ipsen, a businesman here, was accidentally shot and killed by Harry Pitcher. The two were hunting birds with small rifles. Pitcher was reloading when the gun was discharged, the bullet lodging in Ipsen's head. Medical aid was given at once and Ipsen was carried to his home. He died two hours later without regaining consciousness.

Demand For Old Wheat.

Duluth.—Duluth exporters announce that they have a surprisingly good and very steady demand for old wheat for export. The movement started about six weeks ago, and after a halt, when about 1,000,000 bushels had been sold, it has started up again. Two days ago 240,000 bushels were worked for export and since then more demand has developed. There are said to be less than 1,000,000 bushels of No. 1 Northern wheat here unsold and that is expected to diminish shortly.

Anticipation.

"One summer I chanced to be back in the ridges of Tennessee," said United States Senator Blair Lee of Maryland, as he leaned back in his chair, "and a couple of mountaineers got into an argument. High words led to blows, and one of the men was killed. One of the party volunteered to ride on ahead to the dead man's cabin and break the news to the widow.

"She was seated at a table eating apple-dumplings when the man rode up. He broke the news as gently as possible. The woman listened quietly with a dumpling poised in the air half way to her mouth. When the man had finished, she stuffed the dumpling into her mouth and said:

"'You-all jest wait till I finish this hyer dumplin' an' then you-all'll hear some hollerin'.'"

SCALY PSORIASIS ON LIMBS

Troop H, 6th U. S. Cavalry, Camp McCoy, Sparta, Wis.—"I was troubled with psoriasis for nearly two years. Portions of my arms and limbs were affected mostly with it. It appeared in scaly form, breaking out in very small dots and gradually grew larger and white scales formed when about the size of an ordinary match-head. The looks of it was horrible, which made it very unpleasant for me. It itched a little at times.

"I tried several treatments which cured me for a month, but it always broke out again. One day a friend saw the advertisement of Cuticura Soap and Ointment in the paper and I sent for a sample. They helped me, so I purchased two more boxes of Cuticura Ointment and some Cuticura Soap and they completely cured me. It took three months for Cuticura Soap and Ointment to complete my cure." (Signed) Walter Mahony, Oct. 22, 1912.

For the Collection Box.

Jimmy, aged four, had been sent upstairs by his mother to get ten cents, which she intended to use for the purchase of postage stamps.

Not knowing exactly what a ten-cent piece looked like, Jimmy called downstairs: "Mother, is ten cents a little piece of money?"

"Yes, Jimmy, the smallest piece of money in my purse."

"Oh, I know now, mother! Church money."—Judge.

HAD NO RATIONS TO SPARE

Good Reason Why Confederate Commander Was Willing to See His Prisoners Escape.

When, at Gaines Mill in 1862, the Fifth Texas captured two whole regiments of Union soldiers, the Texans were all very proud of their achievement. One of them has described an amusing scene in connection with the surrender.

When the Union officers gave up their swords to Colonel Upton they were so prompt in the duty that he was compelled to lay down the frying pan which he carried in place of a sword and hold the weapons presented in his arms.

Just then he noticed a commotion at the far end of the captured regiments. That was near the timber, and a squad of the prisoners were making an effort to pass by "Big John" Ferris of Company B, who stood there unaided, endeavoring to intercept them.

Springing upon a log, the armful of swords dangling about in every direction, Upton shouted:

"John Ferris, what are you trying to do now?"

"I am trying to keep these fellows from escaping," yelled Big John.

"Let them go, you fool!" shouted back Upton. "We'd rather fight than feed them!"

Forget-Me-Not.

"Ah, yes, there are still true and loyal souls in this sad world," murmured the solemn individual in the tortoise-shell glasses. "I used to know a dear girl—it was ten long years ago—and not a year has passed since that she hasn't written me a birthday letter. Always what she writes is about the same: 'Dear Alfred, I can't ever forget, not if I live to be a hundred, this day of all the days in the year. Let me once again wish you long life and happiness with all my heart,' etc."

"Very sweet of the girl," said the stout young man with the amazing waistcoat, "very sweet of her, indeed."

"Very," replied the solemn individual; "only, you see, she writes that dashed letter to me on a different day every year."

Selfish Constituency.

"Are you going to send your congressman back to Washington?"

"No," replied Farmer Corntossel. "We've found out that he's such good company that we've decided to keep him home."

Still a Bachelor.

Patience—What good did it do your brother to join the militia?

Patrice—Why, he's been mixed up in four engagements and he hasn't been taken prisoner yet.

WOMAN COULD HARDLY STAND

Because of Terrible Backache. Relieved by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

Philadelphia, Pa.—"I suffered from displacement and inflammation, and had such pains in my sides, and terrible backache so that I could hardly stand. I took six bottles of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, and now I can do any amount of work, sleep good, eat good, and don't have a bit of trouble. I recommend Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound to every suffering woman."—Mrs. HARRY FISHER, 1642 Juniata Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Another Woman's Case.

Providence, R. I.—"I cannot speak too highly of your Vegetable Compound as it has done wonders for me and I would not be without it. I had a displacement, bearing down, and backache, until I could hardly stand and was thoroughly run down when I took Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. It helped me and I am in the best of health at present. I work in a factory all day long besides doing my housework so you can see what it has done for me. I give you permission to publish my name and I speak of your Vegetable Compound to many of my friends."—Mrs. ABRIL LAWSON, 126 Lippitt St., Providence, R. I.

Danger Signals to Women are what one physician called backache, headache, nervousness, and the blues. In many cases they are symptoms of some female derangement or an inflammatory, ulcerative condition, which may be overcome by taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. Thousands of American women willingly testify to its virtue.

SUGGESTIONS FOR ICE TRUST

Just a Few Reasons Why There Should Be an Advance in Price of Summer Necessity.

The ice trust having offered a silver loving-cup for the best excuse which might be invented for raising the price of ice after the cold winter, we hopefully submit the following:

1. The ice being so thick and heavy, it costs more to handle it.
2. The blocks are so large that there is great waste in cutting them up for the retail trade.
3. The ice is so cold it freezes solid in the storage houses and is very difficult to get out.
4. As the winter has been so cold, the summer will necessarily be very hot, and the demand for ice very great, so that it is doubtful if there will be enough to go around.
5. The ice being extra thick, extra cold, and extra quality all through, it is only proper that an extra price should be demanded.
6. The price of ice never had any relation to the cost of production, anyhow.—Life.

His Coffin Finished, He Dies.

After seeing that his coffin was made, J. Welch, father of Mrs. Nelson, died from the ravages of cancer. He came from Oakland last fall to live with his daughter. Three months ago he requested that his coffin be made, so it might be finished before his death.

His son-in-law and daughter were able to postpone the unpleasant task, but Nelson yielded to entreaties of his father-in-law ten days ago, and unwillingly began the work to please the aged sufferer, finishing it before death came.—Fall River Mills (Cal.) Dispatch to the New York World.

The Fingerless Kind.

Lillian Russell, during a recent visit to Atlantic City, was amazed to see the number of slashed skirts that still prevailed on the Boardwalk.

"They must be last spring's leftovers," she said.

Just then a young girl in a skirt outrageously slashed at back and front, asked her companion, in passing:

"How do you like my new dress? Fits like a glove, doesn't it?"

"Fits like a mitt, she'd better say," murmured Miss Russell, with a smile.

Old Acquaintance.

A resourceful girl, having danced a pink party frock to ribbons, took what was left of i tand made a wonwhat was left of it and made a wonderful lamp shade. The next evening she was entertaining a caller in the soft light and she said to him quite casually: "How do you like my new lamp shade?"

William regarded it for a moment critically, then he said: "The last time I saw that shade I danced with it."

GOOD HITCH FOR TWO TEAMS

One Shown in Illustration Has Been in Service Twelve Years and Proven Satisfactory.

This sketch shows my four-horse evener, which I find hard to beat. I have used it for twelve years and it has proven particularly satisfactory for a wagon, as both teams must pull their portions, writes Ed Kraus of Hays, Kan., in Farmers' Mail and Breeze. However the evener may be used anywhere that a lead team is needed. To make it, take two pieces of iron 2 feet long and 2½ inches wide and drill two ⅝-inch holes 22 inches apart through both pieces. Drill another through the center for the wrench bolt. These two pieces are marked A in the drawing. The pieces BB work between them. Use heavy washers on either side of the pieces B so as to make them work freely back and forth. Each piece B is 18 inches long with the outside holes 16 inches apart, and a hole in the center of each. The four pieces are CC, about 10 inches long, with holes drilled in each end, then riveted to D at one end and BB at the other, one above and one below. These pieces are strapiron 1¼ inches wide and ¼ inch thick. D is a triangular plate about ⅜ inch thick and the holes are about 3 inches apart. Use a ½-inch rod with link for the lead team.

RAPE PASTURAGE FOR SWINE

Dwarf Essex Is Only Variety Suitable for Hogs—One of Best Emergency Forage Crops.

The grower of rape should insist on getting the Dwarf Essex, as this is the only variety that is suitable for hog pasture. There is a summer or bird seed rape found on the market which makes a worthless pasture and should not be used.

I have used rape for several years as pasture for both breeding and fattening hogs and never experienced any difficulty in getting them to eat it, writes Turner Wright in Farmers Mail and Breeze.

If hogs that are not accustomed to rape are given no other green feed for a few days they will soon learn to eat and relish it even though they are fed a liberal amount of grain. It often happens that hogs, after learning to eat rape, prefer it to clover or alfalfa that is coarse and woody. I have often changed hogs from alfalfa to rape and from rape to alfalfa and could see no difference in the way they seemed to relish these different feeds. If the hogs are turned on the rape that will eat it more readily than if it is more mature.

Rape is one of the best emergency forage crops we have. A good rape pasture will give practically as good results as alfalfa. It can be sown in feed yards and lots that are used through the winter and thus not only furnish a pasture to take the place of a shortage of alfalfa or clover pasture but also provide a means of utilizing ground that would otherwise grow a crop of unsightly and worthless weeds.

SILAGE GOOD FOR POULTRY

Of Material Assistance in Keeping Up Egg Production—Fowls Are Crazy for Succulence.

Cows and sheep thrive on silage; it is a little too bulky for hogs to eat a great deal; horses and mules eat small amounts with profit, and a writer to Hoard's Dairyman tells that it is the best ever for poultry. He states: "We have tried it for two years and find the birds are crazy for it and will clean up all given them. Of course, we give a grain ration, oyster shells, grit, etc., besides the ensilage." Since poultry require some green food in order to do very well and lay best when they enjoy their food best, it can be seen that ensilage will help a great deal to keep the egg production up to the standard, as well as stimulating the milk flow of dairy cows or putting beef on steers and mutton on sheep.

Nitrate of Soda.

One of my neighbors lost a good cow because she ate a quantity of nitrate of soda. Last summer he left his barn door open and nearly lost a horse, but someone saw it in time and dosed the animal. It was a close call, for the horse was more than a week getting over the trouble, says a writer in an exchange. This suggests that it is easier to prevent such things than it is to cure them.

Yards for Growing Chicks.

If necessary to keep growing chickens in yards, make the yards so that they can be moved to a fresh piece of ground as often as is necessary to furnish a clean, sweet, grassy spot.

COOKING FLAVORS FROM FLOWERS

By EVA RYMAN GAILLARD.

The use of nasturtium seed-pods for giving a special flavor to mixed pickles, or in caper sauce has become quite general and a few housewives know that either the leaves or flower-petals, make a delicious filling for sandwiches.

Roses, too, are coming into favor not alone for their flavor but for their coloring matter as well. Jelly made from the green varieties of gooseberries is as good as that made from the red varieties, but does not look good because of its peculiar color—or lack of it. A handful of pink rose petals, cooked with the berries before straining, will give a pink tint that adds materially to both flavor and color.

If a small roll of butter is placed in a dish with rose petals over and all around it and then closely covered, the butter will absorb the rose flavor to a degree that makes it extra fine for spreading sandwiches—of the dainty kind. If a couple of fine, large petals be placed in the sandwich with the edges just showing between the bread slices the effect is very appetizing.

Place a handful of rose petals with a cupful of fine granulated sugar and slightly bruise them. Then add a little water and simmer until thick. The result will be equal to a delicious rose-honey.

In using roses three things must be remembered: Don't use those that have been sprayed with poison—select the very fragrant varieties—use the petals while fresh and full of the properties that hold fragrance.

Violets of the fragrant varieties and other flowers may be used in these same ways; and the Chinese use chrysanthemums, carnations and various flowers with stronger flavors in many ways, often using a little of the foliage (finely chopped) with the flowers.

Dropping a rose-geranium leaf in the bottom of a jelly-glass and pouring the hot jelly over it is a not uncommon practise, but comparatively few cooks know that four or five leaves in the bottom of a cake pan will flavor the cake. The leaves should be well buttered to prevent them from rising in the batter.

While speaking of leaves it may be said that two or three cherry-leaves laid over the rhubarb in a pie will entirely change the flavor. In baked rhubarb for sauce the effect is equally good, and the hint is worth remembering when the family tire of the rhubarb.

Peach leaves, scalded in the milk used for custards and creams, will give a decided pistachio flavor. Remove the leaves when milk reaches the boiling point.

AGAINST WOMEN'S POCKETS

New York Newspaper Gives Eight Reasons for Its Opposition to Proposed Move.

1. Because pockets are not a natural right.
2. Because the great majority of women do not want pockets. If they did, they would have them.
3. Because whenever women have had pockets they have not used them.
4. Because women are expected to carry enough things as it is without the additional burden of pockets.
5. Because it would make dissension between husband and wife as to whose pockets were to be filled.
6. Because it would destroy man's chivalry toward woman if he did not have to carry all her things in his pockets.
7. Because men are men and women the women. We must not fly in the face of nature.
8. Because pockets have been used by men to carry tobacco, pipes, whisky flasks, chewing gum and compromising letters. We see no reason to suppose that women would use them more wisely.—New York Tribune.

Followed Her Vanished Nest.

This story of a thrush that missed, and caught its train comes from Limavady, in Ulster, Ireland. The bird had built its nest under a first-class carriage immediately over the steam heating pipe, and notwithstanding that the carriage traveled between Limavady and Londonderry, the nest contained four eggs.

The institution of the summer service of trains caused trouble. The carriage left Londonderry in the evening at 4:40 instead of 4:50, and when the mother thrush, who had presumably been on a foraging expedition, returned, she found carriage, nest and eggs had disappeared. She was noticed at Londonderry in apparent distress, and the station master apprised Limavady of the circumstances and asked the railway people there to look out for the bird, suggesting that she would probably arrive by the next train. The bird duly arrived at Limavady either by train or air and resumed her task of hatching the eggs.

The sympathetic railway officials have decided to withdraw the carriage from service pending the hatching of the eggs.

Not Complimentary.

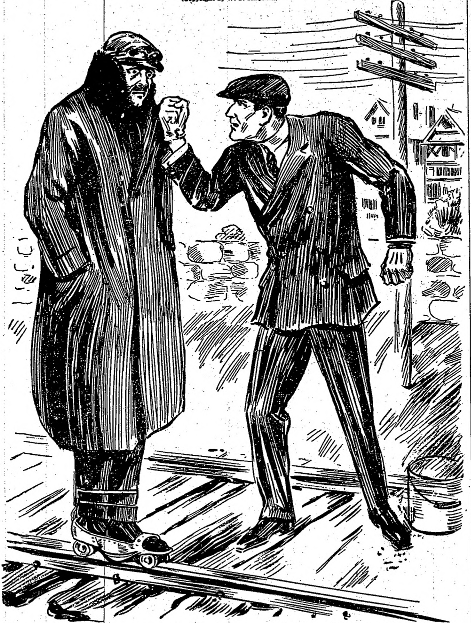
THE DEVIL CHAIR

A Chronicle of the Strange Adventures of John Haynes and His Gyroscope Vehicle

THE SHUNTED MAN OF EUROPE

By H. M. EGBERT

(Copyright by W. G. Chapman)



"YOU ROGUE," HE SHOUTED SUDDENLY, SHAKING HIS FIST UNDER THE OTHER'S NOSE, "I HAVE DONE PLAYING WITH YOU."

One by one the enemies of John Haynes were encountering retribution. Robbed of his vast lands in one of the western states by a gang of conspirators, torn from his wife and daughter, and railroaded into the penitentiary at Nokomis Falls, this Englishman, in the solitude of his cell, had conceived a scheme of revenge which should overwhelm all who had leagued themselves against him. He had invented, in the prison machine shop, a gyroscope wheel, which, when attached to any vehicle, afforded it unshakable stability and incredible speed. He had traveled a hundred and fifty miles an hour by automobile, a little more in an invalid's chair, while, by attaching to his foot a small replica of his invention and running along a single railroad line, he had achieved more than two hundred—more than three miles a minute.

One by one his enemies had died or disappeared. Sometimes there came no notice, sometimes a penciled warning on a morsel of notepaper. The last had been Judge Charteris, one of the Nokomis magnates, who had sentenced Haynes to the penitentiary in return for a share in his millions. Two days before his death Charteris had received the warning. He had called up his ally Hopkins, the chief conspirator, as soon as he received the threat, hired a special train, and within two hours set off for the west coast of America, in the vain hope of shaking off his relentless enemy. That night the train was held up by Haynes and sent crashing down a steep grade into the river, carrying, as was believed, the body of the Judge with it. In the babbling maniac who was found by the track and subsequently imprisoned for life in the State penal institution for the insane, the guards thought they had found the perpetrator of the crimes; they did not know that this creature was Charteris himself, a victim of Haynes' vengeance.

On the floor of Charteris' smoking room Edward Philemus Hopkins found the four written words which had driven his friend to his destiny.

Hopkins went home. On his hall table a letter lay, posted in Benderville. "Your turn comes next," was written on the enclosure and nothing more. The words and handwriting were identical with those found on the floor of the smoking room in Charteris' house, and, sick with horror, the man gazed at that fatal message. Hopkins was physically brave, but that nerve-racking terror which he had endured ever since the first of the gang came to his death proved too much for him. He was a widower; his married children had long since flown from the parental nest; there were no bonds or ties to keep him in Nokomis. He made arrangements for the disposal of his possessions, drew $20,000 out of the bank, and took the train eastward. He was not unmindful of Charteris' death, but to remain in Nokomis seemed still more dangerous. It was a choice of evils.

Contrary to his own expectations, he reached New York in safety. He registered at the Hotel Monroe under an assumed name. Next morning a special delivery letter was handed to him by the hotel clerk, and Hopkins knew, before he opened it, that his fate had found him. However, he had a respite, for the message said: "Go eastward."

Well, that had been his plan. He engaged a suite aboard the "Phoenix" and sailed for England. He fled from place to place, until, in London, he felt that he had shaken off his pursuers. He did not feel secure, however, until he had crossed the continent and thus placed another sea between himself and Haynes. From Paris he went to Rome, loitered awhile in Northern Italy, and returned leisurely through Germany to Spa, in Belgium, where he took the waters.

At Spa he made the acquaintance of a pleasant, mild-mannered Englishman named Greaves, and the two became intimate. Both had retired from business and both were seeking for relaxation in travel. Often they sat together in the Casino, watching the youngsters skating on rollers over the waxed boards—for this American sport had become the rage at the fashionable resort that year.

"Next year," said Greaves, one night, as he drew a package from his overcoat pocket, "this will be the rage." And he unwrapped the tissue paper and placed before his friend a curious little machine, something like a bicycle in miniature.

"What is it?" asked the other curiously.

"A foot velocipede," said Greaves. Strapped to the foot, it acts exactly upon the principle of the bicycle; and with it one can travel a vast distance without tiring. When this comes on the market the roller skate will have had its day. I am president of a company which has sole rights in the patent."

Edward Philemus Hopkins took the mechanism in his hands and looked at it curiously. He turned the wheels and watched them spin for nearly a minute before gradually ceasing to revolve. Between the wheels was a peculiar box-like arrangement, from which there came the faintest buzzing, such as a fly might make.

"And this is—" Hopkins asked.

"The motor. It is a miniature motor bicycle, although, of course, it can be used in the ordinary way. Upon the roads bearing traffic it can make almost incredible speed; but given the clear track of a private railroad line, then, of course, one could go very much faster."

Hopkins was thoroughly interested. "Yes, but who owns a private line?" he asked, laughing. "I should greatly like to try it some time," he added.

The other leaned forward and whispered in confidential tones.

"The truth is," he said, "I have made secret arrangements with the Government railways to permit me to make a test to-morrow between this city and Brussels. I have two pairs, and if you care to accompany me I shall be delighted to show you how the contrivance works. The story has been kept secret, but military men are, as you can imagine, thoroughly alert to see what possibilities may lie in the invention."

Hopkins accepted the invitation and arranged to meet his friend at seven o'clock the following morning at a grade crossing about a mile east of the city.

Greaves was waiting for him in his automobile when he drove up. Hopkins, having dismissed his cabman, greeted his friend; he was surprised to find him wrapped in an enormous, fur-lined overcoat, for it was a warm April morning.

"Traveling is apt to be pretty cold," said Greaves. "I am accustomed to it, but you—this overcoat is for yourself, sir."

In spite of his protests Greaves insisted in wrapping it around his shoulders. Weighted down with it, Hopkins could hardly move a step and he submitted with no good grace. However, he was curious to test the mechanism and resolved to make the best of his companion's whim. Having buttoned the coat, Greaves pulled from the bottom of the lining a stout tube of rubber, heavily wound with wire, which he attached to the mechanism. Then he bound it to Hopkin's right foot.

"Now cross your legs," he said. "How do you feel? Pretty comfortable? Now try to step off the metal."

Hopkins bent this way and that, but he was as fast as though he had been nailed to the line. He could bend his body or knees, but from knee to ankle he remained wholly perpendicular, and the muscular strain of returning his body to the plumb line which the lower part of his legs maintained was so severe that he abandoned further efforts to move.

"You see," said Greaves, "the mechanism is working although it is not at present connected with the running gear. Until it runs or is shut off you will be unable to detach your foot from the metal. But don't be alarmed—just place your hands in your overcoat pockets."

Hopkins obeyed; a steel trap snapped in each; he was securely handcuffed, his wrists caught in an easy, unbreakable grip. And then he understood that all his efforts had availed him nothing and that the blow had fallen.

John Haynes went back to the automobile and lifted out a five-gallon can of gasoline. Opening a fold in the back of Hopkin's overcoat, he poured the fluid into a hidden receptacle until the lower part of the garment bulged like a balloon.

"Yes, it is rather a weight," Haynes said ironically. "But you will hardly feel it, Mr. Hopkins, for your feet will carry you to your destination, and the personal effort will be practically nothing. Besides, the gasoline will act as a ballast and so enable you to enjoy greater speed than you might otherwise obtain, while also preventing you from injuring yourself by inconvenient movements. For instance, if you were to lose your balance irretrievably, you might perform the last few thousand miles of your journey with your head and heels horizontal."

Edward Philemus Hopkins stared up at the blue sky. A little cloud was floating overheard, a lark was rising from the ground, mounting skyward, pouring out her soul in a joyous melody. A few half incoherent words burst from between his lips and John Haynes inclined toward him to catch them.

"Fifty thousand dollars?" he echoed. "Not for the world, Hopkins. Not for all you have. You scoundrel," he cried, with a sudden outburst of fury, "do you think you can buy your miserable life when better rogues than you have paid the penalty for their treachery? What of the five years that I dragged out at Nokomis Falls? What of my wife and daughter torn from me when I was treacherously entrapped? Answer me that. No, it is no use to scream. Even if anybody were near to hear you, that would but rob you of a few more minutes of anticipation."

He paused and strove to recompose his features, which were distorted by the vehemence of his emotion.

"In the pursuit of my revenge," he continued, more calmly, "I have made it a principle of honor to let the punishment, as far as possible, fit the crime. There was Jack Poole, for instance. He it was who lured me into that fight in which I received a treacherous bullet wound. Jack Poole was not murdered by me, as you believe. He died by his own hand—the result of a new attempt at trickery. Then there was Judge Charteris, who sent me to a convict's cell. He is not dead, as you imagine, but is expiating his crimes in a penal institution under an assumed name, just as he sent me to suffer under an alias at Nokomis Falls. And you, Hopkins—you built your railroad from the proceeds of my stolen lands. You have made yourself rich on it; you have helped people to travel. And so I am going to send you traveling."

"What are you going to do with me?" implored the other. "Where am I to go?"

For answer Haynes drew from his pocket the early morning edition of the "Belguique." On the first page in huge, black lettering was a column of news, standing out prominently from the type in which the remainder of the page was printed.

"You do not read French, I believe, Hopkins?" asked Haynes. "I am sure you do not. Had you done so, you would have understood the warning which I penciled upon the outside of a letter of yours a few days ago, and would have taken yourself from Spa in the hope of eluding me. Well, listen!" He read:

"By special arrangement with the Belgian and Imperial German governments, Mr. Cyrus W. Walkenphast will demonstrate the practicability of his new 'railroad foot velocipede' by traveling from Spa to Bonn upon a single rail on the morning of April 15. A special line will be reserved for him, and he is expected to cover that distance at the rate of five and thirty miles an hour, arriving at his destination some time in the afternoon. In military circles the remarkable invention of this clever American, who is stated to own large railroad interests in his own country, is awaited with the utmost eagerness, and it is anticipated that large crowds will line the track throughout the greater part of the journey."

He folded up the newspaper and replaced it in his pocket. "You, my dear Hopkins, are Mr. Cyrus Walkenphast," he said.

"Then you are going to send me to Bonn?" asked the wretched man, feeling his hopes revive.

"I am going to send you toward Bonn," answered the other. But whether you ever get to Bonn appears to me to be gravely problematical. Let us hope not, for your own sake, since you will inevitably wreck the station, and there will not be much of yourself left to carry away.

"You rogue," he shouted suddenly, shaking his fist under the other's nose, "I have done playing with you. You have enough gasoline to carry you six thousand miles, for the consumption is extremely slow in my machine. You will run for six thousand miles at 200 miles an hour over the railroads of Europe—for thirty hours. You'll need that overcoat before you get through. Pray like the devil, Hopkins—pray for a clear road and no open switches."

Hopkins attempted no reply. He placed no faith in the wild statements of the other, whom he regarded as a madman. His confidence had been steadily rising; he felt assured now that this diabolical machine would carry him, at the most, a mile or two, until it ceased to work. Doubtless men by the roadway would effect his release. He masked his joy, lest the other discover it and change his scheme for one more diabolical.

Haynes stooped and touched the mechanism which controlled the gyroscope. The machine throbbed, pulled, leaped forward. Hopkins was out of sight in an instant.

It was not until Hopkins approached the German frontier that it became positively known that anything was wrong. For, to the crowds of amazed spectators who lined the track at every town and in each hamlet and to the gazing peasants in the fields, Hopkins was nothing but a passing flash—something that shot toward them out of the void distance at an incredible rate of speed, a blur that flashed over the line as a shadow of some passing bird, and vanished. His cries they thought were those of exultation. And so he passed.

But there is one human invention more swift than the gyroscope-driven wheel, and only one—except a rifle or cannon ball. That is the telegraph. As Hopkins shot across the German frontier one of the customs guards, who had spent a year in England, discovered that it was in agony and not for joy that he cried; so did one of the newspaper correspondents who were loitering near. And fifteen minutes later the afternoon editions of the central European papers were printing extra issues, detailing the amazing story of this mad American, the "new Frankenstein," as they termed him, who had fallen a victim to the infernal monster of his own invention.

The news was flashed from town to town. By three o'clock enormous crowds had gathered along the track for seven miles outside Bonn. But at the Ministry of the Interior a hasty consultation had been held. If "Walkenphast" ran into Bonn and could not stop he would run to destruction, for the rate at which he went would have driven him through the terminal with terrific force. And then, besides—and this was no small matter—there would be much damage to property. A hasty order, a few manipulations of the telegraphic keyboard—and the traveler, by virtue of a turned switch, was journeying toward Berlin.

Meanwhile, breathless, shocked by the terrific blasts that blew on him, trussed helplessly, the president of the Nokomis and Western Railroad went racing eastward. The physical pain was not as yet intolerable, for the gyroscope aided him to maintain his poise, and it was only necessary not to lean too far over, lest he should strain the aching muscles of his limbs. So he ran on and on, tearing through village and town, catching a momentary glimpse of crowds with white, terror-struck faces—then on and on once more, over the open fields, through woods and hills and swamps, borne on by the resistless force of that insatiable devil that drove him. He thanked heaven for that one mercy of the fur overcoat which Haynes had bestowed on him. But that had been a part of the man's scheme, in order that he might prolong the agony, for without it Hopkins would have been frozen stiff before the afternoon was over.

Now operators waited, finger on keyboard, to receive the news brought in by mounted men at every station. And it was ever the same. The mad American still journeyed eastward and his speed showed no sign of abating. Traffic was disorganized over all Prussia. The Minister of the Interior, without waiting to consult his colleagues, issued another order and a second switch was turned. He had meant to turn the flying man into the Hartz region, a sparsely settled district where the mechanism might wear itself out among the steep mountain grades. But in the confusion the wrong switch was turned, and the next news flashed over the wires was to the effect that "Cyrus Walkenphast" was approaching Munich.

More consultation; treachery now and competition among the line managers to turn the fugitive away and secure free passage for their stalled trains. Co-operation ceased; each played his own hand. Hopkins was sent zigzagging throughout South Germany, spinning from line to line, passing stalled trains on sidings and mobs of shouting men. Some of them kneeled to pray. Many thought him a messenger announcing the approach of the last Judgment. Finally, by a sudden consensus of individual plans, he was shunted out of Germany and into Austria, into Bohemia, into Galicia. There, on the vast Polish plains, night fell and shrouded him.

Night fell, but still he journey on. He was in Russia now, traveling the vast and almost boundless Steppes. Here the danger of encountering traffic was less, for the lines in the Czar's country were few, and every train was stalled until he passed. He was traveling in a northeasterly direction and there was nothing to do but let him journey on, for he could not have been stayed. The pains in his limbs had become almost unbearable, the east wind whistled through his fur overcoat, chilling and numbing him. At every gap between the separate rails the tiny jolt, at first unnoticed, threw him into agony. His back seemed to have been seared with red-hot pincers. Yet, if he gave way, if he allowed his exhausted muscles to rest, he would continue onward twisted like an acrobat or a man crucified. After a while the numbness almost overcame the sense of pain.

He longed for death now, craved for it as one in agony who, feeling its inevitable approach, welcomes the darkness with its merciful surcease of pain. The chilling winds bit him to the bone, his lids were heavy with sleep, and yet he dared not sleep, lest he lose his balance and fall, to awake twisting and writhing on those props of legs, made one with the terrible machine. The balloon-shaped swelling in the bottom of his overcoat had grown much smaller; still, not more than half the gasoline had been consumed, and only half the night was over when he rushed out of the darkness into a glare of lights. This was Moscow, where, in anticipation of his arrival a switch had been set to carry him eastward over the single track of the trans-Siberian railway. He heard the hoarse shout of the multitude. He heard the rhythmic chant of the priests who prayed for him. Even to Moscow the news had been telegraphed, and east of this, too, for in Nijni Novgorod thousands watched for the traveler who never arrived. Lights, lights, and always lights. They burned his eyeballs and seared his brain. Then Moscow was past, and now he was speeding through the forests again.

Wolves howled in his track, wild creatures sprang aside through thickets and undergrowth. And still he never paused. The gentle summit of the Ural Mountains hardly checked the velocity of his career. They were passed; he was in Asia, sweeping over the frozen plains, crossing broad forest belts when dawn showed in the sky.

When four and twenty hours had passed the man was nothing but an automaton. His face and lips dripped blood from the branding whips of the wind, his legs and feet, his hands and arms and throat were cold as marble and no less stiff. The muscles of his back, inured to their dreadful strain, had ossified, and as some Hindoo fakir holds his disabled arm aloft, stiff and immovable after it has been fastened in this position, through years of pain, so he rushed on, erect, unbending, a frozen statue, and consciouness only a flickering spark in the recesses of his brain.

The sun rose in the sky. Clouds flung their vast shadows across the plains, blushing with the first flowers of spring. Once a troop train, bound eastward, rolled out of the distance, and, shouting wildly, the terrified soldiers in the cars fired their rifles at him. But he was gone, a speck in the east, before the bullets fell.

Nothing could stay him now. If the gasoline held out he would rush on until he plunged, at Vladivostock, the end of the line, the end of Asia, into the cooling sea. He would die there, seven thousand miles from Spa, he who had paced the Casino only two nights before, secure in the belief that he had shaken off the grip of his implacable enemy. In his despair tears gushed from his eyes. Death faced him—he might die thus, traveling, and his frozen corpse would run on and on, while the lost soul went—whither?

He sought for an answer to his own question and could find none. His life had been heaped up with wickedness. He had plundered and robbed and feasted in the high places while his victims writhed under the wheel of the juggernaut of his greed. For the first time in twenty years he prayed for mercy, that some chance might be given him to live, to make atonement.

He was half way across Siberia. He had bounded the vast expanse of Baikal, shimmering in the noon sun, and now the country grew more settled. Scared, yellow faces peered at him from behind hedgerows. Men with pigtails and women who hobbled as they tried to run, screaming, from him, were seen. But in his new-born love for men he welcome the sight even of these; they were no longer aliens but brothers.

As a man remote from his body, that body which he could feel no longer, he found himself wondering how he had noticed these, when all had been but a blur. And suddenly a vivid thought leaped through his brain. He must be slacking speed. He tried to bend his head to look downward, but had no longer power over his stiffened muscles. Presently there was no longer doubt of it. The gyroscope was slackening. The gasoline was nearly exhausted and the fur coat flapped limply about his knees.

He went more slowly. Now he was traveling no faster than a quick train. The speed became that of a slow train, then of an automobile, a horse-drawn vehicle, a running man. And, with a rattling click, the machine stopped, and, finally halted. Then, the cohesive force withdrawn, it toppled from the line.

Edward Philemus Hopkins fell to the ground as a statue falls, in the center of a Chinese hamlet. When he was raised the men who carried him held him as they might have carried an arm of a tree.

There is a famous mission school today in Kiakhta, the fame of which has spread far south among the yellow people of China, and far north among the wandering Siberian tribes. It is the work of one man who built and endowed it. An American, he will never visit America again—for though the mind is vigorous and alert, and the white face, strangely rigid, has come to reflect the innate nobleness of the soul, this man is nothing but a soul and mind, and the body is as inert as marble.

Policeman Is Taken Prisoner by a Lively Cow

CLEVELAND, OHIO.—A big spotted cow with regulation crumpled horns and a determined cast of countenance captured Patrolman Chambers of the Detroit avenue station the other day and bound him so tightly that it required the united efforts of every person living in Neil terrace, West Eighty-ninth street and Detroit avenue, to free him. Then she started off down the street with him hanging to the end of a chain and flopping like the tail of a kite.

At the "moolngs" of the cow and the yells of Chambers all the men at the Detroit avenue station rushed out and managed to corral her in Andrew Hartwell's livery stable. As the door slammed on her, Chambers drew a long breath and began to take inventory of the three hundred odd bones in his anatomy.

"Strange," he muttered in a dazed voice. "I was sure some of them must be broken."

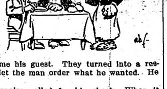
The cow, which belongs to W. H. Ford, tired of her pasture and started to hunt a new one early in the morning. She pulled up the stake to which her chain was attached and started. At the Neil terrace the green lawn of the court attracted her and she tarried long enough to get all tangled up in the chain. Her half-strangled groans and "moolngs" awoke every one in the terrace and someone called Patrolman Chambers. With soft words he tried to calm the frightened cow, but failed. She caught him between a tree and herself and proceeded to wind the chain around him.

The cow then decided to investigate Detroit avenue to the eastward and she took Chambers along. Through lawns and over flower beds she went until the station house was reached at about seven o'clock. The day and night forces were just changing and between the two Chambers' prisoner was subdued.

Buys Meal for a Wayfarer; Lacks Cash to Pay

NEW YORK.—A story is being told of an experience of a wealthy bachelor, a member of a very old New York family, who takes a great deal of interest in charitable work, and who does a lot of investigating on his own account.

Some time ago he was walking on one of the streets of the lowest East side when he was accosted by a wayfarer whose whole appearance indicated the depths of misfortune and misery. The tramp said he wanted the price of something to eat. The millionaire looked him over.



NONE O' THAT STUFF GOES HERE

"I won't give you any money," he said, "but I'll be glad to buy you a good square meal."

The millionaire was very plainly dressed, and the other, after looking him regretfully over, agreed to become his guest. They turned into a restaurant in the vicinity, and the host let the man order what he wanted. He himself ordered a meal and ate.

When it was finished, the millionaire called for his check. When it came, he felt in his pockets. Not a cent did he have. It was an embarrassing moment, but he sought to explain to the waiter.

"None o' that stuff goes here; we got too much o' that kind of conversation," the attendant informed him. "You pays that check—see!"

The man from uptown called for the manager, and sought to explain the situation, but the manager, too, happened to be from Missouri.

When the millionaire was arguing with the manager, and protesting that he would pay the bill if time was given him, he was surprised by a loud guffaw from the tramp across the table.

"Bo," cried that worthy, leaning over and putting out his hand, "you certainly put one over on me. I never knew anybody could fool me like that. Why, I had no idea you were one of us. I'll pay the check," and he did.

House Lined With Honey Found in Southern City

MOBILE, ALA.—Mobile has a real, sure-enough "honey" residence. It is at the corner of Kentucky and Marine streets, and carpenters say that the walls are practically interlined with honey. Several weeks ago the flooring in the attic of the building, now occupied by Mr. and Mrs. B. H. Gray, and owned by Mrs. Annie B. Fields, began to show unmistakable signs of rotting, although it was far from the ground. Before the floor was taken up, honey began to appear through the boards, and despite efforts to mop the sticky stuff up, it continued to appear.

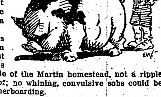
NOW WE'LL HAVE SOME REAL HONEY

Mrs. Fields was notified and after being told about the honey she recalled that about five years ago while she was living in the house she had a large flower garden in the yard and that it attracted a colony of bees to the place.

When the flowers were removed the bees also disappeared. The honeymakers had discovered an abandoned water spout and through this they gained access to the walls and beneath the weatherboarding they proceeded to make pound after pound of honey.

Mastodon Hog Weighs 1,000 Pounds on the Hoof

BALTIMORE, MD.—One hog, 1,000 pounds on the hoof. H. F. Martin of Hampstead, in the Fifteenth district of Baltimore county, sold an animal of this weight, says the Sun, to H. F. Sharrer, a butcher of Hempstead. It was five years old. Facially and by several other characteristics, it looked like the verisimilitude of the swine tribe, but it had the bulk of a horse—of a large horse. Seeing it move across the field on a moonless night gave one the apprehension that the banshees or fairies were moving a haystack.



Only now that the western winds have come along does Farmer Martin realize the invaluable boon he lost when he parted with the colossus puerco. Staked on the windward side of the Martin homestead, not a ripple of air could reach the unrepaired roof; no whining, convulsive sobs could be wrung from the free and easy weatherboarding.

It might have been that C. P., hog, pig, swine—call it what you will, for there doesn't seem to be any Latin or Dacian designation adequate to embrace the animal's massivity and projection into the circumambient atmosphere—as before said, perhaps it was because the animal's appetite was built along the lines of its displacement or because of the luring offer of nine cents a pound "dressed," that Mr. Martin sold it—at any rate, Mr. Sharrer got the hog.

The carcass dressed down to 798 pounds net, for which Mr. Martin received the monetary equivalent of $71.82.

SAYS NATIONAL GUARD IS WELL EQUIPPED

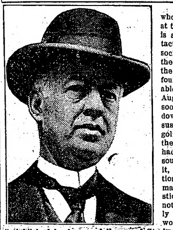
© HARRIS & EWING

"The national guard," said Gen. Alfred Leopold Mills, "has never been better equipped or better trained or better officered for service than it is today."

Which may be an important factor in the present situation if the states' militia should be called on for action. General Mills' statement may be taken as fairly representing the situation. In the first place, General Mills knows. He is the head of the division of militia affairs at the war department and as such would have charge of the transfer of the militia to the service of the national government. In the second place, Mills wouldn't say it if it were not true. His specialty is seeing—and saying—the truth.

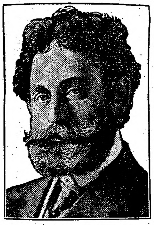
Mills is the man who reformed West Point. Before his day there as superintendent the cadets were treated like prisoners, fed upon theory and clothed in uniforms that fitted like the skin of a mushroom. If a regiment of West Point cadets had ever charged an enemy, the sound of popping seams would have been heard above the rattle of musketry. They knew a great deal about the manner in which Napoleon was whipped at Waterloo, but they didn't know how Geronimo used to lie behind a rock in order to pot soldiers. Mills changed all that.

JUSTICE JOSEPH RUCKER LAMAR



Justice Joseph Rucker Lamar, who was recently appointed mediator at the Niagara Falls peace conference, is accepted by all who come in contact with the Supreme court, or the social life in Washington, as one of the most delightful personalities on the highest bench. President Taft found him to be the most companionable of men when he was visiting in Augusta, Lamar's home city. A story soon started, and has not yet been downed, that President Taft, who was suspected of being anxious to form a golf cabinet in Washington, matching the "Tennis Cabinet" of a former era, had known Lamar on the links in the southern city. But the justice denied it, and, by way of making his assertion believed, capped it with the remark that he had never had a golf stick in his hands in his life. It may not be legal evidence, but it is strongly circumstantial, that the justice would not have called a golf club a "stick" had he been a follower of St. Andrew. As a matter of fact, Lamar has no recreations of this sort. He is one of those southern men who are able to keep most warmly human, without doing anything that is patently human, such as golf, or being a baseball "fan." His only recreation is companionship with others, and scholarly pursuits. Of course, he was a judge down in Georgia, as all Lamars who follow the law must be; but he was not on the bench when Taft offered him the nomination. Just then, as he says himself, he was "specializing in general practise." Down South that phrase means much, from important corporation practise to speaking a word in police court for Aunt Mandy's "wuthless son," who may have got into a scrape, "but he ain't mean no harm, Mas'r Joe."

SENATOR LEWIS CALLS A HALT



"It is not a high type of intelligence which mistakes civility for servility."

Thus Senator James Hamilton Lewis of Illinois, bored and perhaps made a little indignant by what appears to him in his less cheerful moments to be a persistent habit on the part of undiscerning persons to sum up his extremely useful and varied career in a few parrotlike comments upon his dress and his appearance.

"My beard," said the senator, "if you will pardon my reference to an intimate personal matter, has been described as a remarkable work of nature, as a hirsute forest bristling with sparks of fire, and as an ambrosial chest protector. I have been called the Aurora Borealis of Illinois, the Pink-Whiskered Prodigy, the Man Who Made Whiskers a Political Asset, the Pink-Fringed Political Expert. Many a home has been built, many a family thrives upon the steady and apparently rising market value of jests about my clothes and my manners.

"Now, my dear fellow," concluded the senator, "I am glad to contribute to the prosperity of the country by having my superficial peculiarities furnish material for the struggling efforts of the budding geniuses of journalism; but I have done my share, and it is time that our experimental literary citizens should turn their attention to the gentleman who, so the newspapers tell us, has discovered a method of breeding blue pigs, or to the inventor of the noiseless hammer."

WAS BORN IN PRUSSIA

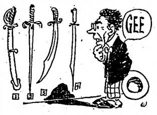
F. W. Lehmann, one of Uncle Sam's mediators at the Niagara Falls peace conference, was born in Prussia, and spent his boyhood days in the fields of his father's farm in Prussia, tending a small flock of sheep. Before the boy was ten years of age the family moved to this country and settled in Cincinnati.

Lehmann ran away from home and tramped several states, specializing in chores as a business, and went to Nebraska. There he tended sheep again, but shepherding for the great sheepmen of the West and watching a flock on the Prussian farm were different jobs. Lehmann was not interested in his task, and neglected his charges in the interests of reading. Sterling Morton, father of Paul Morton, took Lehmann away from sheep and put him among books in Tabor college, Iowa, which he quit with honors and a degree in 1873. The rest of Lehmann's story is just one rise after another. In St. Louis they tell you that Lehmann is one of the best lawyers in the country, and then add that his mind is more literary than legal.

NATIONAL CAPITAL AFFAIRS

Rare Assortment of Swords in National Museum

WASHINGTON.—The sword collection in the National museum, comprising some 180 pieces, proves perhaps of greater general interest than any other of the many extensive exhibits. It not only covers a long period of history but shows the development of the sword as a weapon and as a badge of rank and office.



One good-sized collection, turned over to the museum by the war department some years ago, is representative of all branches of the war service for the different periods in United States history, and includes also several foreign naval and military types. By comparison, it is seen that the types changed all over the world every ten or twenty years, a feature no doubt resulting from the contact brought about by wars as well as following peace regulations.

In the ethnological division of the new building there is an instructive exhibit of swords and cutlery which forms part of the George Kennan collection, and includes Turkish and Arabian yataghans, two Russian swords, a Scotch dirk, a Crusader's sword, and a sample of two-handed weapon dated 1710. In the Mason family collection, lent to the museum by Mrs. Julian James, there are several American swords, bayonets and cutlasses, besides many implements from Japan, China, Turkey and North Africa.

Two other notable collections are the deposits of the late Dr. Charles W. Hickman of Augusta, Ga., and Capt. J. R. R. Hannay, U. S. A., which include 70 weapons of exceptional rarity. Other collections pertain to the native weapons of the Philippines, Cuba and Porto Rico.

Among the individual exhibits are numerous swords connected with important epochs in American history. The earliest types are those of the Revolution, particularly those which were presented by the Continental congress to John Hancock and Col. Return Jonathan Meigs; a service sword of Gen. Peter Gansevoort, Jr., and another engraved "The Sword of Rochambeau;" a cutlass from the Bonhomme Richard, presented to Lieut. James B. Safford in 1784, and several swords of the period, the ownership of which is not established.

Do Senators and Congressmen Like Applause?

SOME wag recently posted up in the halls of congress a card that had evidently been used in a moving picture show. Visitors were astounded to read on going into the galleries a noticed marked "Information: Please applaud any act that you like, as this not only stimulates the performer, but gives the management an idea of the particular kind of vaudeville you most enjoy. Please report any discourtesy on the part of employes to manager and their services will be promptly dispensed with."

INFORMATION
PLEASE APPLAUD ANY ACT THAT YOU LIKE AS THIS STIMULATES HAW

There was a good deal of tittering before an attendant spied the card and hastily removed it. A senator who heard of the joke declared that it was a pity to spoil the fun, for the card was only an indication of the frank way Americans have of expressing themselves. A great many believe that the progress of culture means the repression of suggestions that under ordinary circumstances would be frankly made. "The actors on the stage seek applause," continued the senator, "why then not frankly admit that they like it, and ask the audience to stir themselves now and then? There is never a time in debate when a congressman or senator who is speaking is not consciously pleased when the galleries applaud or burst into laughter despite the rap of the gavel and the admonition of the speaker, 'If the noise does not cease, the galleries will be cleared.'" Of course, playing to the galleries in congress is expressly prohibited, but who would dare to say that it is not practised assiduously by a large proportion of the men in public life.

Girls in Printing Bureau Must All Be Healthy

HORSE power! That's what they have to have—those girls who work as printers' assistants. And horse power is what we would make a requirement of their appointment. It's no use putting a race-horse to draw a truck.

NOW CARRY THAT IRON WEIGHT 10 TIMES AROUND TH' ROOM
100 LBS

"It's hard work to be a printer's assistant; a severe physical stress is upon the workers. If they are not healthy and strong—well, the work is too much for them."

Director Ralph of the bureau of engraving and printing made this exposition of his point of view in explaining the investigation undertaken by Dr. Benjamin S. Warren of the public health service. A physical examination, rigid enough to determine the fitness of applicants for the labor required of them as printers' assistants, it is expected, will be directed as part of the civil service requirements. It is brawn, not brains, that the labor demands.

There are 500 printers' assistants employed in the bureau. Most of them are physically capable, and the investigation is not especially aimed at present conditions, but to insure that future appointments shall be of the right metal in the matter of strength and endurance. The girls are on their feet throughout the hours of the work day, and the strain is severe when there is not bodily fitness.

Youth Dips Into Fountain on a Two-Dollar Bet

A MEMBER of the Western High school housed at the Franklin school is endeavoring to collect a wager from his schoolmates, won at noon recess the other day. The youngster, said to be the son of a prominent Washington banker, is not only trying to collect the wager, but is endeavoring to elude the watchful eye of the park policeman. It all happened in this way. Gathered around the stands in course of erection for the Barry memorial statue ceremony, several boys were eating lunch.

"For two bits," said one boy, "I'd dive into the fountain."

"You're on," cried half a dozen voices.

"Bet you two beans you won't," said a reckless wagerer who was a member of the party.

"Nothing to it," returned the youth challenged.

Stepping upon the concrete rim of the fountain, the youth stood poised for a second, and with a graceful Annette Kellerman dive performed the "Australian splosh" into the water.

Whoops and shouts attracted attention as the youth emerged in the center of the pool and made his way to the edge. In less than a second's time the youngster made his way across the park, scared, soaking wet, but entirely successful in accomplishing the stunt.

Just how he managed to explain his condition or successfully elude detection is not known, but a frightened youngster is today trying to collect his bet and avoid the publicity which usually accompanies such stunts.

ACTION OF HOUSE ENDS TOLLS FIGHT

BILL ONLY AWAITS SIGNATURE OF PRESIDENT WILSON TO BE EFFECTIVE.

ACCEPT SENATE AMENDMENT

By a Vote of 216 to 71 Lower Body Concurs After Final Debate Marked by Strong Feeling.

Washington, June 15.—Only President Wilson's signature is necessary to repeal the clause of the Panama canal act exempting American coastwise shipping from tolls.

House Ends Fight.

The long and bitter fight in congress came to an end when the house, after brief debate, and without the formality of a conference, accepted by a vote of 216 to 71 the senate amendment specifically reserving all rights the United States may have under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty or otherwise.

The president is expected to sign the measure at once. It was just a little more than three months ago that he addressed the house and senate in joint session, urgently asking for repeal of the exemption clause that the nation might keep its treaty obligations.

Bill Sent to Wilson.

Speaker Clark and Vice President Marshall attached their signatures and sent the bill to the White House.

Before ending the contest by concurring in the senate amendment the house voted down, 174 to 108, a proposal advanced by Representative Moss of West Virginia, to attach to the repeal a flat declaration of the right of the United States to exempt its vessels from tolls and of the sovereignty of the United States over the canal zone.

During the discussion there were flashes of heat in the debate which characterized the original consideration of the measure. Representative Underwood, Democratic leader, although voting for the senate amendment, said that congress should never have made this "un-American surrender" and called the amendment "ineffective and negative."

Mann Likes Amendment.

Republican Leader Mann, who had vigorously opposed repeal, supported the amendment, declaring it left the entire question of the rights of this country to be determined in the future.

Representative Glass of Virginia attacked the Democratic leaders who opposed the measure. He denounced the "outrageous assaults made on the president" by the Republicans and expressed indignation "at the leaders of the Democratic side who have aspersed their own colleagues because they would not follow them into the camp of the Republican party in advocacy of a Republican doctrine."

Twenty Democrats voted against the motion to concur in the senate amendment. Thirty-seven Republicans and three Progressives joined the Democrats in support of the motion.

SUICIDE IS THEORY NOW

Man Who Saw Ella G. Winter, Baltimore Girl, Last Gives This Clue.

Baltimore, Md., June 15.—While no clue was obtained by investigation of county officers into the circumstances surrounding the death of Ella G. Winter, whose body was found late Monday in Curtis Creek, D. Meredith Reese, Jr., the last person known to have seen the girl alive, expressed the belief that she committed suicide.

Two women friends of Miss Winter also made statements in support of the suicide theory.

Reese previously had declared several times that he knew of no reason why Miss Winter should take her life. Now, however, he says that she more than once had threatened to commit suicide. His desire to protect the girl and her family, he said, caused him to refrain from advancing the suicide theory before.

Car Overturns; Girls Hurt.

Paris, Ill., June 13.— An automobile driven by Miss Lola Miller crashed over a 20-foot embankment, probably fatally injuring Miss Miller and Hazel Lowther and seriously injuring three other women. The automobile overturned, pinning four of the young women down. Miss Green was thrown clear of the wreck. She walked a quarter of a mile for assistance, but could find no men and neighboring women lifted the car from the victims.

Twenty Deaths in Pittsburgh.

Pittsburgh, June 12.—Sixteen deaths due directly to heat prostration and four to drowning is the toll of western Pennsylvania to the torrid wave.

Colonel Roosevelt Leaves Spain.

Madrid, June 13.—After a strenuous day beginning with a visit to the Museo Del Prado and including the events connected with the marriage of his son, ex-President Roosevelt left for Paris. The colonel at the dance which followed the wedding stepped the Virginia reel with Senora Dato, wife of the premier. On account of the hostile attitude of the Spanish papers detectives continued to guard the embassy and were at the station when the ex-president departed.

CABINET MEMBERS JUBILANT

FAIRLY RADIATE HAPPINESS OVER PEACE PROSPECTS.

Even President Wilson Breaks Long Silence and Declares Outlook Encouraging.

Washington, June 15.—The Washington government was so optimistic over the prospects for the success of mediation in the Mexican imbroglio that members of the cabinet fairly radiated jubilation when they left the White House after a conference with the president.

President Wilson broke his long and patient silence on the subject by authorizing the declaration that the outlook for mediation was very encouraging. Not a word on the subject has come from the chief executive for many weeks.

Secretary Bryan was so enthused over the outlook for peace that he laughed with newspaper men and cabinet members as they tarried outside the executive offices. The secretary of state and Secretary Daniels traded yarns as they patted each other on the shoulder, and when pressed for more serious matters they declared that the Mexican situation was looking very hopeful from the viewpoint of the United States.

Later in the day Secretary Bryan verified reports from Niagara Falls that the Huerta delegates and representatives of the United States had had an agreement on the means by which the transmission of authority in Mexico should be conducted from Huerta to the proposed provisional government. The secretary said he did not recall the exact wording of the tentative agreement, but that a conclusion upon this first point in dispute had been reached.

Mr. Bryan declined, however, to reveal the details of the method proposed, stating that he had no authority to speak for the mediators in the first place, and secondly that he thought it unwise to make public part of an agreement until the whole plan had been determined.

General Carranza's latest note, forwarded by mail to Niagara Falls, announcing his decision to send representatives to the mediation conference, was subject of most interest at the cabinet meeting and in other official quarters here. The White House learned early in the day of this decision on the part of Carranza, learning also that the Constitutionalist chief, in reaching this decision, adhered strictly to his attitude that an armistice in the campaign against Huerta should not be required. It was also learned that the note makes no mention of any other terms upon which the Constitutionalist representatives should participate in the peace conference.

Word from Niagara Falls that the mediators would not officially receive into the conference the Carranza delegates unless they should agree to an armistice, threw no damper on the enthusiasm of Washington government officials or their hopes for ultimate peace. There were again made in official quarters references to the suggestion that Carranza's agents could be unofficially welcomed by the American and Huerta delegates to discuss plans of settlement upon which a way might be found for all to meet later before the mediators and a protocol eventually signed by the representatives of the United States, General Huerta and the Constitutionalists.

LIGHTNING HITS BIG BALLOON

Message Saying Pilot is Hurt but Giving No Details Sent By Carrier Pigeon.

Portland, Ore., June 15.—One brief message telling of disaster to the balloon Million Population Club, is the only word received from three of the balloons that started here in a race under the auspices of the Aero Club of America. Of the fate of the Kansas City III. and the Springfield there was an ominous silence. The other balloon in the race, the Uncle Sam was wrecked in a thunder storm.

On the wings of a white carrier pigeon was brought this laconic message from the Million Population club:

"Balloon struck by lightning. Berry hurt. Come quick.

(signed) "MORRISON."

The message was written by George Y. Morrison, probably while he was in a daze, for he failed to give his location. His companion was Captain John Berry, of St. Louis, the pilot.

Every effort possible is being put forth to find the Million Population club and the other two unreported balloons.

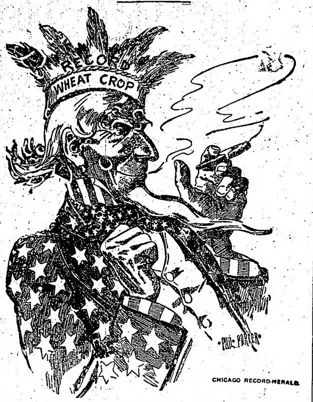
First Wheat Shipped.

Ponca City, Okla., June 15.—What is believed to be the first car of wheat of the new crop to be shipped from the big wheat country of Oklahoma left Dodock, a station south of here. The car was consigned to a Chicago firm.

Eruption Near Mt. Lassen's Peak.

Redding, Cal., June 15.—The fourth and greatest eruption of steam and smoke from the new opening near the peak of Mount Lassen at the foot of the Shasta range has just occurred. The smoke column reached an estimated height of 2,500 feet. The first outbreak at Lassen occurred May 30 and broke a hole in the side of the mountain near the peak. A second somewhat larger occurred June 1 and a third June 8. None approximated the magnitude of this latest.

900,000,000 BUSHELS!



CHICAGO RECORD-HERALD.

WOMEN ENDORSE FIGHT FOR BALLOT

FEDERATED CLUBS SUCCEED IN GIVING SUPPORT TO EQUAL SUFFRAGE.

MANY CRY WITH EMOTION

Resolutions Which Broke Down Constitutional Bar of Years Is Adopted Amid Stirring Scene—Much Opposition.

Chicago, June 15.—The principle of woman's suffrage was endorsed here by the General Federation of Women's Clubs. By this action a twenty years' fight by the suffragists to break down the federation constitutional bar on political and religious subjects was successful. The motion was made by Mrs. E. G. Denniston, of San Francisco, chairman of the resolutions committee.

Rush to Second.

There were seconds from all over the house, but Mrs. James Lee, of Kentucky, insisted on being heard and read a paragraph of the hymnlike woman's creed. Others would have spoken, but Miss Lutie E. Stearns, of Milwaukee, objected.

"I don't see why there should be any discussion," she said in a voice that shook with emotion. "Eight million women are waiting for us. As Mrs. Carrie Chapman Catt said in her wonderful address, the women of the world are waiting for our action."

When the question was put there was a chorus of "ayes," but scattered negatives were plainly heard when Mrs. Percy V. Pennybacker declared the motion carried.

Tears of Emotion.

There were tears of emotion in many eyes. Then in a distant gallery to which the Illinois delegation as hostess had consigned itself, the women raised their voices above the tumult in the "Battle Hymn of the Republic."

The refrain, "Glory, Glory, Hallelujah," was taken up in various sections of the auditorium.

This is the resolution:

"Whereas, the question of political equality of men and women is today a vital problem under discussion throughout the civilized world;

"Resolved, That the General Federation of Women's Clubs give the cause of political equality its moral support by recording its earnest belief in the principle of political equality, regardless of sex."

Wanted—Men to Fill Jobs.

Washington, June 15. —Predicting that within a month's time there will be more jobs in the United States than men, Secretary of Labor Wilson hopes to solve the problem of getting men to fill the places. His forecast is based upon the bumper wheat crop, revival of the iron trade, mining and the textile industry. The secretary already has received requests for more than 80,000 laborers in the wheat belt of the West and South and he plans to arrange with the railroads special excursions.

May Head Reserve Board.

Washington, June 13.—Thomas B. Jones, a Chicago lawyer, former member of the Princeton university trustees and a personal friend of President Wilson, has practically been selected for governor of the federal reserve board. It was said unofficially that his nomination would go to the senate Monday. The other members of the board are likely to be Paul M. Warburg of New York, W. P. G. Harding of Birmingham, Ala., A. C. Miller of San Francisco and E. C. Simmons of St. Louis.

DRAMATIC ACT OF MILITANTS

EXPLODE BOMB AS PARLIAMENT DISCUSSES THEM.

Westminster Abbey Visitors Panic Stricken by Detonation—Part of Coronation Chair Ripped Off.

London, June 13.—The militant suffragettes staged one of the most dramatic acts of their campaign when they exploded a bomb in Westminster Abbey at the very moment that the Right Hon. Reginald McKenna, secretary of state for home affairs, was delivering an optimistic speech in the house of commons nearby regarding the government's method of dealing with "the wild women."

The bomb was placed beside the famous coronation chair in Edward the Confessor's chapel.

Although it did little damage, like previous attempts at destruction of the same kind, its report penetrated to the chamber of the house, interrupting Mr. McKenna's oration and bringing some of the members into the street to learn what had happened.

The detonation was heard for many blocks and a crowd quickly filled the square in front of the abbey. But the police immediately closed all the doors.

A statement issued by Scotland Yard gives the facts in most conservative form.

"At 5 o'clock," says the statement, "a small bomb was exploded in immediate proximity to the coronation chair. It is supposed that some members of a large party of sightseers lagged behind the rest and deposited the bomb when the others had left the chapel.

"Fortunately, the damage done was slight. A portion of the carved back of the chair was blown off and some of the stone carving of the screen of the great altar was damaged apparently by some iron nuts contained in the bomb.

"The bomb, of thin metal, nickel plated, was exploded by a fuse. A woman's feather boa, a guide book and a small black silk bag were on a chair nearby. No material damage has been done as happily the pieces blown off can be put together again. The police are making inquiries in conjunction with his majesty's inspector of explosives."

A hundred or more visitors, divided into small parties, were being conducted by vergers about the abbey when a sudden flash, like lightning, penetrated every corner. A sharp detonation set the women to screaming and running for the doors. Some said afterwards that the report was deafening.

STEAMER AND 24 MISSING

Halifax, N. S., June 13.—It is reported that the government steamer Montmagny is missing and it is feared all on board have been lost.

Word was received here that the marine department at Ottawa had sent orders to all marine signal stations in the lower St. Lawrence and the gulf to try to obtain tidings of the Montmagny. The steamer, with a crew of 24 men aboard, has not been seen or heard from since she coaled at Cape Race several days ago.

1,400 More Men Walk Out.

Pittsburg, Pa., June 15.—The strike of the members of the Allegheny Congenial Industrial union, which began last Friday with the walkout of 10,000 employes of the Westinghouse Electric and Manufacturing company, the Westinghouse Machine company, and the Pittsburg Meter company, has spread to the plant of the Union Switch and Signal company at Swissvale. Between 1,100 and 1,400 employes of the Switch and Signal company, which is one of the so-called Westinghouse industries, walked out.

GREAT DIPLOMATIC STRUGGLE SHAPING

MEDIATORS AT NIAGARA FALLS FACE BIGGEST OBSTACLE TO PEACE.

MUST NOW SELECT PRESIDENT

United States Declares Its Stand for Man Favorable to Rebels—Stated Position at Very Outset of Conference, It Is Learned.

Niagara Falls, Ont., June 16.—It is apparent that things are making for a great struggle in diplomacy between the United States and the Huerta government here during the coming week.

Most Important Factor.

While mediation has passed safely over many obstacles so far, the factor on which peace most depends—the selection of a provisional president acceptable to all factions—has brought the entire mediation body to a realization that ultimately on this mediation will succeed or fail. Many names have been suggested, but thus far none has been found suitable. The discussion of names will likely continue for several days.

There is no longer any doubt in the minds of the mediators or Mexican delegates that the American government believes the only solution of the present tangle is to place the executive power in the hands of a broad-minded Constitutionalist through a peaceful negotiation rather than to have the inevitable occur, military conquest of Mexico City with the possibility of international complications through injuries to foreigners.

Position of U. S. Revealed.

In the last few days alone has the American government's position been revealed publicly, but on the highest authority it has become known that the United States informed the mediators in unequivocal language at the very outset that it contemplated favoring a Constitutionalist for provisional president.

If Huerta delegates were not informed of this it was because the mediators thought they might dissuade the American delegates from their purpose.

The American plan finally submitted in writing to the mediators was the embodiment of what the American delegates on instruction from Washington had said in formal conversation in the two weeks prior to the presentation of their proposals.

FIRST PRIZE TO BE $100,000

Tentative Rules are Announced for Airship Race Around the World.

New York, June 16.—The tentative rules and regulations for the Panama-Pacific International Exposition Round the World Aerial race, as prepared by Guy T. Slaughter, president of the Pacific Aero club, have just been given out here.

Under the proposed rules and regulations, $150,000 will be offered by the exposition as prizes and an endeavor will be made to raise an additional $150,000 from cities over which the course of the race will lie and from individuals, which also will be given as prizes.

To the competitor finishing within 121 days from the start of the race $100,000 will be awarded. In case the first arrival in the race fails to reach the finish line within the 121 days, but does finish before Dec. 4, the first prize will be reduced by $1,000 per day for each day over the 121 days.

The race will start from the Panama-Pacifis exposition grounds, San Francisco, May 15, 1915, and must be completed before noon of Dec. 4, 1915. The course will be eastward around the world.

Mexican Naval Heroes Rewarded.

Washington, June 15.—Officers and men among the American bluejackets and marines who distinguished themselves by conspicuous bravery and heroism at Vera Cruz, were formally recognized and rewarded Sunday by the navy department. Every one of the 107 singled out for mention in Rear Admiral Fletcher's reports of the occupation of the Mexican port was given official commendation in a letter from Secretary Daniels, bringing word in most cases of medals, gratuities or promotions.

Zeppelin Wrecked; One Hurt.

Diedenhoffen, Germany, June 15.—Another of the Zeppelin airships of the Germany army, the "Z 1," was badly wrecked near here. While trying to effect a landing in a rain storm, the cruiser broke at right angles behind the rear gondola. A lieutenant was injured. The accident occurred during a flight from Cologne to Metz.

Sun Turns "Fire-Bug."

Sioux Falls, S. D., June 15.—The sun's rays shining through a window glass and being focused upon some matches lying on a table ignited the matches and caused a heavy loss to Mr. and Mrs. T. G. Felton, well known residents on a Tripp county homestead. Before the blaze was discovered by one of the little girls of the household it had gained considerable headway. The flames had spread to all parts of the building, and the structure was completely destroyed, together with all its contents.

HOW WOMEN AVOID OPERATIONS

By Taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

Cleveland, Ohio—"My left side pained me so for several years that I expected to have to undergo an operation, but the first bottle I took of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound relieved me of the pains in my side and I continued its use until I became regular and free from pains. I had asked several doctors if there was anything I could take to help me and they said there was nothing that they knew of. I am thankful for such a good medicine and will always give it the highest praise."—Mrs. C. H. GRIFFITH, 7305 Madison Ave., Cleveland, Ohio.

Hanover, Pa.—"I suffered from female trouble and the pains were so bad at times that I could not sit down. The doctor advised a severe operation but my husband got me Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and I experienced great relief in a short time. Now I feel like a new person and can do a hard day's work and not mind it. What joy and happiness it is to be well once more. I am always ready and willing to speak a good word for the Compound."—Mrs. ADA WILT, 196 Stock St., Hanover, Pa.

If there are any complications you do not understand write to Lydia E. Pinkham Medicine Co. (confidential) Lynn, Mass. Your letter will be opened, read and answered by a woman and held in strict confidence.

Wanted to See Novelty.

A little girl's uncle wrote her a letter, using a "script" typewriter, the letters of which were joined as those in ordinary handwriting. The little girl noticed the difference between this type and that more generally used, with interest.

"Oh, uncle, uncle," she cried, upon her next visit to his office, "I want to see the typewriter that writes words intead of letters!"

Saved.

The chief Powhatan was about to pulverize Mr. John Smith when a shriek rent the air and Pocahontas stood beside them.

"Stay!" she commanded.

"Ah!" exclaimed Smith, who was noted for his fertility in resource, "you are the first I ever loved."

Pocahontas was just graduated and believed everything she heard, and so they were married.

Worst Yet to Come.

"I hate to leave the old place," remarked Adam as he turned from the Garden to Eden. "Leaving isn't the worst of it," replied Eve. "Think of the trouble you're going to have when you get to telling of the animals and rivers in this place to the explorers and geographical experts over yonder."—Washington Star.

Stationery Talk.

"I like your address," said the postage-stamp to the envelope.

"If it were not for my address I don't suppose you would be stuck on me," replied the envelope.

EYE STRAIN
Relieved by Quitting Coffee.

Many cases of defective vision are caused by the habitual use of coffee.

It is said that in Arabia where coffee is used in large quantities, many lose their eyesight at about fifty. Tea contains the same drug, caffeine, as coffee.

A N. J. woman writes to the point concerning eye trouble and coffee. She says:

"My son was for years troubled with his eyes. He tried several kinds of glasses without relief. The optician said there was a defect in his eyes which was hard to reach.

"He used to drink coffee, as we all did, and finally quit it and began to use Postum. That was three years ago and he has not had to wear glasses and has had no trouble with his eyes since.

"I was always fond of tea and coffee and finally became so nervous I could hardly sit still long enough to eat a meal. My heart was in such a condition I thought I might die at any time.

"Medicine did not give me relief and I was almost desperate. It was about this time we decided to quit coffee and use Postum, and have used it ever since. I am in perfect health. No trouble now with my heart and never felt better in my life.

"Postum has been a great blessing to us all, particularly to my son and myself."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Postum now comes in two forms:

Regular Postum—must be well boiled. 15c and 25c packages.

Instant Postum—is a soluble powder. A teaspoonful dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. 30c and 50c tins.

The cost per cup of both kinds is about the same.

"There's a Reason" for Postum.

SYNOPSIS.

Challis Wrandall is found murdered in a road house near New York. Mrs. Wrandall is summoned from the city and identifies the body. A young woman who accompanied Wrandall to the inn and subsequently disappeared, is suspected. Mrs. Wrandall starts back for New York in an auto during a blinding snow storm. On the way she meets a young woman in the road who proves to be the woman who killed Wrandall. Feeling that the girl had done her a service in ridding her of the man who though she loved him deeply, had caused her great sorrow. Mrs. Wrandall determines to shield her and takes her to her own home. Mrs. Wrandall hears the story of Hetty Castleton's life, except that portion that relates to Wrandall. This and the story of the tragedy she forbids the girl ever to tell. She offers Hetty a home, friendship and security from peril on account of the tragedy. Sara Wrandall and Hetty return to New York after an absence of a year in Europe. Leslie Wrandall, brother of Challis, becomes greatly interested in Hetty. Sara sees in Leslie's infatuation possibility for revenge on the Wrandalls and reparation for the wrongs she suffered at the hands of Challis Wrandall by marrying his murderess into the family. Leslie, in company with his friend Brandon Booth, an artist, visits Sara at her country place. Leslie confesses to Sara that he is madly in love with Hetty. Sara arranges with Booth to paint a picture of Hetty. Booth has a haunting feeling that he has seen Hetty before. Looking through a portfolio of pictures by an unknown English artist he finds one of Hetty. He speaks to her about it. Hetty declares it must be a picture of Hetty Glynn, an English actress, who resembles her very much. Much to his chagrin Leslie is refused by Hetty. Booth and Hetty confess their love for each other, but the latter declares that she can never marry as there is an insurmountable barrier in the way. Hetty admits to Sara that she loves Booth. Sara declares that Hetty must marry Leslie, who must be made to pay his brother's debt to the girl. Hetty again attempts to tell the real story of the tragedy and Sara threatens to strangle her if she says a word. Sara insults Hetty by revealing that all this time she has believed Hetty to have sinned in her relations with Challis Wrandall. Later she realizes that Hetty is innocent. Leslie again proposes to Hetty and is rejected. Hetty prepares to leave Sara, declaring that after what has happened she can remain no longer.

Leslie did not turn up at his father's place in the High street that night until Booth was safely out of the way. He spent a dismal evening at the boat club.

His father and mother were in the library when he came home at half-past ten. From a dark corner of the garden he had witnessed Booth's early departure. Vivian had gone down to the gate in the low-lying hedge with her visitor. She came in a moment after Leslie's entrance.

"Hello, Les," she said, bending an inquiring eye upon him. "Isn't this early for you?"

Her brother was standing near the fireplace.

"There's a heavy dew falling, Mater," he said gruffly. "Shan't I touch a match to the kindling?"

His mother came over to him quickly, and laid her hand on his arm.

"Your coat is damp," she said anxiously. "Yes, light the fire."

"It's very warm in this room," said Mr. Wrandall, looking up from his book. They were always doing something for Leslie's comfort.

No one seemed to notice him. Leslie knelt and struck a match.

"Well?" said Vivian.

"Well what?" he demanded without looking up.

His sister took a moment for thought. "Is Hetty coming to stay with us in July?"

He stood erect, first rubbing his knee to dislodge the dust—then his palms.

"No, she isn't coming," he said. He drew a very long breath—the first in several hours—and then expelled it vocally. "She has refused to marry me."

Mr. Wrandall turned a leaf in his book; it sounded like the crack of doom, so still had the room become.

Vivian had the forethought to push a chair toward her mother. It was a most timely act on her part, for Mrs. Wrandall sat down very abruptly and very limply.

"She — what?" gasped Leslie's mother.

"Turned me down—cold," said Leslie briefly.

Mr. Wrandall laid his book on the table without thinking to put the bookmark in place. Then he arose and removed his glasses, fumbling for the case.

"She—she—what?" he demanded.

"Sacked me," replied his son.

"Please do not jest with me, Leslie," said his mother, trying to smile.

"He isn't joking, mother," said Vivian, with a shrug of her fine shoulders.

"He—he must be," cried Mrs. Wrandall impatiently. "What did she really say, Leslie?"

"The only thing I remember was 'goodby,'" said he, and then blew his nose violently.

"Poor old Les!" said Vivian, with real feeling.

"It was Sara Gooch's doing!" exclaimed Mrs. Wrandall, getting her breath at last.

"Nonsense," said Mr. Wrandall, picking up his book once more and turning to the place where the bookmark lay, after which he proceeded to re-read four or five pages before discovering his error.

No one spoke for a matter of five minutes or more. Then Mrs. Wrandall got up, went over to the library table and closed with a snap the bulky blue book with the limp leather cover, saving as she held it up to let him see that it was the privately printed history of the Murgatroyd family:

"It came by post this evening from London. She is merely a fourth cousin, my son."

He looked up with a gleam of interest in his eye.

CHAPTER XIV.

Crossing the Channel.

Booth, restless with a vague uneasiness that had come over him during the night, keeping him awake until nearly dawn, was hard put during the early hours of the forenoon to find occupation for his interest until a seasonable time arrived for appearing at Southlook. He was unable to account for this feeling of uncertainty and irritation.

At nine he set out to walk over to Southlook, realizing that he should have to spend an hour in profitless gossip with the lodge keeper before presenting himself at the villa, but somehow relishing the thought that even so he would be nearer to Hetty than if he remained in his own dooryard.

Half-way there we was overtaken by Sara's big French machine returning from the village. The car came to a standstill as he stepped aside to let it pass, and Sara herself leaned over and cordially invited him to get in and ride home with her.

"What an early bird you are," he exclaimed as he took his seat beside her.

She was not in a mood for airy persiflage, as he soon discovered.

"Miss Castleton has gone up to town, Mr. Booth," she said rather lifelessly. "I have just taken her to the station. She caught the eight-thirty."

He was at once solicitous. "No bad news, I hope?" There was no thought in his mind that her absence was other than temporary.

"She is not coming back, Brandon." She had not addressed him as Brandon before.

He stared. "You—you mean—" The words died on his lips.

"She is not coming back," she repeated.

An accusing gleam leaped into his eyes.

"What has happened, Mrs. Wrandall?" he asked.

She was quick to perceive the change in his voice and manner.

"She prefers to live apart from me. That is all."

"When was this decision reached?"

"But yesterday. Soon after she came in from her walk with you."

"Do—do you mean to imply that that had anything to do with her leaving your home?" he demanded, with a flush on his cheek.

She met his look without flinching. "It was the beginning."

"You—you criticised her? You took her to task—"

"I notified her that she was to marry Leslie Wrandall if she marries anyone at all," she said in a perfectly level tone.

"Good Lord, Mrs. Wrandall!"

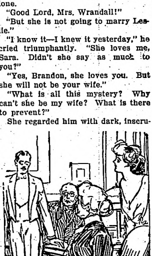
"But she is not going to marry Leslie."

"I know it—I knew it yesterday," he cried triumphantly. "She loves me, Sara. Didn't she say as much to you?"

"Yes, Brandon, she loves you. But she will not be your wife."

"What is all this mystery? Why can't she be my wife? What is there to prevent?"

She regarded him with dark, inscrutable eyes. Many seconds passed before she spoke.



"She—What?" Gasped Leslie's Mother.

"Would you want her for your wife if you knew she had belonged to another man?"

He turned very cold. The palms of his hands were wet, as with ice-water. Something dark seemed to flit before his eyes.

"I will not believe that of her," he said, shaking his head with an air of finality.

"That is not an answer to my question."

"Yes, I would still want her," he declared steadily.

"I merely meant to put you to the harshest test," she said, and there was relief in her voice. "She is a good girl, she is pure. I asked my question because until yesterday I had reason to doubt her."

"Good heavens, how could you doubt those honest, guiltless eyes of—"

She shook her head sadly. "To answer you I would have to reveal the secret that makes it impossible for her to become your wife, and that I cannot, will not do."

"Is it fair to me?"

"Perhaps not, but it is fair to her, and that is why I must remain silent."

"Before God, I shall know the truth—from her, if not from you—and—"

"If you love her, if you will be kind to her, you will let her go her way in peace."

He was struck by the somewhat sinister earnestness of her words.

"Tell me where I may find her," he said, setting his jaw.

"It will not be difficult for you to find her," she said, frowning, "if you insist on pursuing her."

"You drive her away from your house, Sara Wrandall, and yet you expect me to believe that your motives are friendly. Why should I accept your word as final?"

"I did not drive her away, nor did I ask her to stay."

He stared hard at her.

"Good Lord, what is the meaning of all this?" he cried in perplexity? "What am I to understand?"

The car had come to a stop under the porte cochere. She laid her hand on his arm.

"If you will come in with me, Brandon, I will try to make things clear to you."

He left in half an hour, walking rapidly down the drive, his coat buttoned closely, although the morning was hot and breathless. He held in his hand a small scrap of paper on which was written: "If I loved you less, I would come to you now and lie to you. If you love me, Brandon, you will let me go my way. It is the only course. Sara is my friend, and she is yours. Be guided by her, and believe in my love for you. Hetty."

* * * * * * *

And now, as things go in fairy stories, we should prepare ourselves to see Hetty pass through a season in drudgery and hardship, with the ultimate quintessence of joy as the reward for her trials and tribulations. Happily, this is not a fairy tale. There are some things more fantastic than fairy tales, if they are not spoiled in the telling. Hetty did not go forth to encounter drudgery, disdain and obloquy. By no manner of means! She went with a well-filled purse, a definite purpose ahead and a determined factor behind.

In a manner befitting her station as the intimate friend of Mrs. Challis Wrandall, as the cousin of the Murgatroyds, as the daughter of Colonel Castleton of the Indian corps, as a person supposed to be possessed of independent means withal, she went, with none to question, none to cavil.

Sara had insisted on this, as much for her own sake as for Hetty's; she argued, and she had prevailed in the end. What would the world think, what would their acquaintances think, and above all what would the high and mighty Wrandalls think if she went with meek and lowly mien?

Why should they make it possible for anyone to look askance?

And so it was that she departed in state, with a dozen trunks and boxes; an obsequiously attended seat in the parlor car was hers; a telegram in her bag assured her that rooms were being reserved for herself and maid at the Ritz-Carlton; alongside it reposed a letter to Mr. Carroll, instructing him to provide her with sufficient funds to carry out the plan agreed upon; and in the seat behind sat the lady's maid who had served her for a twelvemonth and more.

The timely demise of the venerable Lord Murgatroyd afforded the most natural excuse for her trip to England. The old nobleman gave up the ghost, allowing for difference in time, at the very moment when Mrs. Redmond Wrandall was undoing a certain package from London, which turned out to be a complete history of what his forbears had done in the way of propagation since the fourteenth century.

Hetty did not find it easy to accommodate her pride to the plan which was to give her a fresh and rather imposing start in the world. She was to have a full year in which to determine whether she should accept toil and poverty as her lot, or emulate the symbolic example of Dicky, the canary bird. At the end of the year, unless she did as Dicky had done, her source of supplies would be automatically cut off and she would be entirely dependent upon her own wits and resources. In the interim she was a probationary person of leisure. It had required hours of persuasion on the part of Sara Wrandall to bring her into line with these arrangements.

"But I am able and willing to work for my living," had been Hetty's stubborn retort to all the arguments brought to bear upon her.

"Then let me put it in another light. It is vital to me, of course, that you should keep up the show of affluence for a while at least. I think I have made that clear to you. But here is another side to the matter; the question of recompense."

"Recompense?" cried Hetty sharply.

"Without your knowing it, I have virtually held you a prisoner all these months, condemned in my own judgment, if not in the sight of the law. I have taken the law unto myself. You were not convicted of murder in this unitarian court of mine, but of another sin. For fifteen months you have been living under the shadow of a crime you did not commit. I was reserving complete punishment for you in the shape of an ignoble marriage, which was to have served two bitter ends. Well, I had the truth from you. I believe you to be absolutely innocent of the charge I held over you, for which I condemned you without a hearing. Then, why should I not employ my own means of making restitution?"

"You have condescended to believe in me. That is all I ask."

"True, that is all you ask. But is it altogether the fair way out of it? To illustrate: our criminal laws are less kind to the innocent than to the guilty. Our law courts find a man guilty and he is sent to prison. Later on, he is found to be innocent—absolutely innocent. What does the state do in the premises? It issues a formal pardon—a mockery, pure and simple—and the man is set free. It all comes to a curt, belated apology for an error on the part of justice. No substantial recompense is offered. He is merely pardoned for something he didn't do. The state, which has wronged him, condescends to pardon him! Think of it! It is the same as if a man knocked another down and then said, before he removed his foot from the victim's neck: 'I pardon you freely.' My father was opposed to the system we have—that all countries have—of pardoning men who have been unjustly condemned. The innocent victim is pardoned in the same manner as the guilty one who comes in for clemency. I accept my father's contention that an innocent man should not be shamed and humiliated by a pardon. The court which tried him should reopen the case and honorably acquit him of the crime. Then the state should pay to this innocent man, dollar for dollar, all that he might have earned during his term of imprisonment, with an additional amount for the suffering he has endured. Not long ago in an adjoining state a man, who had served seventeen years of a life sentence for murder, was found to be wholly innocent. What happened? A pardon was handed to him and he walked out of prison, broken in spirit, health and purse. His small fortune had been wiped out in the futile effort to prove his innocence. He gave up seventeen years of his life and then was pardoned for the sacrifice. He should have been paid for every day spent in prison. That was the very least they could have done."

"I see now what you mean," mused Hetty. "I have never thought of it in that way before."

"Well, it comes to this in our case, Hetty: I have tried you all over again in my own little court and I have acquitted you of the charge I had against you. I do not offer you a silly pardon. You must allow me to have my way in this matter, to choose my own means of compensating you for—"

"You saved my life," protested Hetty, shaking her head obstinately.

"My dear, I appreciate the fact that you are English," said Sara, with a weary smile, "but won't you please see the point?"

Then Hetty smiled too, and the way was easier after that for Sara. She gained her quixotic point, and Hetty went away from Southlook feeling that no woman in all the world was so bewildering as Sara Wrandall.

When she sailed for England, two days later, the newspapers announced that the beautiful and attractive Miss Castleton was returning to her native land on account of the death of Lord Murgatroyd, and would spend the year on the continent, where probably she would be joined later on by Mrs. Wrandall, whose period of mourning and distress had been softened by the constant and loyal friendship of "this exquisite Englishwoman."

Four hundred miles out at sea she was overtaken by wireless messages from three persons.

Brandon Booth's message said: "I am sailing tomorrow on a faster ship than yours. You will find me waiting for you on the landing stage." Her heart gave a leap to dizzy heights, and, try as she would, she could not crush it back to the depths in which it had dwelt for days.

The second bit of pale green paper contained a cry from a most unexpected source: "Cable your London address. S. refuses to give it to me. I think I understand the situation. We want to make amends for what you have had to put up with during the year. She has shown her true nature at last." It was signed "Leslie."

From Sara came these cryptic words: "For each year of famine there will come seven years of plenty."

All the way across the Atlantic she lived in a state of subdued excitement. Conflicting emotions absorbed her waking hours but her dreams were all of one complexion: rosy and warm and full of a joyousness that distressed her vastly when she recalled them to mind in the early morning hours. During the day she intermittently hoped and feared that he would be on the landing stage. In any event, she was bound to find unhappiness. If he were there her joy would be short-lived and blighting; if he were not there, her disappointment would be equally hard to bear.

He was there. She saw him from the deck of the tender as they edged up to the landing. His tall figure loomed in the front rank against the rail that held back the crowd; his sun-bronzed face wore a look of eager expectancy; from her obscured position in the shadow of the deck building, purposely chosen for reasons only too obvious, she could even detect the alert, swift-moving scrutiny that he fastened upon the crowd.

Later on, he stood looking down into her serious blue eyes; her hands were lying limp in his. His own eyes were dark with earnestness, with the restraint that had fastened itself upon him. Behind her stood the respectful but immeasurably awed maid, who could not, for the life of her, understand how a man could be on both sides of the Atlantic at one and the same time.

"Thank the Lord, Hetty, say I, for the five-day boats," he was saying.

"You should not have come, Brandon," she cried softly, and the look of misery in her eyes was tinged with a glow she could not suppress. "It only makes everything harder for me. I—I— Oh, I wish you had not come!"

"But isn't it wonderful?" he cried, "that I should be here and waiting for you! It is almost inconceivable. And you were in the act of running away from me, too. Oh, I have that much of the tale from Sara, so don't look so hurt about it."

"I am so sorry you came," she repeated, her lip trembling.

Noting her emotion, he gave her hands a fierce, encouraging pressure and immediately released them.

"Come," he said gently; "I have booked for London. Everything is arranged. I shall see to your luggage. Let me put you in the carriage first."

As she sat in the railway carriage, waiting for him to return, she tried in a hundred ways to devise a means of escape, and yet she had never loved him so much as now. Her heart was sore, her desolation never so complete as now.

He came back at last and took his seat beside her in the compartment, fanning himself with his hat. The maid very discreetly stared out of the window at the hurrying throng of travelers on the platform.

"How I love you, Hetty—how I adore you!" Booth whispered passionately.

"Oh, Brandon!"

"And I don't mean to give you up," he added, his lean jaw setting hard.

"You must—oh, you must," she cried miserably. "I mean it, Brandon—"

"What are your plans?" asked he.

"Please don't ask me," she pleaded. "You must give it up, Brandon. Let me go my own way."

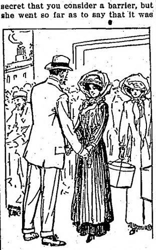
"Not until I have the whole story from you. You see, I am not easily thwarted, once I set my heart on a thing. I gathered this much from Sara: the object is not insurmountable."

"She—said—that?"

"In effect, yes," he qualified.

"What did she tell you?" demanded Hetty, laying her hand on his arm.

"I will confess she didn't reveal the secret that you consider a barrier, but she went so far as to say that it was very dark and dreadful," he said lightly. They were speaking in very low tones. "When I pinned her down to it, she added that it did not in any sense bear upon your honor. But there is time enough to talk about this later on. For the present let's not discuss the past. I know enough of your history from your own lips as well as what little I could get out of Sara, to feel sure that you are in a way, drifting. I intend to look after you, at least until you find yourself. Your sudden break with Sara has been explained to me. Leslie Wrandall is at the back of it. Sara told me that she tried to force you to marry him. I think you did quite right in going away as you did, but, on the other hand, was it quite fair to me?"



He Stood Looking Down Into Her Serious Blue Eyes.

"Yes, it was most fair," she said, compressing her lips.

He frowned.

"We can't possibly be of the same opinion," he said seriously.

"You wouldn't say that if you knew everything."

"How long do you intend to stay in London?"

"I don't know. When does this train arrive there?"

"At four o'clock, I think. Will you go to an hotel or to friends?" He put the question very delicately.

She smiled faintly. "You mean the Murgatroyds?"

"Your father is here, I am informed. And you must have other friends or relatives who—"

"I shall go to a small hotel I know near Trafalgar square," she interrupted quietly. "You must not come there to see me, Brandon."

"I shall expect you to dine with me at—say Prince's this evening," was his response to this.

She shook her head and then turned to look out of the window. He sat back in his seat and for many miles, with deep perplexity in his eyes, studied her half-averted face. The old uneasiness returned. Was this obstacle, after all, so great that it could not be overcome?

They lunched together, but were singularly reserved all through the meal. A plan was growing in her brain, a cruel but effective plan that made her despise herself and yet contained the only means of escape from an even more cruel situation.

He drove with her from the station to the small hotel off Trafalgar square. There were no rooms to be had. It was the week of Ascot and the city was still crowded with people who awaited only the royal sign to break the fetters that bound them to London. Somewhat perturbed, she allowed him to escort her to several hotels of a like character. Failing in each case, she was in despair. At last she plucked up the courage to say to him, not without constraint and embarrassment:

"I think, Brandon, if you were to allow me to apply alone to one of these places I could get in without much trouble."

"Good Lord!" he gasped, going very red with dismay. "What a fool I—"

"I'll try the Savoy," she said quickly, and then laughed at him. His face was the picture of distress.

"I shall come for you tonight at eight," he said, stopping the taxi at once. "Goodby till then."

He got out and gave directions to the chauffeur. Then he did a very strange thing. He hailed another taxi and, climbing in, started off in the wake of the two women. From a point of vantage near the corridor leading to the "American bar," he saw Hetty sign her slips and move off toward the left. Whereupon, seeing that she was quite out of the way, he approached the manager's office and asked for accommodatons.

"Not a thing?"

"Everything has been taken for weeks, sir. I'm sorry."

"Sorry, too. I had hoped you might have something left for a friend who expects to stop here—a Miss Castleton."

"Miss Castleton has just applied. We could not give her anything."

"Eh?"

"Fortunately we could let her have rooms until eight this evening. We were more than pleased to offer them to her for a few hours, although they are reserved for parties coming down from Liverpool tonight."

Booth tried the Cecil and got a most undesirable room. Calling up the Savoy on the telephone, he got her room. The maid answered. She informed him that Miss Castleton had just that instant gone out and would not return before seven o'clock.

"I suppose she will not remove her trunks from the station until she finds a permanent place to lodge," he inquired. "Can I be of any service?"

"I think not, sir. She left no word, sir."

He hung up the receiver and straightway dashed over to the Savoy, hoping to catch her before she left the hotel. Just inside the door he came to an abrupt stop. She was at the news and ticket booth in the lobby, closely engaged in conversation with the clerk. Presently the latter took up the telephone, and after a brief conversation with some one at the other end, turned to Hetty and nodded his head. Whereupon she nodded her own adorable head and began the search for her purse. Booth edged around to an obscure spot and saw her pay for and receive something in return.

"By Jove!" he said to himself, amazed.

She passed near him, without seeing him, and went out into the court. He watched her turn into the Strand.

THE SUNBEAM,

BY W. G. HUNT.

Published every Friday, at Sunbeam, Pennington County, Minnesota.

Entered as Second-class matter August 30 1905, at the post office at Sunbeam Minn. under the Act of Congress of March 3,1879

Primary election is over and those who did not get eliminated will prepare their horses for the second heat, which will be trotted in November.

We understand that D. P. O'Neil is reporting around the country that anyone who is not supporting him has "sold out." Granting that what he says is true, we wonder if Daniel likes it as well as he did when he dropped the Normal School over to the Bemidji town site boomers.

Notwithstanding the backward spring the crops in this locality never looked better at this season of the year, and a bountiful crop is a certainty now as wheat has already began to form the joint and little heads, and with plenty of moisture in the ground good long heads are sure to form.

The grand jury of this county, at their last session at Crookston, made a recommendation to the effect that anyone convicted of a petty offence and sentenced to the county jail, be employed during the term of their sentence in constructing roads in the county. It is to be hoped this recommendation is accepted and put into practice. It would not only be the means of ridding the county of undesirables, but would tend to greatly improve the road conditions of Polk county.—McIntosh Times.

That law should be inforced by every county in the state as there is a class of undesirable citizens that prefer to laze around a county jail, and have the tax payers feed them, instead of working for their living. Put them to work on the public highways, or a rock pile, and let them understand that a jail is not a summer resort to keep cool in, nor a winter's head quarters to get free board at.

A forecast of the operation of the new tariff law, said to be made by an authority on the subject, anticipating the government report, shows that in the six months in which the law has been in operation, we imported 83,000,000 pounds of fresh beef, which is about two ounces a month for each individual in the United States. The surprising thing, however, is that it was imported at a price over 30 per cent higher in March, under the new law, than in September, the last month under the old law. This goes to show that the effect in the change in the tariff has been to increase the price of beef in foreign conntries rather than to decrease it or the cost of living in our own. The removal of the tariff on hides worked in exactly the same way. It raised the price of the hides in exporting countries, but did not decrease the price of leather or boots and shoes in importing countries.

We have a suspicion that a good per cent of our importations of meats has been made largely for the purpose of lowering wholesale prices in the United States. The safety of this country lies in the fact that our consumption of meats is so large that two ounces a month per head for the people of the United States in an almost negligible fraction of the total amount consumed.—Wallaces' Farmer.

Ancient Eggs and Jokes.

Bad news and ditto eggs had best be broken gently.—Philadelphia Ledger.

When Luke McLuke wrote it two years ago it read, "Bad news and bad eggs should be broken gently."—Cincinnati Enquirer.

Just so! And when we wrote it four years ago it ran thus: "How do you tell a bad egg? If I have anything to tell a bad egg I break it gently."—Boston Transcript.

Don't get excited, gentlemen. The thing had whiskers when Noah was a boy.—Biddeford Journal.

Not so; it was a female egg. And as the Argus remarked away back in 1803, "News dropped to a woman is like a bad egg—everybody will soon know it, broken ever so gently."—Portland Eastern Argus.

Nothing Heroic About Him.

She was very romantic, and when she saw the scars on his face she jumped at conclusions.

In a Dilemma.

One of London's charming young suffragettes said: "I want to get married just to prove that I can, and I don't want to get married just to prove that I don't have to. If I don't they'll say I can't; if I do they'll say I have no more independence than any other woman."—T. P.'s London Weekly.

"First rate."

"You didn't seem pleased with it at first."

"No, but it's broken now."—London Tit-Bits.

Physical Energy.

Perhaps you do not know it, but when you walk a distance of ten miles you expend enough force, could it be all collected, to raise 800 tons one foot from the ground. Of this enormous quantity of energy the legs are responsible for 150 tons, the heart for 100, the lungs for twenty-two and the bulk of the remainder is wasted in the heat given off from the body.

In severe athletic competitions, such as running, rowing and boxing, you must be in such a condition as to be able to exert, by your limbs alone, each minute as much force as would lift 5,000 pounds one foot above the ground.

When a powerful man works for twenty-four hours with all his might the energy he expends is equal to lifting a third class cruiser, and during his life he dissipates enough power to carry his body at death to the sun. These statements may at first sight seem extraordinary, but will not seem so when it is remembered that two ounces of bread contains the potential energy of 150 tons.—Pearson's.

Buying an Island.

The story of the settlement of Tangier island, in Chesapeake bay, as told by J. M. Church in his book about the island and its isolated inhabitants, outdoes that of the famous sale of Manhattan:

"You gentlemen ain't never heard how Tangier got settled? It were by a man from the eastern shore settlements back in 1707—more'n 200 years ago. The island were the home of a tribe of Indians, and this here man Post got the idea of raisin' stock on it. So he runs over and tells the Indians that the colonists are goin' to come and massacre them and they'd better get outen the way. That scared the Indians, all right, and they sailed over to the western shore of Virginny. But before they went Post said, as the island wasn't goin' to be any more use to 'em, he'd buy it off them. The chief agreed, so Post gave him two old overcoats, and the island was his. Then he brung over five families and a passel o' horses and cows."

Where Is Europe?

The man who motors from London to Brighton would never dream of telling his friends next week that he had spent the holiday motoring in Europe. But the man who motored from Calais to Boulogne would.

Europe doesn't mean England to the average man. Try it on him and see. Europe he conceives only as the continent.

The Scilly islanders are much the same. They greet newcomers with inquiries as to affairs in England. I have known old country folk in the Isle of Wight speak in the same way, and the people of the marsh country at the back of Dungeness used to and may even now regard themselves as extra territorial. They were the marshmen; other people were foreigners and Englishmen.—London Mirror.

Antiquity of Death Masks.

Although there is no mention of death masks in the works of Homer or in any of the later classics, modern explorers have satisfied themselves that in the early burials of all nations it was the custom to cover the heads and bodies of the dead with sheets of gold so pliable that they took the impress of the form, and not infrequently, when in the course of centuries the embalmed flesh had shriveled or fallen away, the gold retained the exact cast of the features. Schliemann found a number of bodies "covered with large masks of gold plate in repousse work," several of which have been reproduced by means of engraving in his "Mycenae," and he asserts that there can be no doubt whatever that each one of these represents the likeness of the deceased person whose face it covered.

Naval stations have been established at Tutuila, Samoa; Island of Guam; Guantanamo, Cuba; Honolulu, Cavite and Olongapo, Philippine Islands. The latter has become an important naval base for the Asiatic fleet.—Philadelphia Press.

First Opera Glasses.

The single opera glass was first used in the time of Louis XIV. It became the rage, and everybody used one. The double opera glass (Jumelle) was invented in 1825, but did not at first find favor with women. A treatise was written in the early part of the nineteenth century on l'art de lorgner, in which it was shown that a woman with fine arms would hold the glass with both hands, if she were blessed with fine hands she would take off her gloves, if her neck were long she would recline back in her chair, and so on. It was quite a treatise on coquetry.

Not a Vacation Prospect.

"My boy," said the professor, "if you keep on as you have started and study hard you may be president of the United States some day."

"Yes," replied the young man gloomily; "and then I'll have to start in and study a whole lot harder."—Washington Star.

Love of Gossip.

One of the chief characteristics of the human face is inquisitiveness—not so much about things and places and ideas as about each other. Every proper person is a born gossip, and the accomplished scandal monger is always welcome, provided, of course, his scandal is about others. You can test this at any time by considering who are the people you like best to meet and who are always surrounded by the greatest number of idle acquaintances. Invariably you must be forced to the conclusion they are those who have made a business of acquiring information about others and retailing their knowledge in various dressings. This love of gossip is further revealed in the kind of books which claim the widest appreciation. You will find that these books are not poetry, drama, science or philosophy. They are novels, memoirs, diaries, intimate histories, recollections, letters—all of them essential gossip (and sometimes scandal) appearing by their power to attract the gossiping sense which exists in all of us.—T. P.'s London Weekly.

The Koran.

In the London Everyman is a review of the Koran and its author, Mohammed. It is a one man's book and that man not an imaginative one, but essentially a man of action and lacking in invention. The Koran is a jumbled mass of precepts, doctrines, threats, injunctions, divine commands, narrative, lyric and epic poetry. It's heaven and hell are too material for modern thought. "Obviously," says Everyman, "the Koran is meant not to be read with the eye, but to be recited; when the repetitions are not nearly so pronounced. It reflects a social order, a system of ideas as remote from Rome, and more especially from Greece, as our own are from the North American Indian. But neither time nor evolution can utterly quench the flame of Mohammed's personality, which carried his followers to reckless excesses, to the sovereignty of empires, which created an art peculiar to Islam and founded age long traditions."

One of the Sights of Paris.

The Paris department stores are worse jumbles even than the English department stores. When there is a special sale under way the bargain counters are rigged up on the sidewalks. There, in the open air, buyer and seller will chaffer and bicker and wrangle and quarrel and kiss and make up again—for all the world to see. One of the free sights of Paris is a frugal Frenchman with his face extensively haired over pawing like a Skye terrier through a heap of marked down lingerie, picking out things for the female members of his household to wear, now testing some material with his tongue, now holding a personal article up in the sunlight to examine the fabric—while his wife stands humbly, dumbly by, waiting for him to complete his selections.—Irving S. Cobb in Saturday Evening Post.

A Bird In the Hand, Etc.

The minister had just pronounced the words which made them one. Of course the next thing of importance was the fee.

The bridegroom looked at his bride, then at the minister. Fumbling in his pocket, he produced a two dollar bill.

"Here is a two dollar bill I will give you now," he said, "or I will wait until the end of six months and pay you what I think it is worth, even if it is a hundred dollars. You can take your choice."

The minister studied a moment, glanced at the bride and hastily replied:

"I'll take the $2 now."—Indianapolis News.

Ghost Plant of Oregon.

The ghost plant was known and much praised by the Indians of Oregon in times past and is sometimes known as the Indian pipe plant. It is said the Indians believed that it had great remedial qualities and made from it a lotion which they considered curative for diseases of the eye. It is a tall, waxlike plant about eight inches high, and its bloom resembles a waxen cup. —Portland Oregonian.

The Possum Trail.

At one of the famous Georgia 'possum dinners one of the guests turned to the waiter with the remark: "Rastus, that 'possum must have gone to my head. It aches like fury."

"Is dat so, suh?" responded Rastus. "Funny how 'possum always meks for a hollah."—National Monthly.

The average man has within his system the material for 13 pounds of candles, a pound of nails, 800 pencils, bindings for 16 small books, 500 knife handles, 28 violin strings, 20 teaspoonfuls of salt and a pound of sugar.—Detroit Free Press.

Baby Seals Fear the Water.

It is a curious fact that the fur seal was once a land animal. The baby seals are actually afraid of the water. They would drown if thrown into it and have to learn to swim by repeated efforts. When once they have been taught to swim, however, they soon forget to walk.

LIND THINKS PEACE WILL BE RESTORED

WILSON'S SPECIAL ENVOY DOESN'T EXPECT TO BE CALLED AGAIN.

UP TO CONSTITUTIONALISTS

Declares Rebels Must Now Show That They Can Succeed Where Huerta Failed—No Receivership Intended.

Minneapolis, June 12. — John Lind, special representative of President Woodrow Wilson in Mexico until the outbreak of hostilities at Vera Cruz, has returned to his Minneapolis home after an absence of nearly a year.

Prospects For Peace.

"I do not expect to be called back," said Mr. Lind. "The prospects are good for a peaceful settlement of Mexico's difficulties and for settled conditions there. It is up to the constitutionalists to show that they can succeed where Huerta failed. It is not a receivership. We want Mexico to work out her own salvation, and I believe she will do it.

"My presence in Washington is no longer necessary. The president and Mr. Bryan asked me not to make any engagements that would prevent my return, if new developments came and they should wish to consult me, or to have me see others about the situation. But I think it will not be necessary. The general policy of the administration as to Mexico is well worked out, and things are progressing satisfactorily."

A Hard Customer.

Mexican papers found Mr. Lind a hard customer, and El Imparcial of Mexico City, called him "El Gran Silencioso" in a headline over the story of its failure to get an interview.

CAR HITS AUTO; THREE KILLED

Parts of Demolished Machine Tear Through Interurban Station at Brookside, Minn.

Minneapolis.—Three were killed when a Minnetonka car hit an automobile at Brookside, two miles west of the city limits. Those killed were: Charles Hendrickson, 50 years old, contractor; Otto Hendrickson, 47 years old, carpenter; John Specht, 22 years old, carpenter. The first two were Brookside residents and the last named was from Glencoe, Minn.

The three men were hurled about 150 feet. They were dead when the car crew and passengers reached them. The automobile was a tangled mass of wreckage and a part of the Brookside station was smashed as the automobile was forced through it.

Seated in the station was Samuel B. Rees, Brookside, employed by Barnett & Record company, 700 Flour Exchange. Parts of the automobile tore away the station wall less than two feet from his seat. An umbrella, held in his hand, was hurled 50 feet into an adjoining field. Seated in the station also was Joseph Lutzi, 11 years old. He was not injured.

RESORT LAW IS HELD VALID

Wallace-Fosseen Abatement Act Is Declared Constitutional by State Supreme Court.

St. Paul.—The Minnesota resort abatement law, known as the Wallace-Fosseen act, was held valid in all its essential provisions in a decision of the supreme court on appeals taken from Hennepin and Ramsey counties. Judge Joseph W. Molyneaux, who held the law valid and declared that personal rights were not restricted by the act, is sustained and Judge Frederick N. Dickson of Ramsey county is reversed in his opinion that the law was unconstitutional.

Woodmen Picnic at Benson.

Benson.—The annual picnic of the Modern Woodmen of America for the west central Minnesota district, was held in this city last week but owing to inclement weather much of the program had to be curtailed and the attendance from outside towns was small. There was an automobile parade in which fifty machines participated. The address of welcome was made by Mayor J. N. Edwards and the response by Neighbor Stone. John L. Sundean of Minneapolis, state consul, and Governor A. O. Eberhart made addresses.

Two Indian Boys Killed.

Pipestone.—Quincy Shambo, aged 9, and Frank Shran, aged 12, Indian students at the government school in the northern part of Pipestone, were killed last week in the fiercest windstorm that ever visited this locality. Several persons were injured, hundreds of fine shade trees were destroyed and small buildings were wrecked. Thousands of dollars' damage was done to business buildings. The Indian boys were struck by flying boards from a barn. Both were residents of White Earth, Minn.

U. C. T. ELECT NEW OFFICERS

Grasse of Fargo Chosen Grand Counselor—Winona Next Meeting Place.

Mankato. — Officers of the grand council, United Commercial Travelers, elected to guide the membership in Minnesota and North Dakota, are: Grand counselor, W. L. Grasse, Fargo; grand junior counselor, P. F. Murphy, Stillwater; grand past counselor, O. H. Griswold, Winona; grand secretary, J. M. Dresser, St. Paul; grand treasurer, H. G. Lillyblad, Red Wing; grand conductor, G. M. Peterson, Duluth; grand page, J. L. George, Bismarck, N. D.; grand sentinel, E. C. Mahle, St. Paul; grand executive committee, G. E. Tisdale, Minneapolis; re-elected, C. A. Hitchcock, Crookston; re-elected, B. F. Ashelman, Fargo; and H. G. Blake, Minneapolis.

With the street pageant Saturday the convention, which attracted 3,000 commercial travelers to Mankato, closed.

Winona won the 1915 convention. At the business session, J. R. Tawney of Winona, cousin of former Congressman James H. Tawney, and J. R. Kinsloe, secretary-manager of the Winona Association of Commerce, led a delegation 100 strong into the convention hall to show the reasons why the Queen city of Minnesota should be selected. Special trains from Albert Lea and Owatonna added other boosters for Winona's cause.

Early in the session it was thought Bismarck might make a bid for the 1915 convention, but its campaigners admitted they were working with a view to bringing Bismarck to the front for 1916.

CIRCUS REMEMBERS SICK LAD

Parade Turns Aside so That "Shut-in" Can See Pageant at Litchfield.

Litchfield.—From his bed, drawn close to the hospital window, Guy Peters, 9 years old, watched a circus parade that had come three blocks out of its way to march before his window.

With the average boy's passion for clowns and elephants, Guy was heartbroken when the doctors said he would have to stay in bed on circus day. He has just been operated on for tuberculosis of the hip and probably will never walk again.

When the Yankee Robinson circus managers learned the story, they ordered the parade out of its scheduled route to pass the boy's window. As the procession came by the band played its loudest, the wagon drivers waved their whips to the boy in the window, the bareback riders threw him kisses and the white-faced clowns performed their funniest capers on the grass beneath the window.

Afterward several of the circus folk in full regalia visited him in his room.

Litchfield Girl Bound Over.

Chicago.—Pleas that Hazel Pollock of Litchfield, Minn., student of music and high school graduate, stole diamonds and other jewelry, while under a nervous strain, failed to move Judge Wells of the municipal court. He held her to the grand jury in bonds of $2,500. She was given until June 16 to obtain sureties. Otto Strohm of 2059 Lawrence avenue, accused of receiving jewelry that the Pollick girl had stolen, was discharged.

Politics at Road Meeting.

Le Sueur Center.—More than 250 farmers gathered here Saturday afternoon for the purpose of forming a county taxpayers' league. The meeting developed into an old-time political rally and when the speaker was interrupted by W. V. Brockway, a farmer, who accused him of making wrong statements in regard to the Dunn road law, it was some time before order could be restored.

Virginia Woman Drowned.

Gilbert.—Mrs. J. Ronda of Virginia, Minn., was drowned in Cedar Island lake at 11 a. m. Sunday, when a boat in which she was rowing with three young women struck a rock and capsized. The three young women managed to reach the shore, but Mrs. Ronda, who was unable to swim, sank. The body was recovered about twenty minutes later. Mrs. Ronda was 24 years old.

Minnesota Pellagra Victim.

Rochester, Minn., June 12.—Mrs. David Elliott of this city died a victim of pellagra. Mrs. Elliott's case was the first known in Minnesota, and attracted the attention of the state board of health which confirmed the diagnosis made by Dr. C. T. Granger of this city. Prior to this case, another was found in the city, but the patient was a resident of another state.

Bankers Indorse Candidates.

Minneapolis.—The Minnesota Bankers' association, at its annual convention at the Hotel Radisson, indorsed by unanimous vote the six candidates recommended for the directorate of the Minneapolis district reserve bank by the steering committee of six states, which met here last month. These candidates included E. W. Decker of Minneapolis, F. R. Bigelow of St. Paul, F. R. Hixon, La Crosse; Governor L. B. Hanna, Fargo; A. C. Bassett, Webster, S. D., and Norman B. Holter, Helena, Mont.

FIRE UNDERSWRITERS UNITE

Minneapolis Man Chosen President of Minnesota and North Dakota Association.

Osakis.—An attendance of nearly 100 fieldmen, managers and company executives, combined with an enthusiasm never seen at any previous meeting, made the twenty-ninth annual meeting of the Minnesota and North Dakota Fire Underwriters one of the most successful in the history of the association. President Joseph L. King of Minneapolis, in his annual address, traced the work of the association the past year and decried the lack of co-operation among the members, saying in part:

"When an earnest solicitation for co-operation is met with the response, 'I will put my house in order when the other fellow's premises are presentable,' is to my mind a mighty poor form of co-operation and does not tend to bring about the good feeling which should exist among our members."

He referred to the agitation relative to a reduction of rates at various points the past year and thought the public were prone to misconstrue the work done along fire prevention lines. He urged that in the future inspections should be made with no attempt to attract public attention. The Minnesota and North Dakota Fire Underwriters and the Minnesota Fire Prevention associations were combined at a joint meeting of the two organizations. Officers were elected as follows:

E. C. Bowe, Minneapolis, president; Byron K. Cowles, Minneapolis, vice president; Charles G. Stone, Minneapolis, secretary; E. C. MacDonald, Minneapolis, treasurer; executive committee, Walter A. Acres, Charles G. Bates, Minneapolis.

PEOPLE GET BACK $1,500,000

That Amount Refunded Shippers and Passengers by Minnesota Railroads.

St. Paul.—Minnesota railroads have refunded $1,500,000 to passengers and shippers of freight since Aug. 7 last, as a result of the United States supreme court decision in the Minnesota rate cases.

Commissioner O. P. B. Jacobson of the state railroad and warehouse commission announced that the commission has handled 7,224 claims, upon which it collected for the claimants $89,450.74. Thousands of other claims were sent directly to the railroads or placed in the hands of collection agencies, which solicited this business, all over the state.

The commission collected the claims filed with it at a cost for clerical and other hire of 2 7-10 cents on the dollar, while persons who employed private agencies were compelled to pay 25 to 50 per cent of their claims for fees.

Though nearly a year has elapsed since the refunding began, claims are arriving at the commission's offices at the rate of 80 to 100 daily.

RATES MAY BE INCREASED

Roads of Middle West May Seek to Boost Freight Charges 10 Per Cent.

Minneapolis.—A horizontal increase of about 10 per cent in freight rates will be announced by Middle Western roads shortly, according to a rumor current in railroad circles here.

The exact amount of the increase, it is understood, will be conditional on the action of the interstate commerce commission on the Eastern roads' request for a 5 per cent increase.

If the Eastern roads are successful, the Western lines are likely to ask for the full 10 per cent. If the commission rules against the Eastern roads, the West may modify its demands.

Municipal Topics at Herman.

Herman.—The business men of the community met at luncheon Wednesday to listen to an address by Professor Frederick H. Bass of the University of Minnesota on "The Engineer and the City." Municipal improvements that Herman, as the "model town" of the state, should adopt, were outlined. This was one of the lectures of "University week." "University week" was financially successful, more than enough tickets to pay the expenses being sold.

Lamp Explodes; Couple Burned.

Elbow Lake.—Peter Peterson died from burns received when a lamp exploded in his tailor shop. His hands were fairly cooked, his head, feet and body were also terribly burned. Mrs. Peterson was also badly burned about the face, and her hands will be crippled for life.

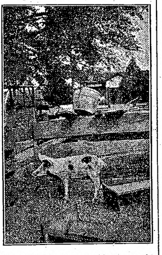
Home Post Graduate Course.

Winona.—In addressing the class of the Winona high school, Rev. T. S. Devitt gave the graduates some practical advice when he urged the girls to take a post graduate course in domestic science at home under their mothers, learning to clean, wash, iron and do plain sewing and cooking. In advising the boys, Dr. Devitt recommended that unless they were going to follow professions they do not go to college, for in business they would be further along in four years if they entered it now.

GOOD THINGS FOR THE HOGS

Prescriptions Given Will Not Cure Cholera, but They Will Keep Animals In Condition.

The following prescriptions will not cure hog cholera, but they will keep the hogs in good condition. Choose one which you will have prepared to give your hogs, say every 60 days, and at any time they seem out of condition:



Piney Woods Rooter, 2½ Years Old, Weight 50 Pounds—Has Been Kept In Pen and Fed All the Corn It Would Eat for 2½ Months.

1—Wood charcoal, one pound; sulphur, one pound; sodium chloride, two pounds; sodium bicarbonate, two pounds; sodium hyposulphite, two pounds; sodium sulphate, one pound; antimony sulphid, one pound. Pulverize thoroughly, mix well and give one tablespoonful to each 200 pounds of live weight of hogs treated once a day for several days.

2—Sulphur, two pounds; copperas, two pounds; madder, two pounds; black antimony, one-half pound; saltpetre, one-half pound; arsenic, two ounces. Mix with 12 gallons of water and give one pint to each hog. This will be sufficient to dose 100 hogs.

3—Salt, four pounds; black antimony, one pound; copperas, one pound; sulphur, one pound; saltpetre, one-quarter pound; wood ashes, one peck. Pulverize and mix thoroughly, moisten and put enough in a trough to prevent waste and put where hogs can have access to it at all times. If disposed to have cholera, they will eat it very freely; at other times they will eat less, or perhaps none at all.

SUCCESS WITH SMALL FRUIT

Knowledge of Market Requirements, Executive Ability and Experience Are Necessary.

To successfully harvest and market a crop of small fruit requires business ability of no mean order.

Because a person is successful in growing fruit it does not necessarily imply that he will make a success of the harvesting and selling part of the business. Still there is nothing about the work that should discourage the uninitiated.

The principal characteristics called into play are, a knowledge of market requirements, executive ability, experience and knowledge as to the characteristics of the different kinds and varieties of fruits

One of the first things to consider is the market, whether local, semi-local or distant. For long-distance shipping, only those varieties that are noted for firmness and long-keeping qualities should be used, and these must be picked before they are at their highest state of ripeness.

With nearby or local markets, however, the question becomes one of size and quality rather than one of firmness though firmness is desirable in any case. It is often an advantage to grade strawberries and if this is done it should be done by the pickers as they are removed from the vines. The grade should be made uniform throughout the package, but the top layers may be turned calyx down, greatly enhancing the attractiveness of the fruit. The package should be full.

To oversee a dozen or fifteen pickers is no small task. To secure the best work the overseer should be in the field among the pickers. Among the number will be those who will need watching. It is a good plan to reward the faithful ones at the close of the season. In general, generous treatment in dealing with pickers is returned four-fold in better service rendered.

The growers whose style of culture is up-to-date, that is to say, plenty of room for each plant so that the berries are large and no weeds or grass in the way, so that the berries may be easily and quickly gathered, will usually have no trouble in securing pickers. He has first choice for of course, every one will want to pick where picking is best.

Picking berries is at best a tedious, back-aching job. It takes grit to stick to it day by day, hence it is that the task should be made as agreeable as possible.

Use for Alfalfa.

Alfalfa can be stored in the silo, but it is much better to make hay of it and put corn in the silo. Alfalfa makes a higher quality of dry feed than shredded corn fodder and dry feed is necessary in addition to silage.

Where He Came In.

Grace was a country girl, whose parents sent her to the city to attend college. When the holidays came around and she came home, her mother gave a reception in her honor.

Some of the girl friends asked Grace to show them her new gowns. Obligingly she brought out several modish gowns, and, holding up a particularly pretty one of silk, she said: "Isn't this one perfectly beautiful? And just think, it came from a poor, little insignificant worm!"

Her hard-working father was seated near, watching the performance, and he replied:

"Yes, darn it, and I'm that worm!" —Lippincott's.

"I feel sorry for you. You ought not to be out in this kind of weather. You are a sick man," sair Dr. Blister.

"I am not feeling very well," replied Dr. Soonover.

"What doctor is treating you?"

"I am prescribing for myself."

"You shouldn't do that. You are liable to be arrested for attempted suicide."

HOW TO TREAT PIMPLES AND BLACKHEADS

For pimples and blackheads the following is a most effective and economical treatment: Gently smear the affected parts with Cuticura Ointment, on the end of the finger, but do not rub. Wash off the Cuticura Ointment in five minutes with Cuticura Soap and hot water and continue bathing for some minutes. This treatment is best on rising and retiring. At other times use Cuticura Soap freely for the toilet and bath, to assist in preventing inflammation, irritation and clogging of the pores, the common cause of pimples, blackheads, redness and roughness, yellow, oily, mothy and other unwholesome conditions of the skin.

Easily Accomplished.

Judge Hanington, when leader of the opposition in the New Brunswick legislature, representing the county of Westmoreland, was once delivering a vigorous address in the house against some measure of the government, then led by Mr. Blair.

"Oh, that my constituents in Westmoreland could hear me now," exclaimed the opposition leader in violent tones.

Mr. Blair motioned to an attendant. "Open the windows," he said.

The Source of Uric Acid

Eating too much is a common habit that does a lot of harm. Meat, especially, forms uric acid and the constant filtering of acid-laden blood weakens the kidneys. Uric acid causes rheumatic and nervous trouble, weakens the eyes, forms gravel and leads to dropsy and Bright's disease. Kidney weakness gives early warnings, however, such as backache and urinary disorders and can be stopped by prompt treatment.

Use Doan's Kidney Pills, the best recommended and most widely used kidney remedy.

ANNIE'S LOVE AFFAIR

By GEORGE MUNSON.

When Jim Maine went after anything he went after it tooth and nail. That was the spirit in which he went after Miss Martha Crowe's property.

Martha Crowe had had the reputation of a miser, but nobody imagined that, in addition to the cottage in which she and Miss Annie, her niece by marriage, dwelled, she had nine thousand dollars in the bank, the fruit of hoarding and clever investment. And the will that old Maine produced gave him everything except the cottage and the land on which it stood.

It was Annie's engagement to Tom Claflin that provoked the old woman's rage. Annie had been a drudge ever since her aunt adopted her at the age of ten, fifteen years before. Nobody had thought that the plain, quiet girl would ever marry. But Claflin, the young lawyer, saw underneath the plain exterior—saw the heart of gold and the sterling character and loving nature, long subdued and repressed, but not killed. Annie had longed to lavish her tenderness on the crabbed old woman—then, after years of vain effort to win her love, Tom had come along and claimed her.

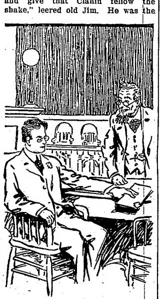
When the miserly old woman heard of it she expressed herself in characteristic fashion.

"Not one penny of my money will you get, you ungrateful child, if you leave me in my old age," she said.

"But, Aunt, we want you to make your home with us," protested the girl.

That only fanned the old woman's wrath. She sent for Maine. He was her only friend. He was an elder in some primitive tabernacle, and Miss Martha belonged to it. The congregation were narrow fanatics, self-righteous Pharisees who thought all human love an abomination.

"You'd best stay with your aunt and give that Claflin fellow the shake," leered old Jim. He was the richest man in the village, and had a reputation for graspingness. Little got through his fingers.



"It Takes a Big Man to Cross My Will."

The pair of them stormed at the girl until she fled to her room in terror. She had hoped to escape into a larger world with her marriage to Tom; but the plea of duty to her aunt broke her resolution. She gave him up.

At least, she would have given him up, only, the week following, her aunt died suddenly. She died in the midst of one of those scolding fits that made the girl's life gall and wormwood. And then Tom came and put his arms around Annie and told her that she was his, just the same, and that he had taken no notice of her letter, because he knew.

That was just like Tom. He always understood. And they meant to be very happy together. But Tom was as poor as a church mouse, and marriage would have been out of the question but for the money.

"You must take it, Tom," insisted the girl. "Take it as a loan, if you like, to help you in your profession. You will have clients galore in a few years. Don't make us both unhappy by refusing, Tom."

Before Tom Claflin had decided Jim Maine produced a will written by the old woman a month before she died, and signed by witnesses. It left all Miss Martha's money to him, stating that, on account of her ingratitude, Annie was to get only the cottage. That was worth two or three thousand—but it was only a small share in the comfortable estate.

Tom came to Annie. "That will is a forgery, my dear," he said. "Those witnesses are men who owe Maine money. They are in his power, and are of disreputable character. We shall fight it tooth and nail."

Annie protested. She did not want to fight about the money, she said. Maine was welcome to it. And she hated scandal. Besides that, she knew her aunt had borne her no love.

But Tom persuaded her. He knew that the girl's life had been an unhappy one, though she had never told him so. He knew that the will was forged. And he meant to send Maine to prison.

The case came up before the surrogate's court. Maine had defied and threatened Tom, but the young lawyer saw that the man was in a frenzy of fear. Still, he could not keep his fingers off the nine thousand dollars. And his witnesses were stanch to him.

On the day before the trial the young lawyer received a visit from a fellow lawyer in the next town.

"I heard about your case, Claflin," he said. "I think this puts a new light on the transaction, doesn't it?" And he threw a document upon the table. Tom picked it up. It was another will of Miss Martha's.

"She made that about a month ago," said the visitor. "Came over to Stapleton to do it, I guess, so that nobody in this town should know. Of course, it antedates the will you are fighting over, but—"

Claflin sat long in thought that evening.

"Tom, won't you withdraw at the last moment?" pleaded Annie in court the next morning. "Dear, we have the cottage—and, after all, that will may be genuine."

Tom said nothing but clasped her hand in his. And Annie resigned herself to her lover's will in the matter.

When the case was called, however, he amazed the court and spectators by saying:

"We do not accept this will as genuine, Your Honor, but, in deference to the wishes of my client we are willing to accept the sworn statement of Mr. Maine and his witness to the effect that the will is genuine, and to withdraw."

And the will was admitted to probate.

Maine was flushed with triumph. He was not the man to let well enough alone. The revulsion from his fears of prison proved too strong for his good sense. He came up to Tom in the court room, after the court had adjourned.

"Wall," he sneered, "I guess you did the wise thing in withdrawing, young man. You'd have lost your case, and I'd have had you driven out of town, too. It takes a big man to cross my will."

"I hope you'll enjoy your property," said Tom. "But why didn't you take the cottage, too, while you were about it? You threw away two or three thousand dollars there. And you might just as well have had it if you had had the nerve."

"What do you mean?" bellowed Maine truculently.

"I mean," said Tom, thrusting his face forward and looking the other squarely in the eye, "that if you hadn't been a thief and a rogue you would have got everything. Here is Miss Crowe's will, and it leaves you everything, cottage included."

He thrust the document under Jim Maine's face.

"It does, does it!" roared Maine. "Then I'll have it."

"No you won't" answered Claflin. "This will was executed three days before the forged one that has been admitted to probate."

JOHN C. C. MAYO'S CIGAR FUND

Multi-Millionaire Tells Story of How He Was Once Hard Up for a Smoke.

Twenty-five years ago John C. C. Mayo of Paintsville, Ky., was a struggling school teacher in the eastern Kentucky mountains, but before he was forty-five years of age he was the wealthiest citizen of Kentucky, with a fortune conservatively estimated at over ten million dollars.

"I was traveling by boat up the Big Sandy river with Mayo one early spring day," said a close personal friend recently, "when Mayo asked me to his stateroom. He opened his trunk and drew out $60,000 in gilt-edge bonds.

"'That's cigar money,' said he.

"'Pretty big smoke fund, isn't it, John?' I asked.

"'It's enough, I think,' he replied, 'but it realizes one of my ambitions. I remember when I was trying to interest capital in the coal mines up here, I used to go to Frankfort every session of the legislature. Of course, I had the cheapest room I could find, and when some one asked me to take lunch with him, I could fairly fall on his neck. I used to stand around the Capital hotel lobby much of the time, and it seemed that everybody smoked but me. The nearest I got to a cigar was on the outside of the counter case in the hotel lobby. Many a time I would have almost given a coal mine for a smoke, but I didn't have the nerve to let any one know how badly I wanted to smoke, and no one seemed to think I had any desire to smoke. I made up my mind if I ever did do anything with my coal options some of the first money was going into a cigar fund, and that fund was going into the strong box. This is the fund.'

"That was ten years ago, and so far as I know the fund is intact."

In many respects Mayo was unique among self-made millionaires in the country. His was the first great fortune ever built in Kentucky by a Kentuckian, from Kentucky resources only. His fortune grew from the meager earnings he saved from his salary as a country school teacher.—Louisville Courier-Journal.

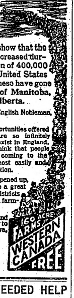
400,000 Settlers a Year



160 ACRE FARMS IN WESTERN CANADA FREE

Immigration figures show that the population of Canada increased during 1913, by the addition of 400,000 new settlers from the United States and Europe. Most of these have gone on farms in provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Lord William Percy, an English Nobleman, says:

"The possibilities and opportunities offered by the Canadian West are so infinitely greater than those which exist in England, that it seems absurd to think that people should be impeded from coming to the country where they can most easily and certainly improve their position.

New districts are being opened up, which will make accessable a great number of homesteads in districts especially adapted to mixed farming and grain raising.

MADE A PERSONAL APPEAL

Tailor's Desperate Endeavor to Make Convention Listen to "His Best Customer."

Registrar O'Loughlin of Brooklyn will think twice before he undertakes to address another convention of tailors. His own tailor led him into it.

O'Loughlin put on his openwork clothes and sat on the platform. Tailors, cutters, buyers, city salesmen, bushelmen, models, bosses, other items of the tailoring industry buzzed loudly on the floor. Now and then some man would enter and be greeted with applause.

"That," said O'Loughlin's tailor and guide, "is Max Schleiner, he is the buyer for Clipperstein & Menx."

Hours O'Loughlin sat there. At last he was introduced as the next speaker. No one paid the least attention to him. Conversation rose toward the heights of emotion. After three false starts O'Loughlin sat down. He was angry enough for arson. His tailor saw the black rage on his brow.

"Ladies and gentlemen," he bellowed, whacking at the table with his gavel. "'You should listen to Mr. O'Loughlin. He is my best customer.—Pittsburgh Chronicle Telegraph.

Charles Lamb and Hastings.

Hastings, which is to indulge in a pageant of heroes, was an object of particular aversion to Charles Lamb. "I love town or country," he wrote, "but this detestable Cinque Port is neither. If it were what it was in its primitive shape, and what it ought to have remained, a fair, honest fishing town and no more, it were something—with a few straggling fishermen's huts scattered about, artless as its cliffs, and with their materials filched from them—it were something. I could abide to dwell with Meshech; to associate with fisher swain and smugglers. There are, or I dream there are, many of this latter occupation here. Their faces become the place. I like the smuggler. He is the only honest thief. He robs nothing but the revenue, an abstraction I never greatly cared about."—London Chronicle.

The Middle Course.

Senator Root at a reception was discussing the Mexican situation.

"Steer a middle course," he said to an extremist. "These extreme ideas are always wrong.

"Thus at tea, one young girl asked another:

"'And where are you going this summer, dear?'

"'From the way mother talks,' was the reply, 'you'd think we were going to Newport. From the way father talks you'd think we were going to starve. But I suppose we'll steer a middle course, as usual, and put in a fortnight at a $12 Atlantic City boarding house.'"

Complicated Courtesies.

"I tried to apologize to my wife," said Mr. Meekton, "but it was confusing."

"Why?"

"Every time I tried to say anything she insisted on saluting back, word for word."

Under the Circumstances the Probabilities Are That Congratulatory Visit Was Postponed.

Corporal Jenkins married "on the strength," and in due course his wife presented him with a son and heir. His pals all flocked around to tender their congratulations and incidentally taste Bill's bitter beer.

Private Jones was on his way when he met Sergeant Brown returning.

"Where are you off to?" asked the latter.

"Oh, I'm going around to see Bill and wish him luck with that youngster of his," was the answer.

"Then you're too late," said the sergeant solemnly.

"Wot!" exclaimed Private Jones "Surely it hasn't gone and died?"

"No, the youngster's all right, but the barrel is out!" was the grim response.—London Tit-Bits.

Of Course Not.

Business Is on Its Way Out Again.

Speaking of the business outlook the Manufacturers' Record says that a group of New York men had gathered in a rather mournful spirit, and as they discussed the business outlook, which seemed to them to grow darker and darker, one wit in the party, turning to a staid, much perturbed financier, said:

"Mr. Blank, can you tell me how far a dog can run into the woods?"

Mr. Blank, somewhat irritated at such a trivial remark at a time of serious discussion, rather tartly replied that "he supposed a dog could run into the woods just as far as he wanted to."

"No," said the questioner, "when he has run half-way into the woods he is then running out of the woods."

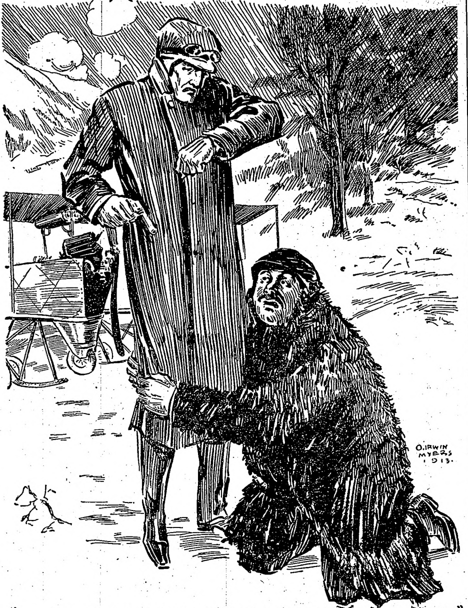
THE DEVIL CHAIR

A Chronicle of the Strange Adventures of John Haynes and His Gyroscope Vehicle

THE KINGDOM OF THE NORTH

By H. M. EGBERT

(Copyright by W. G. Chapman)



O. IRWIN MYERS 1913.

"I'LL BE YOUR DOG AND FOLLOW YOU WHEREVER YOU GO—I'LL—I'LL"

When John Haynes escaped from the penitentiary at Nokomis Falls, by aid of the marvelous gyroscope which he had invented, and set to work to bring retribution upon those who had falsely imprisoned him in order to obtain his western lands, he planned that the punishment should in each case, as far as possible, be commensurate with the crime. The news of his return, the swiftness with which his blows fell, paralyzed and dismayed the gang of swindlers who had defrauded him. They fled in haste to all parts of the country, to Europe even, and, one by one, they encountered their victim's inexorable vengeance.

To the smaller fry—the crooked lawyers' clerks, land agents, all who had been constrained to play secondary parts in the conspiracy, Haynes felt contemptuously indifferent. It was more by accident than by intention that he came upon Riggs in Newark, New Jersey. Riggs had played a very small part in the affair; he had been agent for the stolen Nokomis lands and had sold them to those who, in good faith, purchased them in building lots. When Haynes' escape broke up the confederacy, Riggs fled eastward, and in due course resumed his occupation in Newark, where he sold lots upon the New Jersey marshes to purchasers from other states.

Haynes was not looking for Riggs, and, having found him, would have forgotten him in his quest for those of the chief culprits who still remained unpunished. But Riggs was weakly and fundamentally dishonest. He had sold half an acre of what he called "choicest building land" to an elderly lady from Texas, a certain Miss Matthews, with whom Haynes had become well acquainted, and had succeeded in ratifying the deal before she inspected her water-logged territory. Haynes had a few days of leisure about that time, and he took up the case for her, acting in the guise of her nephew. Riggs had not changed, but Haynes had—greatly. Riggs did not have the slightest remembrance of the man who appeared before him in the little tin-roofed real estate shanty located upon the edge of that easternmost tentacle of Newark which stretches out toward Hoboken.

"You've got to take those lots back, Mr. Riggs," said Haynes warmly. "They were sold under false pretenses."

"Can't be done, sir," answered the other, puffing busily at his cigar. "They were sold in good faith and bought according to law."

"They're under water. Who's going to build upon a swamp?"

"Why don't she sue for her money?" asked Riggs insolently.

"See here, Mr. Riggs," said Haynes, "you're a greedy, unprincipled land shark, and you've trimmed many victims. But you aren't going to trim Miss Matthews. That seven thousand is nearly all she has. I'll let you get out of it with a thousand."

"Why should I take a thousand when I've got the seven?" murmured Riggs lazily. He was a fat, bloated man, of great physical strength, although unwieldy, and he was not in the least terrified by Haynes.

"All right, if you won't there's no more to be said, I suppose," he answered, shrugging his shoulders.

Riggs turned round in his swivel chair and leered at him.

"Say, what's your game, young feller?" he asked. "That put-up stuff about being Miss Matthews' nephew didn't go with me. Why? Because yesterday she asked me to give back her property on the ground that she was an orphan and alone in the world. What were you trying—to skin me for five hundred of that thousand you spoke of?"

Haynes could not have had a better opening. He drew up a chair and sat down beside the fat real estate agent. "Better than that," he said quietly.

"What then?" asked Riggs, interested.

"The old lady's a bit wrong here," said Haynes, tapping his forehead. "She didn't mind the water, but she wanted her money back to invest in a perpetual motion machine instead. She had a visit from an angel who advised her to buy stock in it. I was the angel."

"What—the—dickens!" soliloquized Riggs, swinging round swiftly and staring hard at the other.

"Yep," said Haynes, nodding his head and buttonholing the real estate man—a mannerism useful for purposes of emphasis. "She's as rich as Croesus, but all her money's tied up in conservative enterprises, and since she's begun to grow dippy she's been drawing it out and buying gold bricks and white elephants. Her father left her two hundred thousand."

Riggs whistled.

"I trailed her from Texas," Haynes pursued. "I've bought her shares in every outlawed property that can't be put on the market. But, as I was saying, the angel advised her to invest in perpetual motion stock. I did it—I have a little monoplane out in the marshes."

"You—don't say!" said Riggs, staring thoughtfully at the other. "Why are you telling this to me?" he suddenly asked, suspiciously.

"Because," said Haynes, looking straight at the other, "I came to Newark specially to get your aid. I was advised by a friend of mine—Chauncey E. Robertson of Benderville."

Riggs fell back in his chair and his face went white. Robertson had been a leading spirit in the Nokomis land frauds; and Riggs had thought that none of his confederates would cross his path again. He looked at Haynes keenly, trying to learn how much he knew. But he did not remember having seen him before. Five years in prison had made a great alteration in the Englishman's appearance, and Riggs had only seen him once previously.

"Don't get scared," said Haynes cheerfully. "It's all right. Robertson mentioned you as a likely partner in a deal I was contemplating, and I intended to look you up before Providence threw this easy chance in my way. I trailed Miss Matthews up here from Texas, sounded her on spiritualism, and found her ready to take a hook. She's seen me flying down from the clouds on a dark night four miles out in the marshes, and as my monoplane was draped in white she was quite ready to receive a special revelation. See here, Mr. Riggs," he said, suddenly coming to the point, "there's another revelation booked for tomorrow night on the old pike where it crosses the Passaic. I've got the perpetual motion stock all ready and she has been told to bring along her check book. She wants twenty-five thousand dollars' worth, and she's only nineteen thousand in the bank; that's why she wants her money for the lots. Are you game to come along and bring the money?"

"Well," said Riggs, smiling, "under the circumstances it would be unjust to force those lots upon the poor old lady. Yes, I think I can manage it—if you'll put up a couple of thousand as a sign of your confidence in me," he added, smiling. "I'm no rube, you know, Mr.—you never told me your name."

"Tupman," said Haynes promptly. "I understand. You shall have your two thousand by the first mail tomorrow, a certified check. I guess you won't leave your happy little business to run away with it. And meet me with the old lady's check where the bridge crosses the pike at nine o'clock."

"It's going to be mighty cold," sighed Riggs, looking out across the snow-covered, ice-bound marshes. "However, I think I can manage to be there."

Riggs was wrapped in his fur overcoat when he met Haynes at the appointed time, and even so was none too comfortable, for a brisk northwester had sent the thermometer down to about the zero point. When Haynes greeted him he asked for the machine.

"It's over here," said Haynes, drawing him across the frozen flats to where a dark, amorphous shape broke through the blackness. It was the aeroplane. Haynes stooped and touched the gyroscope which stood within. Instantly a purring, humming sound became audible. Riggs started back in momentary alarm.

"What's that?" he cried. Then, recovering his self-possession, "the engine, of course," he said nervously.

"No, the perpetual motion machine," said Haynes laughingly. "Step in."

"But the old lady?" asked Riggs, hesitating.

"O, she'll be down by the lots she's bought," Haynes answered. "I couldn't bring her down here. We're the angels, you know; we have to go to her. Jump in. You've got the check she gave you?"

"Yes," answered Riggs, as he took his seat. "Pretty risky, flying in the night, isn't it?"

"Not a bit," answered Haynes. "We'll be there in three or four minutes. Ready?" He started the motor, and the aeroplane kicked up the frozen clods, grated along the surface of the marshes, and slowly rose into the air until, gaining her poise, she whirled off through the night. Riggs clutched the seat and vertical bar in terror. It was his first ride. He could see nothing in the darkness though, far in the distance, the lights of Newark gleamed.

Haynes removed his hands from the wheel.

The gyroscope, humming busily underneath, would maintain the machine perfectly steady, upon an even bottom, so long as he chose to fly; secure against all changes of wind, he set the course of the machine due south and turned to his companion.

"Look at me Riggs," he thundered suddenly, bawling into his companion's ear. "You don't remember me, do you?"

Riggs, still clutching his seat, raised his head in sudden panic. "Why—why—" he stammered.

"I'll cut short your soliloquy by telling you my name," said Haynes. "I am John Haynes of the Nokomis property. Oh, I see your memory is improving!"

Riggs peered at him through the darkness, his lips parted, at first incredulous until the full force of the revelation struck home to him. Then, overcome with horror, he clutched at the bar, fell forward, and, hugging this frail support as a man shipwrecked might grasp at a spar, he bowed his head in agony and fear. Too well he knew the relentless character of the man with whom he had to deal. The terror of Haynes, which had struck home to all after the first of the conspirators had met with his deserts, had not failed to include Riggs in its all embracing panic. But in the security of that Jersey town he had believed himself safe from pursuit and from detection.

"Why have you sought me out?" He sobbed and whined like a whipped child. "I had to hold my job. I had no part in the planning of the conspiracy. What are you going to do with me?"

"I'll take those checks first," answered Haynes. "Miss Matthews' and mine."

"And then you'll let me go?" begged Riggs. Though far superior to the other in strength he appeared nerveless as a bag of jelly as he cowered there, terrified by the swiftly moving machine, prostrated by this unexpected encounter. Beneath him gleamed the waters of the sea over which they were now flying almost cloud high, and only the lights of moving steamships told him that, far below them, must be New York harbor. It was intensely cold.

"Give them to me or I'll pitch you out of the machine!" Haynes thundered.

"But—I can't let go," faltered the other. "Take them from my pocketbook. It has Miss Matthews' check for the first payment of two thousand inside."

Haynes took the leather folder from his companion's breast pocket and put back the heavy wallet, stuffed out with bills so that, like its owner, it seemed on the verge of apoplexy.

"Where's my check?" he asked.

"I mailed it to the bank this afternoon," faltered the other.

"No matter. I had it stopped," answered Haynes, smiling. "And now let me tell you, if ever you get back and show your face in Newark again I'll kill you for sure."

"Then you aren't going to kill me now?" demanded Riggs, and the passing of his chief terror gave back to him something of his courage. "It's mighty cold up here, Mr. Haynes," he said with an effort at jocularity. "Suppose you turn her head toward Newark and let me get to bed. Tomorrow I'll settle up my affairs and quit; I swear you won't see me again—or Miss Matthews either."

"My good Riggs," said Haynes solemnly, "you will be a good deal colder before I get through with you."

"Where are you going to take me?" cried the other. "Ain't that the bay down there? For the Lord's sake, let's get over the land somewhere—in case the gasoline gives out."

"It won't give out," Haynes answered. "This machine has a double supply. One part comes from the gasoline tank that feeds the motor, the other from the one which supplies the gyroscope."

"The gyroscope!" gasped Riggs. He knew how, by the invention of this fiendish machine, Haynes had escaped the systematic search of his enemies and how, using it, he had run them down and devoted them to terrible reprisal. "The gyroscope!" he repeated in helpless horror. He looked down again; he was not so nauseated now by the flight through the clouds. To him it seemed that the machine was standing still. Haynes read his thought and made haste to answer him.

"Yes, the gyroscope," he answered, placing a mocking emphasis upon the words. "How fast do you think we are going?"

"Twenty miles an hour?" suggested Riggs.

"Three hundred and seventy-five," answered Haynes briskly. "Doesn't seem credible, does it? But the gyroscope cuts the air like a screw and draws a back draught; that's why you don't feel the breeze, which otherwise would blow us from our seats. Now, I'll tell you where you are going, Riggs. You are a land agent. You're hungry for land, especially building lots, aren't you? You've been in land all your life, lied for it, thieved for it, and sent innocent men to the penitentiary for it. I am going to give you all the land you will want for the remainder of your life. You said that was the bay, I believe? No, Riggs, that is the Atlantic ocean, and we are now two hundred miles northeast of New York and heading for Labrador!"

"Labrador!" gasped the other.

"An excellent place for you," Haynes answered cheerfully.

"You're not going to dump me down in Labrador and fly home again!"

"I hope to, Mr. Riggs. And please consider that we furnish transportation free—not even a coupon is necessary."

"For God's sake, listen," shouted his unhappy companion. "I've got twenty thousand. I'll give it to you if you'll put me down somewhere in a civilized country. Let me off at Bar Harbor and you'll have time to cash the check I'll give you and get away before I can return. Don't take my life. If you kill me, who did so little, what will you do to the rest?"

"I've settled the rest," responded his companion, and an angry scowl came over his features as he remembered the tragic encounters which he had with the members of the land gang.

He touched the lever and the machine dipped until she was flying not more than a hundred feet above the earth. There was no water in sight; they were traversing a forest belt. "Maine!" said Haynes, and again his companion noted that the machine seemed almost motionless, an astonishing optical illusion produced by the incredible swiftness of that astonishing journey. Haynes flew higher again and dipped into the fog of the clouds.

So, hour after hour, they flew. And all the while his miserable companion shivered at his side.

The machine flew lower; water appeared. "The Gulf of St. Lawrence," explained Haynes, and pointed skyward. "Do you see Pegasus?" he asked. "That constellation is not now visible in lower latitudes. And there is Cassiopeia. Riggs," he chuckled, "what a fine story you can put into your next prospectus about the starry heavens!"

The other flung himself upon his knees and grasped at his companion's hands.

"Forgive me," he babbled, "and I'll work and slave for you always. I'll help to bring the conspirators to justice. I know where most of them are to be found; there must be some of them left."

"Who?" Haynes asked scornfully.

"Robertson."

"He's in the penitentiary, serving a sentence for forgery."

"My God! Judge Charteris, then. He was bribed to send you up for fourteen years. Don't leave that old fox out of the reckoning."

"O, he?" answered Haynes carelessly. "I've got him in a lunatic asylum."

"Jack Poole, then."

"Dead. He was the first."

"Jenkins, Robertson's law clerk—he was in with them. Frank Staples! Byers!"

"They've all got what was coming to them," said Haynes grimly, and again he felt that torturing sense of the impotence of revenge.

"I tell you what I'll do, Riggs," said Haynes presently, apparently arousing himself from a prolonged meditation. "To send you into the interior of Labrador would probably mean death to you, and since so many worse scoundrels have been spared that extreme penalty, I think perhaps I may give you a chance for life also. I'll deposit you in the forests a hundred and fifty miles north of Quebec. You'll be able to make civilization in four or five days if you're a good walker, and you'll get some needed exercise. When you get down look for the Pole Star, turn your back on her, and go in the opposite direction till sunrise. Then steer a course by the sun until the Pole Star comes out again. My, Riggs, what a number of building lots you'll cover in those few days."

Riggs sobbed—he was crushed, and the frightful conflict of emotions, hope struggling with despair and terror, had wholly unnerved him. Twenty minutes later he was incapable of response. Haynes shut off the gyroscope and motor, and the machine fluttered to earth in the midst of a semi-open country, in which pine trees grew sparingly. All round were the illimitable wastes. Haynes got out of the machine, and, at his command, the other followed him.

"Keep away from the machine, Riggs," said Haynes, drawing a revolver from his coat pocket. His numbed hands could hardly hold it, but Riggs was not aware of that, nor that the muzzle described wide circles round him—he was too broken in spirit. He cowered, shivering and stamping his feet upon the frozen ground.

"Here's a box of matches, Riggs," said Haynes drawing one from his overcoat pocket and tossing it to him. "You'll be able to light a few fires. Don't waste them. I don't know just exactly where we are," he added in mock apology. "I'm afraid I've taken you too far to the north—we're almost beyond the timber belt. However, you'll strike a river if you look round, for the land is well watered—you must add that to your prospectus. Remember that all streams flow into Hudson bay, and so follow them toward the source southward. You may fall in with some Indians. You—really, Riggs, I ought not to be instructing you in your own business. I'll have to say good-by anyway, now; I must be back at Newark by morning."

He retired backward toward the machine, keeping the revolver by an effort between his frozen fingers, which had no more sensation than sticks of wood, and watching Riggs warily. He expected a hostile rush, and the rush came—but it was not hostile. Riggs flung himself upon him and slid to the ground, holding his knees.

"Let me come back," he shrieked. "My God, man, you've had all the revenge that you can need. You've turned my hair white by this night's work. I'll give you everything I have—my property, all my money—I'll be your dog and follow you wherever you go—I'll—I'll—"

Haynes thrust the wretched man from him and entered the machine. He felt an intense disgust arising in him at this abjectness. This was the stuff of which all his enemies seemed made! The thought that such dogs had been able to rob and imprison him, to tear him from his wife and daughter, was intolerable at that moment. However, seeing that Riggs made no further attempt to rise, and that he was liable to freeze to death in the bitter cold, he gathered some fallen twigs and little branches of dead wood, and, with a strip of brick-bark from a near-by tree, kindled a fire. Then he re-entered the machine. Once more Riggs rushed toward him and tried to enter. Haynes thrust his fist into his face. Riggs did not release his hold. Haynes pressed the pistol muzzle against the other's throat.

"I'll fire at three," he shouted. "One—two—"

Riggs dropped to the ground with a despairing groan and, a moment later, the monoplane was beating skyward.

Once started on his homeward flight Haynes flapped his frozen hands against his breast, rubbed them with a little snow which he had scooped up from the ground; and then, when he felt the blood tingle in them, he suddenly began to laugh. Rocking with uncontrollable mirth, he hardly held the monoplane against the countering winds. The humor of this revenge—the most self-satisfying of all, dulled the sense of his insatiable wrongs.

But Riggs, cowering over a big fire of wood, shivered in the desolation of his despair. He did not know where he should turn. To face the solitude of those dreadful forests, to find a stream and follow it, seemed like the promptings of a madman's brain. He might as well have flung his enemy out of the machine and followed him, to find his end speedily—better that than to be condemned to die of hunger and thirst and cold in this far northern, frozen wilderness.

Presently day broke and, in the gathering light, he counted the matches in the box. There were sixteen of them—sixteen fires at most if he should choose to start on that impossible journey. Why not rather wait where he had been left until the end should come? There, at least, there would be warmth. There he need not fear that gripping frost. Wrapped in his furs he could lie down among the encircling fires and sleep his life away.

Then he must gather wood; he must find and stack cords of it so that the end should not find him fireless. Fire was all to him now, more than food, almost more than his life. It was his father and mother too; he loved it with the intensity of a maniac. Almost insane from terror, filled only with this thought that possessed his mind, he began plunging through the undergrowth, gathering sticks and twigs. Again and again he staggered back, bearing each time a huge armful of dead brush, which he flung upon the blaze, and at last he cowered beside it again, mumbling and muttering, while the sun's rays touched him with a blaze of gold.

Then shouts echoed among the trees. At first he did not turn his head, thinking them but the fragment of a dream. When he was sure he heard them he did not dare to answer from fear they would cease. He crouched beside his blaze and did not stir nor look up until a man in overalls broke into the circle of the blaze and began tossing the sticks aside and stamping on them. Then, realizing at last that life had been restored to him, Riggs fell on his knees before his rescuer and wept like a child.

The other ceased his work and stood staring in amazement at the strange fur coated figure.

"What are you doing here?" he asked, subduing his tone. "Why did you light that fire on this estate?"

"What estate? Where am I?"

"Camford, New Jersey."

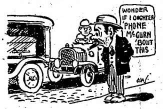
"Corpse" Raids an Alleged Gamblers' Stronghold



WONDER IF I OUGHTER PHONE McGURN 'BOUT THIS

CHICAGO.—In Forest Park the dust lay thick upon the road. Occasionally it was stirred by a passing automobile, but more frequently by some funeral cortege on its way to the cemetery. At Twelfth street and Hannah avenue William McGurn operated a saloon. In the room above the bar on the second floor there were telephones, racing charts, playing cards, poker chips and dice—until the other day. Mr. McGurn, according to Charles W. Peters, chief deputy sheriff, was a cautious man. He acted on the theory that an ounce of prevention was worth a court full of lawyers.

So cautious was he, according to Mr. Peters, that all about his saloon at a radius of two miles he stationed "lookouts." These "minute men" furnished the saloon with immediate information of the approach of all strangers.

For some time Mr. Peters had his eye on Mr. McGurn and the little room above the saloon. The chief deputy sheriff polished up his star and went to the home of his assistant, Virtus Rohn, 5007 Washington boulevard.

"Virtie," said Mr. Peters, "I have some bad news for you."

"What's that?" asked Mr. Rohn.

"You're dead," announced the deputy sheriff. "You died this afternoon. I'm arranging for your funeral now. We're going to have a regular procession."

"Good night!" said Mr. Rohn, or words to that effect.

But Mr. Peters was determined. Thirty minutes later an automobile hearse, equipped with a coffin and other necessary paraphernalia, drew up in front of the house. Six black-clad "mourners" occupied another machine. The other automobiles were filled with "pallbearers" and friends of the "deceased." The "lookouts" were deceived.

Suddenly the mourners became active. "Corpse" and "mourners" raided the saloon.

"I said we'd 'pull' this place if we had to 'kill' a man to do it," said Mr. Peters.

Happenings When Clocks Were Set Ahead an Hour

WHAT KIND O' TIME ARE YOU RUNNIN' BY ?

CLEVELAND, OHIO.—"General Chaos," known and famed wherever the sun shines, strolled into Cleveland bringing eastern time with him and covered the bodies of nervous persons with goose flesh. Sixty perfectly good minutes were lost, and when the hunt for them began arguments without number were started.

Taxicab and transfer companies caught the brunt of the debates, and mildly excited patrons, nervous for fear they would miss their train, talked time with chauffeurs and drivers until the situation in some instances became almost alarming.

In front of the Hollenden hotel a large woman, whose expression betokened authority, backed a boy-sized chauffeur against his machine. "Are you running by eastern, central, sun time or guess?" she inquired.

"We are showing a complete line of time this morning. Take your pick," answered the youth. "But I'll tell you the truth, I'm running by guess today."

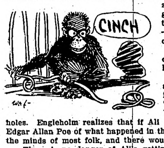
Bill Smith wouldn't turn his watch ahead Friday and he waited five minutes longer in the morning for a car because the rush hour extras had gone.

The boss scowled as he sneaked into the office and glanced significantly at the clock.

He was to meet his wife at two and give her tickets to the matinee. Wifey missed the show because Bill showed up at three.

Bill arrived home to a cold dinner because wifey had adopted eastern time, and—perhaps she remembered the show she missed.

Orang-Outang Ties Knot in Half-Inch Iron Bar



NEW YORK.—Ali, the big orang-outang of the Bronx zoo, is going to have a new house with three-quarter-inch steel bars instead of his present one-half-inch iron stays. Following his transfer from Hagenback's in Berlin to the zoo on May 5, Ali passed a few sluggish days and then awoke to the fact that he has a reputation to live up to—the reputation of being the biggest orang-outang in captivity.

It became evident at once that the cage fixed up by Keeper Fred Engleholm was a misfit by several sizes.

Ali tested his prison the other day and tied a fair imitation of a bowknot in one of the half-inch iron bars. Then he bent most of the remaining bars, opening more or less terrifying holes. Engleholm realizes that if Ali should get out, the gruesome tale of Edgar Allan Poe of what happened in the Rue Morgue would be uppermost in the minds of most folk, and there would be a great deal of unpleasantness.

There is no danger of Ali's getting out before his new cage is ready. The bulk that goes with his 215 pounds cannot be squeezed through the openings he has made. But there is enough peril to make the keepers wary of going too close within the fence inclosing the cage.

City Hall Cat Actually Has a Correspondence

PHILADELPHIA, PA.—It is not often that a cat's mail becomes so heavy that he must have a secretary, but this is the fact with Strike, the pet feline of the electrical bureau at city hall. Strike actually has a correspondence—purely a social correspondence. It developed through no effort on his part, but because persons visiting this city happened to see him and admired him and his tricks so much that they have insisted upon sending him letters and postcards on leaving here. His daily mail amounts to two letters and three or more postcards.

Of course, Strike does not actually employ a secretary, but his mail became heavy and had to be answered. Strike can do a lot of intelligent things, but he cannot write, so Jim Rourke, an attache of the bureau, has to act as Strike's secretary.

Although Strike cannot read, he appears fully to understand when one of his letters is read to him. He assumes and maintains a position of careful attention as each letter is read. If the letter is one in answer to a letter he received, he appears particularly attentive. His objections are noted by dragging his paw over the floor.

Strike is a truly wonderful cat. He came into the world as a very lowly, uneducated feline, but has so improved his mentality that he is now a feline of high degree. He was a kitten when he first entered the electrical bureau. His name came to him through the fact that during the street car strike of 1910 he was thrown by a striking motorman's wife at a non-union motorman.

CONGRESSMAN KEATING'S ANCESTORS

© HARRIS & EWING

Representative Keating of Colorado, when a small boy, was taken from Missouri to the Centennial state. The family settled at a small place called Greeley, in honor of the great Horace.

The inhabitants were all prim New Englanders, whose ancestors had come over in the Mayflower, and whose talk was only of their lineage. Keating was the only kid at school who was Irish and not long on American forefathers who had fought in the Revolution. And this fact was a cause of constant humiliation to him, for the other children at school boasted daily in history lesson of an uncle at Bunker Hill or a grandfather at Yorktown.

So one day young Keating made up a story. He invented a wonderful forefather and his glorious deeds; and when he told it to the breathless, admiring class, he was the hero of the recess hour. His mother upbraided him for telling a falsehood in school. "I couldn't just help it," he replied. "Those other boys are always bragging about their ancestors and I had to have some to keep up with the rest."

Yet the fact is, Keating is of ancient Irish lineage, and of its "bluest" blood.

KETTNER IS ON THE MOVE

© HARRIS & EWING

"I'm thinking of breaking into poetry and writing a philosophic ode on the mutability of mundane affairs, with metaphors and similes and things in it," confided Representative Kettner, from the San Diego, Cal., district. "I'll have something to say about being like a leaf afloat on the chancing tides of fate and how, just as you've gotten your little card house nicely built, something joggles your elbow and spills the milk—or whatever's poetry for spilling the milk.

"It's experience that inspires me," continued the representative from the clime of climate. "Nine years ago I said to myself, 'Come, I shall pick out a suitable spot, build me and my family a home there and settle down for the rest of my life.' So, after carefully weighing a score of localities, I determined on Visalia, Cal.

"I bought me a ranch near by, built me a house that will outlast the monument, put up fences, barns and other improvements so permanent that they will echo to Gabriel's trump. Then we planted ourselves there and cried aloud: 'Behold us! This is our home forever and aye!'

"Three years from that day I was in the insurance business in San Diego!

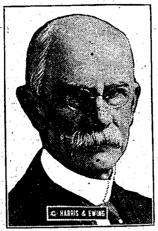
"And then I said, 'Now, I am fixed for good. I shall tie myself in a hard knot to my business here and nothing but a universal cataclysm shall remove me!'

"And three years later I was in congress!"

"Are you going to stay in congress?" queried his visitor.

"That depends upon a higher power," replied Mr. Kettner. "A greater than I, in whose hands I am but as an atom—my constituents!"

SENATOR THOMAS TELLS OF BIG TUMBLE



© HARRIS & EWING

"To tumble down a mine shaft to a depth equal to the height of a fifteen-story skyscraper is a trick anybody can turn if he is careless enough around a mining camp," said Senator Charles S. Thomas of Colorado, who is one of the most eminent mining lawyers in the West and also one of the early settlers in the Centennial state.

"But to come through such an experience alive is a feat few can achieve," he continued. "Yet that is just what happened to a man I knew in Colorado. A fellow named Jim Dorris of Leadville performed this Fall of Man act in 1881 and went through an experience enough to kill ten men, yet came out as chipper as though he had been lying in a feather bed.

"Jim slipped at the top of the shaft of the Cleora mine and fell a sheer 297 feet to the hard rock bottom, while a 300-pound ore-bucket came clattering down on top of him. Of course, we all thought he would have to be brought up again in a box, but Jim came out with only a few severe bruises.

STEFANSSON'S ARCTIC PARTY SAFE

Brief cable dispatches from St. Michael and Nome indicate that when Vilhjalmur Stefansson's exploring ship Karluk was crushed in the Arctic near Herald island, northeast of Siberia, January 16 last, the men saved all their instruments, supplies, dogs and food and left only the crushed hulk and its coal cargo when they headed east over the ice to camp on Wrangell island.

The experience of the Karluk proves that the drift of the ice sheet from Point Barrow is not northerly, as had been supposed, but westerly. Both Stefansson and Amundsen had believed that a ship entering the pack at Point Barrow could be carried cross the pole and to Greenland. Probably the shipwrecked men passed the winter in comfort, having dogs to carry them on hunting expeditions.

It is expected that the Canadian government will authorize Capt. Robert A. Bartlett, who is at St. Michael, where he arrived after a dog team and sea journey from Wrangell island, to engage a ship to go to the island and bring off the 18 men marooned there.

NATIONAL CAPITAL AFFAIRS

Washington Explorer Finds Strange Cave Men

WASHINGTON.—Caves hewn in the solid rocks of sugarloaf mountains, sometimes to the depth of 150 feet, large enough to hold from 1,500 to 2,000 people. Men who think nothing of running 40 and 50 miles a day without taking a drink of water.

People who never set eyes on fruits or vegetables.

Towns of 5,000 to 6,000 inhabitants, in which there is not a building, the people living in holes in the earth.

A land of no shadows between 8 a. m. and 5 p. m.

A nation in which women are never seen.

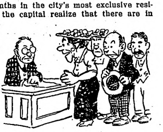
These are some of the wonders described by Frank Edward Johnson, the explorer and lecturer and contributing editor of the National Geographic Magazine, who arrived in Washington after an absence of almost two years, spent among the troglodyte tribes of southern Tunisia. Mr. Johnson gave out his first interview since his return to the United States, after reporting to the National Geographic society in Washington.

While in Tunisia Mr. Johnson conducted extensive researches among the buried Roman cities, and traced the old Roman highways, which have been hidden for centuries by the shifting sands of the Sahara. He succeeded in following for 300 miles the route of the road that was built from Carthage to Leptis Magna and to Alexandria nearly two thousand years ago.

"On the trip just concluded," said Mr. Johnson, "I came into a more intimate contact with the innermost lives of the peoples of the extreme southern Tunisia than ever before, and I had an unequaled opportunity to study them at closer range than any foreigner has ever enjoyed. There are probably more than one hundred thousand of these people in a section hitherto supposed to be almost uninhabitable. They are pursuing an exceedingly primitive life.

"All the troglodyte strongholds are difficult of approach. Their warriors could see the enemy approaching for many miles, unless they came by night, and then the zigzag path that led up to the great walls, worn smooth by centuries of hard use, with a surface like polished marble, was too dangerous, for a stumble meant sudden death on the rocks hundreds of feet below. It is difficult even for the mountain goats born and bred there."

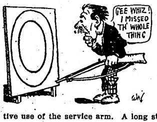
Capital Folk Scramble for Rent-Free Houses



THERE'S a scramble on among several hundred Washingtonians for rent-free houses during the summer months in the city's most exclusive residential districts. Few people outside the capital realize that there are in this city scores of beautiful and costly homes which are turned over to caretakers, sometimes without rent, and with coal, gas and electric light bills paid. On some occasions, even, caretakers are paid a nominal sum to live in the houses.

Now is the season when these caretakers are the busiest. Those who have had these positions in the past are the most active and they besiege almost daily the various real estate offices in the city. For this business is one of the hardest for real estate men to look after. In the first place they must be able to judge character "on the jump" and be able to pick men and women who would be capable and honest. Then after selecting the names of applicants the agents have to investigate their standing and trustworthiness. In the selection of the tenants widows almost always have first choice. A good widow with children is always regarded as the best caretaker.

Uncle Sam Needs Rifle Ranges for Civilians



GEE WHIZ! I MISSED TH' WHOLE THING

WITH the probability that citizen soldiery may be called to national service, the national board for promotion of rifle practise of the war department has issued a statement explaining the need of rifle ranges for practise, which has been made possible by the present congress in providing for the free distribution of rifles and ammunition to civilian rifle clubs and school cadets.

"Again we are faced with the possibility of sending untrained youths from their homes to the battlefield," the statement says. "Recruits can be taught to march, drill, and take care of themselves in the field in a comparatively short period, but such is not the case with the care and effective use of the service arm. A long step in the right direction was taken by the present congress when it enacted a law, through a paragraph in the army appropriation bill, authority for the war department to issue rifles and ammunition free to certain civilians.

"It is a fundamental principle of national defense that citizens should be trained in the use of the service arm. Rifle instruction is the keynote of national defense of Switzerland. If we were to train our citizens in the same proportion as that small republic, we would have about 3,000,000 trained civilian expert riflemen.

Varied Lot of Plants Grown by the Government

IN CONNECTION with its investigations, the Smithsonian institution undertook some years ago the collecting of a series of cactuses. Not only herbarium specimens, but many examples of living plants were secured.

The problem of the care of these living plants while under observation was solved through the co-operation of the department of agriculture, which assigned special greenhouse No. 7, at Fourteenth and B streets northwest, for housing them. Today a veritable desert flourishes in it, filled with all kinds of strange desert plants, especially cactuses from North and South America, of which there are perhaps in the neighborhood of five thousand specimens.

The collection has much to attract the ordinary visitor. No such collection in Europe has so many unique and rare species. Each pot contains a label which gives the key number to record books giving the history of each plant. The collection contains about twenty-five species of the night-blooming cereus, several plants of the so-called bishop's cap, and some striking specimens of Turk's head cactus.

The photographer of the National museum makes photographs of the flowering plants when any special features are to be noted, thousands of these cuttings being distributed by the department to the various botanical institutions throughout the world.

The collection is directly under the charge of E. M. Byrnes, superintendent of gardens and grounds.

LEE AND HAMMOND ARE THE NOMINEES

Democratic Race Was Close--Long Prairie Man Easy Winner.

EBERHART LOSES OUT IN COUNTRY DISTRICTS AND IN MINNEAPOLIS—CONGRATULATES VICTOR.

Preus Wins Republican Auditorship Fight Defeating Rines.

CLOSELY FOUGHT RACE LIKELY SETTLED WITHOUT A CONTEST.

Minneapolis, June 22.—Congressman Winfield S. Hammond is the democratic nominee for governor of Minnesota. Dan W. Lawler of St. Paul, who had been leading on the returns of last Tuesday's primary, his hold gradually getting weaker, has dropped to second place. Corrected returns from Blue Earth and Polk counties wiped out Lawler's plurality and Hammond is now well ahead, with a prospect that the complete vote will show him nominated by close to 1,000.

Rines Concedes Defeat.

With 71 counties reported officially and the remainder heard from by wire, Henry Rines of Mora, one of the Republican candidates for state auditor, in the late primaries, has conceded the nomination of J. A. O. Preus. This view of the contest was taken after Mr. Rines had carefully gone through the returns.

William E. Lee.

As the count now stands, Mr. Preus has a net lead of 934 over the former speaker of the house of representatives and it is not expected that the official canvass will make any marked change either way. Of the figure given, 705 are first choice votes and 229 second choice votes.

Contest Not Likely.

As to the possibility of a contest on the auditorship, which would mean a recount of votes in the various counties, Mr. Rines would make no comment. Because of the immensity of the task, he was inclined to abide by the verdict as reported.

That there are many errors in the reporting of second choice votes is of general knowledge and a recount would bring such to light, but the mistakes are just as liable to be one way as the other.

HUGH HALBERT.

Congressman Hammond's lead of between 800 and 1,000 over D. W. Lawler, his rival for the Democratic nomination for governor, has not been materially affected. Neither is there any change in the W. E. Lee of nearly 15,000 over Governor Eberhart.

Lee Strong in South.

Southern Minnesota, as a rule, showed up strong for Lee, and while he carried a number of counties in the north, he did not run as well in the ninth district as his friends expected.

Governor Eberhart seems not to have carried more than ten counties. Those reporting Eberhart pluralities so far are Ramsey, St. Louis, Washington, Dakota, Becker, Crow Wing, Itasca, Lake, Morrison and Stearns, and some of these are incomplete, so their vote may show a reversal. Lee carried even Winona county, which his friends had no idea of doing, and he carried nearly every county in the third district, where Ebehart was supposed to be strongest.

W. S. Hammond.

The banner Lee county to date is Lyon, which gave Lee 1,195 to 300 for Eberhart, or almost four to one. Lyon county is the home of G. B. Bjornson, secretary of the Lee campaign committee.

Halbert Well in Lead.

The 71 counties which have reported officially, have given Hugh T. Halbert a sufficiently large enough vote to justify the statement that he has defeated his opponent, Edward N. Westerlund, and will go on the ticket as the Progressive nominee for governor.

Returns on all other candidates for state office have not change the results. Lyndon A. Smith, attorney general, leads James A. Manahan by thousands of votes, Justices Run Evenly.

Justice Bunn of the supreme court and Judge Johnson of Red Wing, are the nominees for the office of associate justice. They both polled practically the same number of votes.

J. A. A. Burnquist has steadily increased his lead over Elias Steenerson for the Republican nomination for lieutenant governor. Early returns showed Steenerson pushing Burnquist close.

Walter J. Smith, state treasurer, leads his opponent, R. J. Johnson, of Austin, by more than 30,000 votes in 1997 precincts. O. P. B. Jacobson has a lead of nearly that amount over his closest competitor in the race for the Republican nomination for railroad and warehouse commissioner. I. A. Caswell, clerk of the supreme court, has a lead of nearly 50,000 over McCubrey, his opponent.

Congressional Results Definite.

In the First district Sydney Anderson has a lead of nearly 9,000 over his former secretary, Ola M. Levang. Inasmuch as the Democrats and Socialists have no filing in this district, Mr. Anderson is certain of re-election as representative in congress from the First.

In the Second district, Franklin F. Ellsworth, the young Mankato attorney, who has twice before received the Republican nomination, and who was defeated both times by W. S. Hammond, the retiring member, gets away with the nomination for the third time, defeating Julius E. Haycraft, the present senator from Martin and Watonwan counties, by 1,151. Jean A. Flittie, a Mankato attorney, is the Democratic nominee and J. H. Hollister of Sleepy Eye will run as a Socialist.

In the Third district, C. R. Davis was nominated without opposition, while in the Fourth district Fred C. Stevens had a similar pleasantry. In the Fifth district George R. Smith, the present member, defeated Ernest Lundeen by a vote of 11,205 to 9,243. Three counties are missing from the Sixth district, but Charles A. Lindbergh, the present member, has defeated his opponent, H. J. Maxfield, by over 3,000.

Volstead Not Opposed.

In the Seventh district Andrew J. Volstead, the present member, had no opposition, and will not have at the general election. In the Eighth district only Carlton county has reached the office of the secretary of state, but Clarence B. Miller is an easy winner over his rival, James P. Boyle. In the Ninth district, Becker, Marshall and Norman counties have not yet reported, but Halvor Steenerson, the sitting member, wins out by several thousand over his opponent, Luther Osborn of Glyndon.

In the Tenth district, the new representative district from Minnesota, Lowell E. Jepson, former senator from Hennepin county, won by a decisive vote.

In this district there will be Democratic opposition in the person of Harry S. Swenson of Minneapolis, who, unless Pine county changes the count, will have won over his opponent, A. S. Dowdall, Jr., the young Minneapolis attorney, by only 32 votes, the difference in Pine county to be added to either count. Seven of the eight counties give Mr. Swenson 1,061 to 1,029 for Mr. Dowdall.

J. A. O. Preus.

Outside of Ramsey, Hennepin, Dakota, and Goodhue counties, the only contest for a judicial position was in the Sixth distrct, composed of Martin and Watonwan counties. The fight in this district was centered on the present judge, A. R. Pfau of Mankato, on the charge that he favored his son in the Ledbetter murder trial, his son having acted as attorney for Mrs. Ledbetter, who was acquitted of the murder of her husband in Judge Pfau's court. The vote eliminates Benjamin Taylor from the race, and places the names of W. L. Comstock and A. R. Pfau on the ballot for Nov. 3, the primary vote favoring Mr. Comstock.

Sacrifices Life for Science.

New Rochelle, N. Y., June 20.—Taking a place in the annals of medical heroism with the two public health surgeons who gave their lives that the world might know more of yellow fever and spotted fever, Miss Marion C. Mabie is dead here. She contracted diphtheria in experiments seeking a preventive serum. Miss Mabie was only 20 years old. Her extraordinary ability in pathological research led to her appointment as special technician at the polyclinic hospital here.

Fires At German Diplomat.

Champaign, Ill., June 18. — Count Johann von Bernstorff, ambassador from Germany to the United States, narrowly escaped death when a special policeman fired point blank at the automobile in which the ambassador was being driven to the commencement exercises of the University of Illinois. The shot went wild and was not repeated. Count von Bernstorff was riding to the campus in an auto and his chauffeur refused to stop when ordered.

Three Drowned in Well.

Driftwood, Pa., June 18. — While playing near his home here Harold Jordan, aged 11, fell into an abondoned well. His cries attracted the attention of Rodney Ives, aged 17, who climbed into the well in an attempt to save him. Finding he could not bring the boy to the surface, Ives called fo help and was answered by John Jordan, Harold's uncle. When the uncle reached the boys they clung to him so that his hold on the rough sides was broken and all were drowned.

LAUNCH CAPSIZES; 12 DROWN

BUT SEVEN SAVED AFTER OSWEGO CANAL ACCIDENT.

Boat Hits Stump as It Is Returning Loaded With Picnickers—Women and Children Die.

Syracuse, N. Y., June 22.—Twelve persons, most of them women and children, were drowned in the Oswego canal when a launch upon which they were riding struck a submerged log and capsized.

The dead are: Mrs. George H. Adams, 26, Syracuse; three girl children of Mrs. Adams, 1, 4 and 5 years old; Mrs. Harry Welsh, 25, Syracuse; Katherine Welsh, aged 1 year; John Mogg, 38, Syracuse; Florence Dainer, 12, Syracuse; Earl Dainer, 10; Charles Shultz, 22, Syracuse; Miss Mabel Tibbets, 26, Syracuse; Howard Crane, aged 3, Liverpool.

The disaster occurred south of Mud lock, near Onondaga lake, in an isolated section in the environs of Syracuse. There were 19 passengers on the little vessel and seven of these reached the canal bank safely. They were on their way home after a day spent at the lake resorts.

It was 10:30 o'clock, just 10 minutes after the launch had left the lock, when the craft capsized. Lewis Dainer, owner and navigator of the launch, said rescue work was made extremely difficult by the intense darkness.

"I had just started on my journey and was less than a quarter of a mile from the lock when the launch struck a stump," he said. "Before I knew what had happened the boat tipped over.

"I had life preservers aboard, but there was no chance to use them. There was no opportunity to rescue the women or children. It was every one for himself in the darkness."

For seven years the launch had been plying between the two points on the canal. It was a 25-foot craft.

HINDUS CONTROL JAP SHIP

Denied Admission Into Canada 376 Immigrants Mutiny—Crew Helpless.

Vancouver, B. C., June 22.—Captain Yamoto of the Japanese steamer Komagata Maru, which brought 376 Hindus to Vancouver and whose vessel with all its passengers aboard is still anchored in the Harbor, will confer with officers of two visiting Japanese warships, Asama and Adzuma.

It is planned by owners of the Komagata Maru to place a guard of white men aboard the steamship and tow her out beyond the three-mile limit off the British Columbia coast. Outside territorial waters, it is expected the Japanese cruisers will provide an armed guard to assist the crew in taking the vessel back across the Pacific.

At present the Hindus, who have been denied admission to Canada, are in absoutle control of the ship and the 30 members of the crew can do nothing with them.

They will not allow the boiler room crew to get up steam and declare they will fight rather than allow the anchor to be raised.

Norwegian Bark Is Burned.

Gulf Port, Miss., June 22.—Loss at sea of the Norwegian bark Ingebjorg, which sailed from this port for Rosario, Argentina, two months ago, has been reported here. The storm-battered vessel was set on fire after Captain Hansen and the crew had been taken off by the British steamer Hawkhead, westbound for San Francisco.

Lassen Again Active.

San Francisco, June 22. — Another eruption of Mount Lassen is reported here. It was said to have features distinguishing it from other disturbances which have occurred every few days this month.

Big Excursion Boat Sinks.

St. Louis, June 22.—The river steamer Majestic, the largest excursion boat on the Mississippi river, struck the cribbing of a waterworks tower near here and sank in ten minutes. Of the thirty-three persons on board at the time of the accident, only one is unaccounted for. The collision occurred Saturday. The steamer, an hour before, had discharged 500 excursionists at Alton, Ill., and was headed down stream for St. Louis, twenty-seven miles below.

FIFTEEN GENERALS SIDE WITH VILLA

SIGN NOTE RENOUNCING CARRANZA AS "FIRST CHIEF" OF REBELS.

BREACH IS NOT YET HEALED

Reported Settlement Denied by Late Arrivals From Constitutionalist Cities—Cause May Be Injured as Result.

Larendo, Tex., June 22. — Fifteen generals of the Constitutionalist army, commanding a combined force estimated at 30,000 men renounced General Carranza as "first chief" of the Constitutionalists' movement in a note sent to his headquarters at the time General Villa resigned. Villa, however, did not sign the communication. This and other details, suppressed by a rigid censorship at Saltillo became known at the border with the arrival of travelers from Saltillo and Monterey.

Subject Only to Villa.

The communication, it was authoritatively said, informed the man who has been the leader of the Constitutionalist movement since its inception that the generals would continue to fight against Huerta, but would hold themselves subject only to General Villa's orders and would not recognize Carranza.

Before the travelers left Saltillo the breach had not been healed by the compromises since announced and leaders in the Constitutionalist movement, fearing disintegration of the force which they had built up had summoned every available man of influence to bring the factions together.

Some doubt of the effect of the dissension on the course of the Constitutionalist movement was expressed by men closely in touch with revolutionary affairs in Northern Mexico, even though the breach apparently is healed and both sides have agreed to continue against a common enemy.

The plan of Guadaloupe, on which the Constitutionalist campaigns have been based, provides that the first chief of the Constitutionalist army shall remain at the head of the movement as provisional president after Huerta has been eliminated and until an election has been held and the result voiced. Hitherto Carranza has been undisputed first chief.

To Ignore Incident.

What effect on the future of the movement the fact that the commanding officers of the largest and most powerful single unit of that army have denied him that title and authority will have cannot yet be learned, according to the travelers. They said the Carranza forces apparently planned to go ahead as though the incident never had happened.

Pablo Gonzales, it is said, will attack San Luis Potosi immediately while Villa is taking Zacatecas and then move southward according to the original plan with Villa advancing from the center and Obregon from the west.

Eagle Pass.—The naming of a Constitutionalist cabinet by General Carranza is eagerly awaited by Constitutionalists as a possible means of healing the breach between General Carranza and General Villa, according Monterey. There was a general impression at those points, according to the travelers, that General Carranza would name his official family within two or three days.

A hurried call, it is said, has been sent out from Carranza's headquarters for representative men, thoroughly conversant with the undercurrent of Constitutionalist politics, to come to Saltillo to confer concerning cabinet choices. It is well known, according to border arrivals, that considerable opposition has arisen on the part of Villa and his friends to certain men close to Carranza.

Russian Lawyers Sentenced.

St. Petersburg, June 22.—The trial of 25 lawyers on a charge of insulting the ministry of justice during the trial of Mendel Beiliss ended in the conviction of all the defendants. M. Sokoloff and M. Kereuski were sentenced to eight months imprisonment and the others to six months each. At the trial of Beiliss the lawyers alleged the ministry of justice and the court were inspired by racial and national enmity. The sentences imposed on the lawyers deprives them of their political rights.

SHANGHAIED; LOSES IDENTITY

SAILOR DRUGGED IN JAPAN AND SENT TO U. S. AS FORGER.

Thrust in Irons and Incarcerated in San Quentin for Crime He Knows Nothing About.

San Francisco, June 20. — Shanghaied on the waterfront of Nagasaki, in far-away Japan, carried in irons across the Pacific on the United States army transport Sheridan and thrust into San Quentin penitentiary to serve three years under a name he could not pronounce and for a crime he never had heard of Albert Johansen, a round-eyed, puzzled Scandinavian sailor, has been given his liberty by the United States circuit court with the cordial concurrence of the United States attorney and the warden of San Quentin.

On June 27 he must appear again for the return of a writ of habeas corpus application which was filed in his behalf but in the meantime he is free without bail.

The prisoner said he was drinking one night last month in a waterfront saloon at Nagasaki. Three strangers offered to stand him a treat. He accepted. The next morning he found himself at sea, a prisoner on the army transport Sheridan. No one understood him when he tried to make himself understood and he was duly delivered at San Quentin as James Rogers, alias Peter Grimes, to serve three years for a sentence imposed by the treaty court at Shanghai, for a forgery. His cell mate chanced to be a fellow countryman and through him he got a hearing.

Thursday Johansen was given the album of prison portraits and asked if he could find anybody in it he remembered. As soon as he came on Rogers' portrait he said:

"That's one of the men I drank with in Nagasaki."

The real Rogers served a year in San Quentin for forgery. When released he won the interest of Captain Robert Dollar, a leading merchant of San Francisco in the China trade, who sent him to China in a clerical position on one of his vessels. Soon Rogers was posing as Captain Dollar's son. He began to pass bad checks, was caught and convicted, and sentenced to three years in San Quentin. An officer of the court was to have taken him to Nagasaki where he was turned over to the Sheridan.

The belief of federal officials is that Rogers got his guardian drunk, slipped a stupifying drug into Johansen's drink and personally delivered him late at night on board the Sheridan turning over to a petty officer of the ship the papers he had stolen from the drunken deputy and receiving in person the acknowledgement for his own delivery.

INSANITY IS ON INCREASE

Number of Demented to 100,000 Trebled in United States Within Forty Years.

New York, June 22.—Dr. A. J. Ransanoff of Kings Park hospital for the insane, in a paper read at the second annual conference of the Eugenics Research association at the Columbia university, asserted that the number of insane persons in the institutions of the United States has nearly trebled during the last 40 years.

The average per 100,000, according to Dr. Rasanoff's figures, has increased from 86.5 to 232. The most fortunate state, the physician said, was Oklahoma, in which only 67 per 100,000 of the total population are in the insane category. Massachusetts, he asserted, is in the worst condition, having 413.4 per 100,000.

Belgian Miners Rescued.

Liege, Belgium, June 20.—Two hundred coal miners had a narrow escape from death in the Vielle Marihaye colliery near here when fire broke out and penned them inside for several hours.

To Postpone Elections.

Mexico City, June 22.—The minister of the interior presented to the chamber of deputies at its session preliminary to the opening of the extraordinary session of congress a bill calling for the postponement of the presidential election, which it was intended to hold the first Sunday in July. The reason given by the minister of the interior for his proposed action is that no elections could take place before the termination of the peace negotiations at Niagara Falls.

State News of General Interest

STATE IS CLEARING LAND FOR SETTLERS

TRACT WILL BE PUT ON MARKET WHEN READY FOR PLOW.

BEING DONE AS EXPERIMENT

Actual Cost Will Be Kept and Data Compiled—Hoped Plan Will Aid in Settlement of Timber Land.

Grand Rapids.—The land department of the state auditors office is employing a crew of men in clearing 20 acres on three different forties about nine miles to the southeast of this town. The land is at the eastern end of Pokegama lake and will be placed on the market.

Keep Actual Cost.

The work is in charge of Superintendent A. J. McGuire of the Northeast experiment station, who is keeping account of the actual cost and will embody his findings in a report in order that farmers generally may form an idea of the expense involved in this kind of work. A power stump-puller, teams and dynamite are being used and the cost of each noted.

Last year one forty was thus reclaimed by the state. In this instance it was found that the increase in the cost of the land amounted to $17.50 an acre, the tract bringing $22.50 when sold, $5 being the appraised price of the land itself without improvements. The tracts being cleared now are so situated that a purchaser may secure eighty acres adjoining the cleared portion, and this, according to Mr. McGuire, is as much as any man should attempt to farm.

Gives Buyer Cleared Price.

These reclaimed pieces are sold to the highest bidder under the same conditions that wild lands are acquired. It is believed here the system will do more to settle the northern part of the state than anything heretofore attempted. It gives a man with a family a sizable piece of prepared ground upon which to begin raising crops for the maintenance of his family and stock.

ODD FELLOWS MAKE PLANS

Decide to Visit Minneapolis for Annual Encampment and Grand Lodge in 1915.

Northfield.—Minneapolis will entertain the Odd Fellows and Rebekahs of Minnesota at their annual encampment and grand lodge next year, according to a decision reached here. With the largest and most flourishing camps and lodges of the order in Minneapolis, the universal sentiment of the delegates favored the Mill City.

Reports from the several institutions owned by the Odd Fellows and other general business for the good of the order occupied the attention of the grand lodge. A closing session saw the installation of officers elected last winter as the last feature of an eventful three days' convention.

Among the grand lodge delegates were Mayor Wallace G. Nye of Minneapolis and Mayor Winn Powers of St. Paul, and Rev. Thomas Neville, deputy grandmaster of the province of Manitoba.

The Rebekah assembly received reports of committees and proceeded to the election of officers before adjournment. The annual memorial ceremony was held for past noble grands who have died the present year.

An honor guest of the Rebekahs was Mrs. Hattie Borland of Madison, S. D., grand secretary of the Rebekah assembly of South Dakota.

HALF OF WHEAT OF NATION

11,506,000 Bushels of 1913 Crop Lie in Minneapolis Storehouses.

Minneapolis.—Minneapolis holds in the great terminal elevators that fringe the city almost half of the visible supply of wheat in the United States. To be exact, the 11,506,000 bushels in store here is 48.71 per cent of the total amount of the 1913 harvest in the country.

Duluth, the other great spring wheat primary market, has 11.46 per cent of the 23,412,000 bushels in sight, making the total holdings of the Northwestern terminal elevators 60.17 per cent of the wheat available at the present time for consumption.

Exonerated for Killing Husband.

Hibbing.—Mrs. Augustus Boyami, who resides at Aurora, was found not guilty after a deliberation of three hours by the jury. She was charged with the murder of her husband on the night of May 31. She claimed that she had been attacked by her husband and that in wrestling the gun from him, she had killed him. She gave herself up to the authorities and was taken to the Duluth jail. Trial lasted by three days, her plea of self-defense convincing the jurors.

AGED MINNESOTAN GIVES RULES FOR LONGEVITY

Hastings.—John Morey, an 1856 pioneer of Minnesota, has a philosophy of life which has carried him along in health and contentment for eighty-nine years and which he believes assures him of strength and happiness for many years to come. At the recent celebration of his natal day he counseled his friends to:

Sleep eight hours in every twenty-four.

Eat when hungry.

Abstain from intoxicants.

And not to worry.

Mr. Morey was born May 22, 1825, at Mount Bethel, Pa. In 1856 he came to Minnesota and built the first house in the Cottage Grove country. He has never been sick and still reads ordinary print without glasses. He believes in equal suffrage and says it will soon be here.

UNITED OPPOSITION DID IT

Defeat of Eberhart Due to That As He Got 20,000 More Votes Than Two Years Ago.

St. Paul.—While Governor Eberhart did much better this year as a vote getter than he did at the first state primary on September 17, 1912, he was defeated because he was opposed by one man instead of having the opposition split five ways, as it was two years ago.

In that campaign the Eberhart primary vote was 62,402, while William E. Lee, successful this year, got 40,571; Edward T. Young had 30,208; L. C. Spooner, 12,233; S. Y. Gordon, 11,927, and M. F. Falk, 6,536. The opposition totaled 101,865.

It was one of Lee's campaign arguments that two years ago the Governor was a minority candidate, and he tried to show that had the opposition been united the executive would have been snowed under. He said that with but one man in the field this year, it would work out that way, and his contention seems to have been correct.

Governor Eberhart, however, made a gain of about 20,000 over his vote two years ago, but there were more votes cast for the Republican ticket this year, the total, it is estimated, being somewhere near 175,000. This is accounted for by the fact that although the vote, generally speaking, was light, the minority parties, not having any contests, got their candidates on the ticket for the fall election without the formality of having a primary ballot under the new law and members voted the Republican ticket.

Irving A. Caswell, clerk of the Supreme Court, will have the honor of leading the ticket this year. His majority over G. D. McCubrey will approximate 60,000.

800 ENDEAVORERS ATTEND

State Convention Draws Four Hundred Delegates From Twin Cities Alone at Hastings.

Hastings.—Delegates from all parts of Minnesota gathered here to attend the Christian Endeavor union convention. About 400 delegates attended from the Twin Cities, arriving on the steamer Hiawatha.

The convention was opened formally with an address by Rev. John Pollock of Belfast, Ireland, president of the European Christian Endeavor union. His subject was "Grow," taken from the third chapter of St. John, thirtieth verse. "He must increase, but I must increase."

About 800 persons, in all, attended the sessions.

Rochester to Stage Big Rally.

Winona.—The Southern Minnesota Better Development league, the Commercial club of Rochester and the farmers' clubs of Olmsted county have become jointly responsible for the success of the midsummer meeting of the development league and the annual picnic of the farmers of Olmsted county, and the first annual picnic dinner of the people of Rochester at Mayo park, Rochester, on June 25. The development league meeting is for the counties of Wabasha, Dodge, Winona, Houston, Olmsted, Fillmore and Mower.

Mattson Chosen President.

Brainerd.—The Lutheran Free Churches of America, in convention here, elected officers as follows: President, Rev. John Mattson, Ellendale, Minn.; vice president, Rev. E. Berlie, Dalton, Minn.; secretary, Rev. E. Berntsen, Fargo, N. D. The constitution was revised to permit the reelection of the president of a standing committee.

Dentists Meet and Elect.

Rochester.—The annual meeting of the first district association of the Minnesota State Dental society was held in this city. "Local Anesthesia" was the principal theme for discussion, Dr. W. H. McNeil of Minneapolis making an address on the subject. The following officers were elected: B. A. Herrick, Red Wing, president; A. A. Thorson, Rochester, vice president; C. G. Giltam, Austin, secretary; A. P. Cox, Faribault, treasurer; B. Featherstone, Red Wing, delegate to the state society.

RUN STOLEN AUTO INTO DITCH

Two Escaped Jail-Breakers Captured by Posse After Mishap to Car.

Fergus Falls.—Clarence Bolden, James Murphy and William Paul were brought over from Bluffton and placed in the county jail here on the charge of having stolen an automobile from the livery barn of Henry Stootz there.

The trio were first arrested at Staples last Saturday on complaint of a Northern Pacific detective, who accused them of entering cars and stealing carburetors and other valuable parts from automobiles in transit and selling the parts to city dealers.

While in jail there, they saw an ax lying on a desk a few feet from their cell door. Making a cord with some material from their bedding and fashioning a hook by bending a poker, they threw the hook with the cord attached through the bars, hooked the desk and drew it over until it was within reach, took hold of the ax, and in three minutes chopped their way through the door to liberty.

They took to the woods and swamps and made their way to Bluffton, entering that village in the dead of night. Feeling that automobile traveling would be an improvement on foot travel, they stole a machine from the barn, but had gone only a short distance when they ran into a ditch and were unable to get out. A posse was organized and they were surrounded and captured, and have been bound over.

NEW WARDEN FOR PRISON

St. Cloud Reformatory Head to Succeed Henry Wolfer at Stillwater.

St. Paul.—Charles S. Reed, superintendent of the St. Cloud reformatory, will become warden of the Minnesota state penitentiary at Stillwater November 1. Henry K. W. Scott, former warden of the New Hampshire state penitentiary at Concord, will become superintendent of the St. Cloud reformatory July 1.

The resignation of Henry Wolfer as warden of the prison at Stillwater has just reached the board of control.

The resulting changes elevate to the highest position in the penal institutions of the state, a man who in less than a year's service at St. Cloud has made a strong impression with the board; bring to Minnesota another who has a record of advanced reformatory methods, and retire on his own initiative, the man who is dean of all prison wardens of the United States.

Warden Wolfer some months ago told the board of control he would resign when the new state penitentiary was completed in detail. His formal retirement was not expected till 1915.

The new warden, Mr. Reed, will go to Stillwater, July 1, to familiarize himself with the institution. Mr. Scott leaves Concord for St. Cloud Monday.

MISSING HEIR IS DEMENTED

Fortune Would Have Reverted to State Shortly Had He Not Made His Appearance.

Rochester.—William Convay, for whom a small-sized fortune has been in the hands of the clerk of court for this county, and which would in a few weeks have reverted to the state of Minnesota if unclaimed, startled courthouse officials when he stepped into the courthouse building, apparently insane. Convay immediately was placed in custody to await an examination.

Convay was one of the heirs of a good-sized estate probated five years ago, but his whereabouts were unknown until he wandered into the courthouse. Five years ago a farm belonging to the estate was sold, and the money divided among the heirs, Convay's share amounting to $1,739.58, being turned over to the clerk of court to keep in trust until he was located.

Convay inquired for the county auditor, who was out at the time, but he continued his search in the building until he reached the judge of probate's office, where the actions of the man aroused suspicion, and he was placed in the charge of the sheriff, to whom he declared he was William Convay.

Windom Tangoes Over Success.

Windom.—The last three years of prosperity have started a building boom in Windom. The business portion of the town is developing. A $15,000 garage was dedicated by a benefit dance for the Windom band. All Windom tangoed. A new theater and Odd Fellows hall and many residences are under construction.

Counties to Build Sanatorium.

Pipestone.—A meeting of county commissioners from southwestern Minnesota was held here and further steps taken to arrange for the establishment of a joint county sanatorium in this corner of the state. Representatives of Lyon, Cottonwood, Nobles, Murray and Pipestone counties were present to confer with Dr. Robinson Bosworth of St. Paul, secretary of the state sanatorium commissioners. A permanent organization was perfected, H. F. Selter of Lyon county being named president.

IN THE OPEN ROAD

By GEORGE ELMER COBB.

All winter long Sydney Blair lived in a 6x10 room in a poor lodging house. He did light housekeeping, so light at times that heat, illumination and even food were under eclipse for days. It was then that he huddled close under the bedclothes daytimes, stealing out nights to gather up a few morsels in his unique way.

He was a poet at soul. As to his effusions, only thrice in his life had he received real pay from a real publication. This had not broken him of the poetic habit, however. He watched the birthdays of people, great festal events, all kinds of occasions where an acrostic, a tribute, an eulogium would catch the fancy of the rich and bring in a few dollars for the effort.

The present winter had been a hard one for poor Blair, however. He was obliged to write advertising doggerel, and this discouraged him.

"Oh, for the time to hit the road!" he pined, and with the first venturesome robin reported in the city parks the tramp poet began his annual hegira to the shrines of nature.

Once a year his soul swelled. It was when, as now, he turned his face from the turmoil, dust and hollow excitement of the city. It seemed to him as though he was passing into a new life, as the sprouting grass of the countryside, the budding moss flowers, the nesting birds, the warbling brooks united in a welcome to the passing wayfarer who loved them.

Was Aroused by a Shrill Echoing Cry.

Outside of a little bundle, usually strung across his stout walking stick and containing a change of linen and a blanket, Sydney Blair had one other possession of some utility and value. This was a piano tuning key. He was a natural musician, but the itinerant minstrel, caroling forth old-time lays, was a thing of the past. There were many pianos in hamlets and farm houses. From the profession of poet in winter our good friend enacted a broad transition to piano tuner at summertide.

He was a dreamer, his physical wants limited. The heather formed a sweet-scented mattress, it was delight to watch the stars across the curtain of night twinkle tired eyelids close. Sydney simply strolled, talking to the flowers, communing with free, grand soul thoughts, composing poetry he could not sell. It was a tender solace, however, to work over these and at night repeat them to himself.

Once, at dusk-tide, Sydney, resting under a great gnarled oak, was aroused by a shrill echoing cry. He ran towards the highway to observe three rough-seeming fellows disappearing in the dim distance. He stumbled over a prostrate form. It was that of an old man. His face was bedabbled with blood. There was a cruel gash at one side of his head. A button hole of his vest was torn apart, showing where his watch chain had been torn from place. A pocket was turned inside out. Evidently footpads had robbed this victim.

Sydney ran to a brook near at hand. He soaked a handkerchief in water and did all he could to remove the traces of violence from the insensible man. Finally the latter sat up. He put his hand confusedly to his head, his eyes were somewhat glazed and unsteady as they surveyed Sydney.

"See, here," spoke the latter, "who are you and what has happened?"

The victim seemed to make a desperate effort to concentrate his thoughts, failed and shook his head blankly.

"H'm!" soliloquized Sydney, "a bad blow. See here, old friend, I must get you to a doctor."

The victim placidly allowed Sydney to lead him to a nearby village. There a doctor looked him over, plastered up the wound on his head and questioned him as to his home.

"I don't know," was the monotonous response.

Sydney had tuned a piano that day. He secured lodging for his charge. He himself slept in a haymow. With the morning the same cloud of haziness hung over the victim. All that morning Sydney led him about the vicinity. No one knew him. He was an utter stranger to the district.

"See here," said Sydney, "what am I going to do with you? What do you want to do?"

"Go with you," replied the old man, simply. "I like the sunlight, the woods, the birds. I feel rested, I feel happy, only—I forget what was."

"All right, I make you my partner," said Sydney.

The old man grew quite blithe and talkative during the next day of idle wandering. He was like a pleased child. Some injury to his brain, it was apparent, had blotted out the past. Sydney observed that he was an educated man, his attire evidenced respectability. There was not a mark on his clothing, not a scrap of paper found to give the slightest clue as to his identity.

Every morning and evening, however, the old man took from an inner pocket an exquisite little medallion. It held the portrait of a beautiful girl. He would gaze at it raptly for nearly an hour. And then Sydney got to sharing his mute adoration. The fair, wistful features came to form an ideal in his mind.

Like nomads those two passed along the flower-fringed by-ways. Each day the old man seemed to grow happier and more contented with the careless, joyous life.

One evening, while seated in a little wayside inn, Sydney struck up an acquaintance with a physician. He told the story of the old man. The doctor became interested. He examined the patient.

"There is a depression of the skull," he said. "This man's memory can be restored by a surgical operation."

It would cost fifty dollars, the doctor said, for he would have to call in a surgeon. Sydney made arrangements for the housing of his friend in the village. Then he started out tuning pianos.

It was a glad, proud day for his good, kind heart when he returned with the money to pay for the operation.

The doctor had predicted rightly. The operation concluded, the old man rose up, a new intelligence in his face. He listened to the story of the doctor. His eyes were filled with gratitude and love as he was told of the noble sacrifice of the tramp poet.

"Bring me a check book," he said, "and a pen."

His apparent whim was gratified. He scratched out "Bank of Milton," substituted "State Bank of Wareham," signed a name—Henry Morse—and handed the check to Sydney, filled in for five thousand dollars.

Then came his story of visiting some land at a distance, of being assaulted and robbed. Sydney must accompany him home. A sorrowing daughter, who mourned him as dead, greeted him at his own palatial home. She was the original of the cherished portrait, Eva Morse.

When all the beautiful story of the soulful fidelity of Sydney Blair to a stranger was told, gratitude shone in those lovely eyes.

And then love, and in the golden days that passed by as a joyful dream the poet knew no more of loneliness, and deprivation, and neglect.

Roosevelt and the Amazon.

The emergence of Col. Roosevelt from the interior of Brazil directed public attention more than ever to a journey probably the most weird and picturesque in the world. It is 2,150 miles from the mouth of the Amazon to Iquitos, where the government of Peru maintains a large dockyard, barracks, iron works, machine shops, etc., and an inland navy consisting of two gunboats.

Few have any idea of the tremendous volume and coloring of the Amazon current, its influence upon the Atlantic, the immense distance it carries nearly fresh water into the brine of the ocean, its serpentine windings, its overhanging vegetation, its rapids, its wild life, its pests, perils, pleasures and all sorts of strange sights. Some of the tributaries of the Amazon are mightier than the Mississippi.

Like the redoubtable colonel, the Amazon is broad and deep, impetuous in its upper levels, and flows on forever.

Our Handicap.

W. H. Ellis, a naval architect of the Scotch firm that built the Aquitania, was praising America.

"I have come to admire America tremendously since my arrival in New York," he said. "You are a wonderful country. But, then, you have so many natural advantages, haven't you?

"The River Clyde, with us, has been brought up to its present draught by means of dredging, and so the Scotch are very proud of it.

"Well, a party of American sightseers turned up their noses at the Clyde one day.

"'Call this a river?' they said. 'Why, it's a mere ditch in comparison with our Mississippi, or St. Lawrence, or Delaware.'

"'Aweel, mon,' said a Scotch bystander, 'you've got Providence to thank for your rivers, but we made this oursel's.'"

Dog Refuses to Aid Law.

Unable to decide the disputed ownership of a dog, Magistrate McQuade, in the New York night court, left it to the dog. But doggie made the confusion more confounded.

Walking on Broadway, near Forty-second street, with the bull-terrier, Henry R. Stevens, of 127 West Forty-seventh street, felt the leash snatched out of his hand. Policeman Grogan stopped Frank Merado, of 254 West Thirty-seventh street, with the terrier.

In the night court the terrier went to Merado, but just as he was being awarded by the court to the presumed owner the dog rushed to Stevens.

RECOGNIZED WORK OF ARTIST

Negro Quick to Hand Out What Might Be Called Important Piece of Misinformation.

Charles R. Knight, the artist, whose reproductions of dinosaurs and creatures of long ago are known the world over, prefers, however, to be known as a painter and sculptor of modern animals. He has worked from the living model as much as possible, and this has taken him to the zoos in many cities. He was telling his experiences at the zoo in Washington.

"One afternoon an important looking negro came along with his best girl," he said. "They stopped for a minute and looked at the sketch I was making of a deer.

"'Yer know what he am doin', don't yer?" asked the negro of his companion.

"'Mebbe,' answered the woman. 'Does yoh?'

"'Shoh. He's making a landscape ob one er dem habitats. Dere's moh habitats in dis zoo than anywhere else in der United States.'"

ERUPTION DISFIGURED FACE

Lock Box 35, Maurice, Ia.—"In the spring of 1911 our little daughter, age five years, had a breaking out on her lip and part of her cheek that we took for ringworm. It resembled a large ringworm, only it differed in that it was covered with watery blisters that itched and burned terribly, made worse by her scratching it. Then the blisters would break through and let out a watery substance. She was very cross and fretful while she had it and had very little rest at night. When the eruption was at its worst the teacher of the school sent her home and would not allow her to attend until the disfigurement of her face was gone.

"I wrote and received a sample of Cuticura Soap and Ointment, which we used according to directions, and they gave instant relief, so we bought some more. It gradually grew better. We kept on using Cuticura Soap and Ointment and in three or four months the child was entirely cured." (Signed) Mr. Henry Prins, Oct. 22, 1912.

Cuticura Soap and Ointment sold throughout the world. Sample of each free, with 32-p. Skin Book. Address post-card "Cuticura, Dept. L, Boston."—Adv.

1913 RECORD Magnificent Crops in all Western Canada

All parts of the Provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, have produced wonderful yields of Wheat, Oats, Barley and Flax. Wheat graded from Contract to No. 1 Hard, weighed heavy and yielded from 20 to 45 bushels per acre; 22 bushels was about the total average. Mixed Farming may be considered fully as profitable an industry as grain raising. The excellent grasses full of nutrition, are the only food required either for beef or dairy purposes. In 1912, and again in 1913, at Chicago, Manitoba carried off the Championship for beef steer. Good schools, markets convenient, climate excellent. For the homesteader, the man who wishes to farm extensively, or the investor, Canada offers the biggest opportunity of any place on the continent.

THE SUNBEAM.

BY W. G. HUNT.

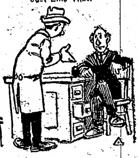
Published every Friday, at Sunbeam, Pennington County, Minnesota.

Entered as Second-class matter August 3, 1905, at the post office at Sunbeam Minn. under the Act of Congress of March 3, 1879

O'Neill has been placed on the defence in his campaign for the state senate, and he has a poor case to defend, as it is difficult to face cold facts with silver tongued oratory, but he has the attorneys for the drainage companies to defend him and will undoubtedly put up a warm campaign.

Mr. Jones of Bagley was eliminated as a candidate for the legislature this fall by the voters of Pennington County. There is something wrong with Mr. Stenvick in his home county, if the election returns are an indication, and in this case they certainly were. If Clearwater county should vote on the question of county option, option would carry by a vote of three to one, and yet Mr. Jones declared himself as opposed to county option, and carried the county heavily against Stenvick. John A. Duffy declared himself as favoring county option, and openly declared himself in favor of it, and that he would vote for it. Red Lake County is considered an anti county option county, and if the question was submitted to a vote in that county to-day county option would be defeated, and yet Mr. Duffy got more votes in his home county than both of his opponents. But there are other important questions to come before that next legislature besides county option, and it is up to the people of Pennington county to go on record as supporters of our neighbor John A. Duffy, who will be the next member of the legislature from this district, if Clearwater and Red Lake Counties have to elect him without any help from us.

Just Like That!



Trovaton explains how it was that Stenvick did not carry Clearwater county.

Great Crest of the Sierra.

Mount Whitney, the highest point in the United States, is not an isolated mountain peak, like Mount Shasta or Mount Rainier, but is the loftiest point in the great California crest or enormous saw tooth ridge of the Sierra Nevada, including many eminences almost as high. Mount Whitney is 14,501 feet above sea level. Among those of slightly lesser height are Mount Russell, less than a mile distant, 14,190 feet; Mount Williamson, 14,384 feet; Mount Muir, 14,205 feet; Mount Langley, 14,042 feet; Mount Barnard, 14,003 feet, and Mount Tyndall, 14,025 feet. The most distant of these is less than six miles away.

By a strange freak of nature the lowest point of dry land in the United States is less than eighty miles from the highest. The lowest point is in Death valley and is 276 feet below sea level. It is said that from this point Mount Whitney can be easily seen on a clear day.

An Ignoble Use.

Washington Irving in "Crayon Papers" says: "I was once at an evening entertainment given by the Duke of Wellington at Apsley House to William IV. The duke had manifested his admiration of his great adversary, Napoleon, by having portraits of him in different parts of the house. At the bottom of the grand staircase stood the colossal statue of the emperor by Canova. It was of marble in the antique style, with one arm partly extended, holding a figure of Victory. Over this arm the ladies in tripping upstairs to the ball had thrown their shawls. It was a singular office for the statue of Napoleon to perform in the mansion of the Duke of Wellington.

Astronomically Speaking.

Before he became a newspaper man James S. Black was a collector in Flagstaff for awhile. He was given a bill against Director Lowell of the observatory and tramped up the long hill from the town to see the astronomer one hot June morning when the mountain sun blazed its hottest.

Arrived at the top, Black inquired of an attendant if Lowell was there. After the manner of collectors he followed up a negative answer with inquiries as to his probable return.

"Will he be back this afternoon?"

"No."

"Will he be back tomorrow?"

"No."

"Will he be back next day?"

The attendant couldn't say.

"Well," said Black, getting desperate, "do you know when he will be back?"

"Oh, he'll be back for the transit of Venus!" said the attendant.

"That finished it," said Black in telling the story. "Not being an astronomer, I gave up that bill."—Popular Magazine.

Nose Tip Vaccination.

The young Japanese diplomat pointed to his father, the marquis.

"That's father," he said, "the old fellow with the saucer shaped scar on the tip of his nose. All Japs of the older generation have that scar."

"Yes," said the debutante.

"Yes; it's a vaccination mark. In the old days, when compulsory vaccination first began, we Japs vaccinated everybody on the tip of the nose. Why? Well, because it was a good place, where there's no movement to rub off the scab, and also because the vaccination scar on the nose was easily identified by the medical officers of the government. A man didn't have to take off half his clothes in order to prove that he'd been vaccinated.

"Yes; the nose tip vaccination had its good points, but before the modern hankering after beauty it had to go."—New York Tribune.

Qualified.

"This," said the able manager, "is a difficult part to play. The character doesn't have to speak a word during the performance, and yet he is on the stage the greater part of the time. Do you think you can do it?"

"I should think I can!" exclaimed the actor. "I'm well qualified for the part. I've been married for twenty years and haven't had a chance to say a word."

There is quite a change in this country in the past six years, and the second crop of settlers who are looking for graded roads and schools have began to arrive. Only five years ago anyone going to Thief River Falls from the town of Highlanding went across the country anywhere to avoid impassable mud holes. Today they have graded highways for the entire distance, and the auto owners drive down to the city in the afternoon, transact their business and return home in the evening.

Some of the so called legal lights of Highlanding are trying to bluff the Creamery Association by telling them that the Association would be liable for damages if an accident should happen at the ferry. The Suicide Symphony.

The idea that music may be harmful—that it can create a fever in the blood dangerous to life and reason—will come as a revelation to many. Friedrich Nietzsche, the well known German philosopher, declared that there is something in some music, most notable in Wagner and Tschaikowsky, which acts unfavorably on the brain and nerves of many people. Tschaikowsky's baleful influence cannot be denied. He destroyed himself after composing his famous "Sixth Symphony," and as several have died by their own hands after playing it it has come to be known as the "suicide symphony."

The Homeric Poems.

No one of any literary pretensions believes any longer in the one time prevalent opinion that the "Iliad" and "Odyssey" were composed by a single poet, be he Homer or some one else. Old London Cookshops.

Mediaeval London, besides being a "city of taverns," was famous for its cookshops, such as the place on the river bank described by Fitzstephen in the thirteenth century: "There every day ye may call for any dish of meat, roast, fried or sodden, fish both small and great, venison and fowl. If friends come upon a sudden wearied with travel to a citizen's house and they be loath to wait for curious preparations and dressings of fresh meat let the servant run to the water side, where all things that can be desired are at hand." This particular place of public cookery apparently did an indoor as well as an outdoor trade, for Fitzstephen further described it as being used both day and night by "multitudes of soldiers or other strangers who refresh themselves to their content on roast goose, the fowl of Africa and the rare gadwit of Ionia." But what were the two last mentioned viands?—London Standard.

A Curious Story.

The queen of Hanover, wife of King Ernest Augustus of Hanover (better known as the Duke of Cumberland, son of George III.), died at Hanover about 1842 of an illness which baffled the skill of her doctors as to its real cause. During her illness a clairvoyant was consulted, who wrote certain curious signs and words on the door of her bedroom; but, although these mystic words were repeated over and over again, the queen died. The king of Hanover after his wife's death gave orders that her bedroom should always be kept as though the queen would sleep there at night. The bed was turned down, the pillows reshaken, hot water brought and the daintiest slippers laid in readiness for her.—London Tatler.

SYNOPSIS.

Challis Wrandall is found murdered in a road house near New York. Mrs. Wrandall is summoned from the city and identifies the body. A young woman who accompanied Wrandall to the inn and subsequently disappeared, is suspected. Mrs. Wrandall starts back for New York in an auto during a blinding snow storm. On the way she meets a young woman in the road who proves to be the woman who killed Wrandall. Feeling that the girl had done her a service in ridding her of the man who though she loved him deeply, had caused her great sorrow. Mrs. Wrandall determines to shield her and takes her to her own home. Mrs. Wrandall hears the story of Hetty Castleton's life, except that portion that relates to Wrandall. This and the story of the tragedy she forbids the girl ever to tell. She offers Hetty a home, friendship and security from peril on account of the tragedy. Sara Wrandall and Hetty return to New York after an absence of a year in Europe. Leslie Wrandall, brother of Challis, becomes greatly interested in Hetty. Sara sees in Leslie's infatuation possibility for revenge on the Wrandalls and reparation for the wrongs she suffered at the hands of Challis Wrandall by marrying his murderess into the family. Leslie, in company with his friend Brandon Booth, an artist, visits Sara at her country place. Leslie confesses to Sara that he is madly in love with Hetty. Sara arranges with Booth to paint a picture of Hetty. Booth has a haunting feeling that he has seen Hetty before. Looking through a portfolio of pictures by an unknown English artist he finds one of Hetty. He speaks to her about it. Hetty declares it must be a picture of Hetty Glynn, an English actress, who resembles her very much. Much to his chagrin Leslie is refused by Hetty. Booth and Hetty confess their love for each other, but the latter declares that she can never marry as there is an insurmountable barrier in the way. Hetty admits to Sara that she loves Booth. Sara declares that Hetty must marry Leslie, who must be made to pay his brother's debt to the girl. Hetty again attempts to tell the real story of the tragedy and Sara threatens to strangle her if she says a word. Sara insults Hetty by revealing that all this time she has believed Hetty to have sinned in her relations with Challis Wrandall. Later she realizes that Hetty is innocent. Leslie again proposes to Hetty and is rejected. Hetty prepares to leave Sara, declaring that after what has happened she can remain no longer. Hetty starts for Europe. At sea she receives a message from Booth that he has started on a faster steamer and will be waiting for her on the other side. Booth meets her and accompanies her to London.

When the night boat from Dover to Calais slipped away from her moorings that evening, Hetty Castleton and her maid were on board, with all their bags and trunks, and Brandon Booth was supposed to be completely at sea in the heart of that glittering London-town.

The night was fog-laden and dripping, and the crossing promised to be unpleasant. Wrapped in a thick seaulster Hetty sat huddled up in the lea of the deckhouse, sick at heart and miserable. She reproached herself for the scurvy trick she was playing on him, reviled herself and yet pitied herself.

A tall man came shambling down the narrow space along the rail and stopped directly in front of her. She started in alarm as he reached out his hand to support himself against the deckhouse. As he leaned forward, he laughed.

"You were thinking of me, Hetty," said the man.

For a long time she stared at him, transfixed, and then, with a low moan, covered her eyes with her hands.

"Is it true—is it a dream?" she sobbed.

He dropped down beside her and gathered her in his strong, eager arms.

"You were thinking of me, weren't you? And reproaching yourself, and hating yourself for running away like this? I thought so. Well, you might just as well try to dodge the smartest detective in the world as to give me the slip now, darling."

"You—you spied on me?" she cried, in muffled tones. She lay very limp in his arms.

"I did," he confessed, without shame. "Gad, when I think of what I might be doing at this moment if I hadn't found you out in time! Think of me back there in London, racing about like a madman, searching for you in every—"

"Please, please!" she implored.

"But luck was with me. You can't get away, Hetty. I shan't let you out of my sight again. I'll camp in front of your door and you'll see me wither and die of sleeplessness, for one or the other of my eyes will always be open."

"Oh, I am so tired, so miserable," she murmured.

"Poor little sweetheart!"

"I wish you would hate me."

"Lie where you are, dearest, and—forget!"

"If I only could—forget!"

"Rest. I will hold you tight and keep you warm. We're in for a nasty crossing, but it is paradise for me. I am mad with the delight of having you here, holding you close to me, feeling you in my arms. The wilder the night the better, for I am wild with the joy of it all. I love you! I love you!" He strained her closer to him in a sort of paroxysm.

She was quiet for a long time. Then she breathed into his ear:

"You will never know how much I was longing for you, just as you are now, Brandon, and in the midst of it all you came. It is like a fairy story, and oh, I shall always believe in fairies."

A long time afterward the throbbing ceased, bell-buoys whistled and clanged about them; the sea suddenly grew calm and lifeless; they slid over it as if it were a quavering sheet of ice; and lights sneaked out of the fog and approached with stealthy swiftness. Bells rang below and above them, sailors sprang up from everywhere and calls were heard below; the rattling of chains and the thumping of heavy luggage took the place of that steady, monotonous beat of the engines. People began to infest the deck, limp and groaning, harassed but voiceless. A mighty sigh seemed to envelop the whole ship—a sigh of relief.

Then it was that these two arose stiffly from their sheltered bench and gave heed to the things that were about them.

The channel was behind them.

CHAPTER XV.

Rattling Old Bones.

They journeyed to Paris by the night mail. He was waiting for her on the platform when she descended from the wagon lit in the Gare du Nord. Sleepy passengers crowded with them into the customs department. She, alone among them all, was smiling brightly, as if the world could be sweet at an hour when, by all odds, it should be sleepiest.

"I was up and on the lookout for you at Amiens," he declared, as they walked off together. "You might have got off there, you know," with a wry grin.

"I shall not run away from you again, Brandon," she said earnestly. "I promise, on my honor."

"By Jove," he cried, "that's a relief!" Then he broke into a happy laugh.

"I shall go to the Ritz," she said, after her effects had been examined and were ready for release.

"I thought so," he announced calmly. "I wired for rooms before I left London."

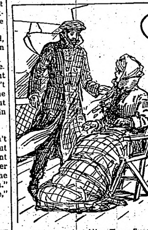
"Really, this is ridic—"

"Don't frown like that, Hetty," he pleaded.

As they rattled and bounced over the cobble-stones in a taxi-meter on the way to the Place Vendome, he devoted the whole of his conversation to the delicious breakfast they were to have, expatiating glibly on the wonderful berries that would come first in that always-to-be-remembered meal. She was ravenously hungry by the time they reached the hotel, just from listening to his dissertation on chops and rolls and coffee as they are served in Paris, to say nothing of waffles and honey and the marmalade that no Englishman can do without.

Alone in his room, however, he was quite another person. His calm assurance took flight the instant he closed the door and moodily began to prepare for his bath. Resolution was undiminished, but the facts in the case were most desolating. Whatever it was that stood between them, there was no gainsaying its power to influence their lives. It was no trifle that caused her to take this second flight, and the sooner he came to realize the seriousness of opposition the better.

He made up his mind on one point in that half-hour before breakfast; if she asked him again to let her go her way in peace, it was only fair to her and right that he should submit to the inevitable. She loved him, he was sure of it. Then there must be a very good reason for her perplexing attitude toward him. He would make one more attempt to have the truth from her.



She Stared at Him, Transfixed.

Failing in that, he would accept the situation as hopeless, for the time being at least. She should know that he loved her deeply enough for that.

She joined him in the little open-air cafe, and they sat down at a table in a remote corner. There were few people breakfasting. In her tender blue eyes there was a look of sadness that haunted him, even as she smiled and called him beloved.

"Hetty, darling," he said, leaning forward and laying his hand on hers, "can't you tell me what it is?"

She was prepared for the question. In her heart she knew the time had come when she must be fair with him. He observed the pallor that stole into her warm, smooth cheeks as she regarded him fixedly for a long time before replying.

"There is only one person in the world who can tell you, Brandon. It is for her to decide. I mean Sara Wrandall."

He felt a queer, sickening sensation of uneasiness sneak into existence. In the back of his mind, a hateful fear began to shape itself. For a long time he looked into her somber eyes, and as he looked the fear that was hateful took on something of a definite shape.

"Did you know her husband?" he asked, and somehow he knew what the answer would be.

"Yes," she replied, after a moment. She was startled. Her lips remained parted.

He watched her closely. "Has this—this secret anything to do with Challis Wrandall?"

"It has," said she, meeting his gaze steadily.

His hands clutched the edge of the table in a grip that turned the knuckles white.

"Hetty!" he cried, in a hoarse whisper. "You—can't mean that you—"

"You must go to Sara," she cried hurriedly. "Haven't I told you that she is the one—"

"Were you in love with that infernal scoundrel?" he demanded fiercely.

"Sara knows everything. She will tell you—"

"Were you carrying on an affair with him while professing to be the friend of his wife? Tell me that! Did she find you out and—"

"Oh, Brandon, why will you persist?" she cried, her eyes aflame. "I can tell you no more. Why do you glare at me as if I were the meanest thing on earth? Is this love? Is this your idea of greatness? Isn't it enough for you to know that Sara is my loyal, devoted friend; that she—"

"Wait!" he commanded darkly. "Is it possible that she did not discover your secret until the day you left her house so abruptly? Does that explain your sudden departure?"

"I can answer that," she said quietly. "She has known everything from the day I met her. I have not said anything, Brandon, to lead you to believe that I was in love with Challis Wrandall, have I?"

His eyes softened. "No, you haven't. I—I hope you will forget what I said. You see, I knew Wrandall's reputation. He had no sense of honor. He—"

"Well, I have!" she said levelly.

He flushed. "I am a beast! I'll put it in this way, then: Was he in love with you?"

"You are still unfair. I shall not answer."

He was silent for a long time. "And Sara's lips are sealed," he mused, still possessed of doubts and fears.

"Until she elects to tell the story, dearest love, my lips are also sealed. I love you better than anything else in all this world. I could willingly offer up my life for you, but—well, my life does not belong to me. It is Sara's."

"For heaven's sake, Hetty, what is all this?" he cried in desperation.

"I can say no more. It is useless to insist, Brandon. If you can wrest the story from her, all well and good. You will hate me then, dear love. But it cannot be helped. I am prepared."

"Tell me this much: When you refused to marry Leslie, was your course inspired by what had happened in—in connection with Challis Wrandall?"

"You forget that it is you that I love," she responded simply.

"But why should Sara urge you to marry Leslie if there is anything—"

"Hush! There is the waiter. Come to my sitting-room after breakfast. I have something to say to you. We must come to a definite understanding. This cannot go on."

He was with her for an hour in that pinched little sitting-room, and left her there without a vestige of rancour in his soul. She would not give an inch in the stand she had taken, but something immeasurably great in his make-up rose to the occasion and he went forth with the conviction that he had no right to demand more of her than she was ready to give. He was satisfied to abide by her decision. The spell of her was over him more completely than ever before.

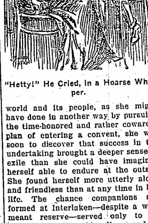
Two days later he saw her off at the Gare de Lyons, bound for Interlaken. There was a complete understanding between them. She wanted to be quite alone in the Alpine town; he was not to follow her there. She had reserved rooms at the Schweitzerhof, and the windows of her sitting-room looked straight up the valley to the snow-covered crest of the Jungfrau. She remembered these rooms; as a young girl she had occupied them with her father and mother. By some hook or crook, Booth arranged by wire for her to have them again, not an easy matter at that season of the year. Later she was to go to Lucerne, and then to Venice.

The slightest shred of hope was left for Booth. Even though he might accomplish the task he had set unto himself—the conquest of Sara in respect to the untold story—he still had Hetty's dismal prophecy that after he learned the truth he would come to see why they could not be married. But he would not despair.

"We'll see," was all that he said in response to her forlorn cry that they were parting for ever. There was a grimness in the way he said it that gave her something to cherish during the months to come; the hope that he would come back and take her in spite of herself.

He sailed from Cherbourg on the first steamship calling there. Awake, he thought of her; asleep, he dreamed of Challis Wrandall. There was something uncanny in the persistence with which that ruthless despoiler of peace forced his way into his dreams, to the absolute exclusion of all else. The voyage home was made horrid by these nightly reminders of a man he scarcely knew, yet dreaded. He became more or less obsessed by the idea that an evil spell had descended upon him in the shape of a ghostly influence.

The weeks passed slowly for Hetty. There were no letters from Sara, but an occasional line or so from Mr. Carroll. She had made Brandon Booth promise that he would not write to her, nor was he to expect anything from her. If her intention was to cut herself off entirely from her recent world and its people, as she might have done in another way by pursuing the time-honored and rather cowardly plan of entering a convent, she was soon to discover that success in the undertaking brought a deeper sense of exile than she could have imagined herself able to endure at the outset. She found herself more utterly alone and friendless than at any time in her life. The chance companions she formed at Interlaken—despite a well-meant reserve—served only to increase her feeling of loneliness and despair. The very natural attentions of men, young and old, depressed her, instead of encouraging that essentially feminine thing called vanity. She lived as one without an aim, without a single purpose except to close one day that she might begin the next.



"Hetty!" He Cried, in a Hoarse Whisper.

After a time, she went on to Lucerne. Here the life on the surface was gayer, and she was roused from her state of lethargy in spite of herself. Once, from her little balcony in the National, she saw two of her old acquaintances in the chorus at the Gaiety. They were wearing many pearls. Another time, she met them in the street. She was rather quietly dressed. They did not notice her. But the prosperous Hebraic gentlemen who attended them were not so careless.

One day a card was brought to her rooms. For the next two weeks she had a true and unavoidable friend in Lucerne. It would appear that Mrs. Rowe-Martin had not been apprised of the rift in the Wrandall lute. She had no reason to consider the exclusive Miss Castleton as anything but the most desirable of companions. Mrs. Rowe-Martin was not long in finding out (though how she did it, heaven knows), that Lord Murgatroyd's grandniece was no longer the intimate of that impossible person, Sara Gooch. She couldn't think of Sara without thinking of Gooch.

But at last Mrs. Rowe-Martin departed, much to Hetty's secret relief, but not before she had increased the girl's burthens by introducing her into a cold-nosed cosmopolitan set from which there were but three ways of escape. She refused to marry one of them, denied another the privilege of making love to her, and declined to play auction bridge with all of them. They were not long in dropping her, although it must be said there was real regret among the men.

From Mrs. Rowe-Martin and others she heard that Mrs. Redmond Wrandall and Vivian were to be in Scotland in October, for somebody-or-other's christening, and that Leslie had been doing some really wonderful flying at Pau.

"I am so glad, my dear," said Mrs. Rowe-Martin, "that you refused to marry Leslie. He is a cad. Besides, you would have been in a perpetual state of nerves over his flying."

Of Sara, there was no news, as might have been expected. Mrs. Rowe-Martin made it very clear that Sara was a respectable person—but heavens!

The chill days of autumn came and the crowd began to dwindle. Hetty made preparations to join in the exodus. As the days grew short and bleak, she found herself thinking more and more of the happy-hearted, symbolic dicky-bird on a faraway window ledge. His life was neither a travesty nor a tragedy; hers was both of these.

Something told her too that Brandon Booth had wormed the truth out of Sara, and that she would never see him again. It hurt her to think that while Sara believed in her, the man who loved her did not. It is a way men have.

CHAPTER XVI.

Vivian Airs Her Opinions.

Chief among Booth's virtues was his undeviating loyalty to a set purpose. He went back to America with the firm intention to clear up the mystery surrounding Hetty Castleton, no matter how irksome the delay in achieving his aim or how vigorous the methods he would have to employ. Sara Wrandall, to all purposes, held the key; his object in life now was to induce her to turn it in the lock and throw open the door so that he might enter in and become a sharer in the secrets beyond.

A certain amount of optimistic courage attended him in his campaign against what had been described to him as the impossible. He could see no clear reason why she should withhold the secret under the new conditions, when so much in the shape of happiness was at stake. It was in this spirit of confidence that he prepared to confront her on his arrival in New York, and it was the same unbounded faith in the belief that nothing evil could result from a perfectly just and honorable motive that gave him the needed courage.

He stayed over night in New York, and the next morning saw him on his way to Southlook. There was something truly ingenuous in his desire to get to the bottom of the matter without fear or apprehension. At the very worst, he maintained, there could be nothing more reprehensible than a passing infatuation, long since dispelled, or perhaps a mildly sinister episode in which virtue had been triumphant and vice defeated with unpleasant results to at least one person, and that person the husband of Sara Wrandall.

Pat met him at the station and drove him to the little cottage on the upper road.

"Ye didn't stay long," said he reflectively, after he had put the bag up in front. He took up the reins.

"Not very," replied his master.

After a dozen rods or more, Pat tried again.

"Just siventeen days, I make it."

"Seems longer."

"Perhaps you'll be after going back soon."

"Why should you think that, Patrick?"

"Because you don't seem to be takin' much interest in your surroundin's here," said Pat loftily. He delivered a smart smack on the crupper with his stubby whip, and pursed his lips for the companionship to be derived from whistling.

"I suppose you know why I went to Europe," said Booth, laying his hand affectionately on the man's arm.

"Sure I do," said Pat, forgetting to whistle. "And was it bad luck you had, sor?"

"A temporary case of it, I'm afraid."

"Well," said the Irishman, looking up at his employer with the most profound encouragement in his wink, "if it's anny help to you, sor, I'll say that I've never found bad luck to be anything but timporary. And, believe me, I've had plinty of it. Mary was dom near three years makin' up her mind to say yis to me."

"And since then you've had no bad luck?" said Booth, with a smile.

"Plinty of it, begob, but I've had some one besides meself to blame for it. There's a lot in that, Mr. Brandon. Whin a man marries, he simply divides his luck into two parts, good and bad, and if he's like most men he puts the bulk av the bad luck on his wife and kapes to himself all he can av the good for a rainy day. That's what makes him a strong man and able to meet trouble when it comes. The beauty av the arrangement is that bad luck is only timporary and a woman enjoys talking about it, while good luck is wid us nine-tenths of the time, whether we know it or not, and we don't have to talk about it."

This was fine philosophy, but Booth discerned the underlying motive.

"Have you been quarreling?"

"I have not," said Pat wrathfully. "But I won't say as much for Mary. The point av me argument is that I have all the good luck in havin' married her, and she claims to have had all the bad luck in marryin' me. Still, as I said before, 'tis but timporary. The good luck lasts and the bad don't. She'll be after tellin' me so before sundown. That's like all women. You'll find it out for yourself wan o' these days, Mr. Brandon, and ye'll be dom proud ye're a man and can enjoy your good luck when ye get it. The bad luck's always fallin' behind ye, and ye can always look forward to the good luck. So don't be downhearted. She'll take you, or me name's not what it ought to be."

Booth was inclined to accept this unique discourse as a fair-weather sign.

"Take these bags upstairs, Pat," said he on their arrival at the cottage, "and then come down and drive me over to Mrs. Wrandall's."

"Will ye be after stayin' for lunch with her, Mr. Brandon?" inquired Pat, climbing over the wheel.

"I can't answer that question now."

"Hiven help both av us if Mary's good luncheon goes to waste," said Pat ominously. "That's all I have to say. She'll take it out av both av us."

"Tell her I'll be here for lunch," said Booth, with alacrity. From which it may be perceived that master and man were of one mind when it came to considering the importance of Mary.

Pat studied his watch for a moment with a calculating eye.

"It's half-past eliven now, sor," he announced. "D'ye think ye can make it?"

Booth reflected. "I think not," he said. "I'll have luncheon first." Whereupon he leaped from the trap and went in to tell Mary how happy he was to be where he could enjoy home cooking.

At four he was delivered at Sara's door by the astute Patrick, announced by the sedate Watson and interrogated by the intelligent Murray, who seemed surprised to hear that he would not have anything cool to drink. Sara sent word that she would be down in fifteen minutes, but, as a matter of fact, appeared in less than three.

She came directly to the point.

"Well," she said, with her mysterious smile, "she sent you back to me, I see." He was still clasping her hand.

"Have you heard from her?" he asked quickly.

"No. But I knew just what would happen. I told you it would prove to be a wild-goose chase. Where is she?"

He sat down beside her on the cool, white covered couch.

"In Switzerland. I put her on the train the night before I sailed. Yes, she did send me back to you. Now I'm here, I want the whole story, Sara. What is it that stands between us?"

For an hour he pleaded with her, all to no purpose. She steadfastly refused to divulge the secret. Not even his blunt reference to Challis Wrandall's connection with the affair found a vulnerable spot in her armor.

"I shan't give it up, Sara," he said, at the end of his earnest harangue against the palpably unfair stand both she and Hetty were taking. "I mean to harass you, if you please, until I get what I'm after. It is of the most vital importance to me. Quite as much so, I am sure, as it appears to be to you. If Hetty will say the word, I'll take her gladly, just as she is, without knowing what all this is about. But, you see, she won't consent. There must be some way to override her. You both admit there is no legal barrier. You tell me today that there is no insanity in her family, and a lot of other things that I've been able to bring out by questioning, so I am more than ever certain that the obstacle is not so serious as you would have me believe. Therefore, I mean to pester you until you give in, my dear Sara."

"Very well," she said resignedly. "When may I expect a renewal of the conflict?"

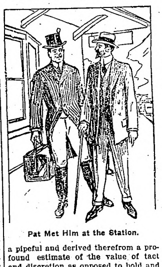
"Would tomorrow be convenient?" he asked quaintly.

She returned his smile. "Come to luncheon."

"Have I your permission to start the portrait?"

"Yes. As soon as you like."

He left her without feeling that he had gained an inch along the road to success. That night, in the gloaming of his starlit porch, he smoked many a pipeful and derived therefrom a profound estimate of the value of tact and discretion as opposed to bold and impulsive measures in the handling of a determined woman. He would make haste slowly, as the saying goes. Many an unexpected victory is gained by dilatory tactics, provided the blow is struck at the psychological moment of least resistance.



Pat Met Him at the Station.

Forged Antiques.

Arabic enameled glassware is prized as one of the finest productions of the glassmaker's art. Damascus is the principal point for the discovery of Arabic antiques, and undoubtedly much of it was made in that city in ancient times; but United States Consul John D. Whiting at Jerusalem has discovered that the business of manufacturing forgeries of the genuine article has assumed large proportions in Damascus.

MRS. WINN'S ADVICE TO WOMEN

Take Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and be Restored to Health.

Kansas City, Mo.—"The doctors told me I would never be a mother. Every month the pains were so bad that I could not bear my weight on one foot. I began taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and had not finished the first bottle when I felt greatly relieved and I took it until it made me sound and well, and I now have two fine baby girls. I cannot praise Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound too highly for what it has done for me. I always speak a word in favor of your medicine to other women who suffer when I have an opportunity." — Mrs. H. T. WINN, 1225 Freemont Ave., Kansas City, Mo.

Read What Another Woman says:

Cumming, Ga.—"I tell some suffering woman every day of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and what it has done for me. I could not eat or sleep, had a bad stomach and was in misery all the time. I could not do my housework or walk any distance without suffering great pain. I tried doctors' medicines and different patent medicines but failed to get relief. My husband brought home your Vegetable Compound and in two weeks I could eat anything, could sleep like a healthy baby, and walk a long distance without feeling tired. I can highly recommend your Vegetable Compound to women who suffer as I did, and you are at liberty to use this letter."—Mrs. CHARLIE BAGLEY, R. 3, Cumming, Ga.

WRONG KIND OF GARDENING

Form That Patient Had Been Indulging In Was Not What Doctor Would Have Recommended.

"Now comes the season when the wife goes to the country and the husband, in the words of the immortal song, shouts 'Hooray! Hooray!'"

Thus Jerome S. McWade, in an after dinner speech at Duluth began his response to a toast on "The Ladies."

"When the ladies are with us, we are safe," he resumed, "but when they go off to country or shore, leaving us in town alone, then our troubles begin.

"A man one summer day called on a doctor.

"'Doc,' he said, 'I'm all run down.'

"'You look it, too,' said the doctor sympathetically. 'I'm not going to prescribe drugs for a man in your condition. No, sir, what I'm going to prescribe for you is gardening.'

"The patient started and his unhealthy pallor turned to a dull brick red.

"'But, doc,' he said, 'gardening is the cause of all my trouble.'

"'Humph, what kind of gardening?' said the doctor incredulously.

"'Roof,' the man replied."

Valuable Information.

A happy couple were on their way to Scotland. They had to change trains at Carlisle, and an obliging porter, while struggling with the luggage, noticed that the young lady's hair was dotted with rice. He approached the young man and, pulling a folded paper from his pocket, said:

"A present for you, sir, with the company's compliments."

"Indeed," said the traveler; "what is it?"

"A railway map, sir."

"Oh, thank you; but what are these marks in blue pencil?"

"That's the beauty of it, sir; those marks show just where the tunnels are and their length."—London Tit-Bits.

Don't Poison Baby.

FORTY YEARS AGO almost every mother thought her child must have PAREGORIC or laudanum to make it sleep. These drugs will produce sleep, and a FEW DROPS TOO MANY will produce the SLEEP FROM WHICH THERE IS NO WAKING. Many are the children who have been killed or whose health has been ruined for life by paregoric, laudanum and morphine, each of which is a narcotic product of opium. Druggists are prohibited from selling either of the narcotics named to children at all, or to anybody without labelling them "poison." The definition of "narcotic" is: "A medicine which relieves pain and produces sleep, but which in poisonous doses produces stupor, coma, convulsions and death." The taste and smell of medicines containing opium are disguised, and sold under the names of "Drops," "Cordials," "Soothing Syrups," etc. You should not permit any medicine to be given to your children without you or your physician know of what it is composed. CASTORIA DOES NOT CONTAIN NARCOTICS, if it bears the signature of Chas. H. Fletcher.

Genuine Castoria always bears the signature of Chas. H. Fletcher.

Child Acts Surgeon's Role.

Sarah Shaffer, thirteen years old, of Los Angeles, Cal., developed into a little heroine when her five-year-old sister fell on the sidewalk while at play and shattered her elbow. Dr. Edward G. Wiley, chief police surgeon, explained patiently over the telephone how the splint should be put on, and Sarah made such a good job of it as to win the admiration of all who saw the tiny patient when she arrived at the receiving hospital with her little amateur nurse. The children's father is at the county hospital and their mother went to visit him. Maybelle fell and broke her arm. Sarah called up the receiving hospital, but owing to the distance was advised to call one of the district doctors. She could raise none, and again called the receiving hospital. Doctor Wiley told Sarah what to do to relieve the baby's pain, while the ambulance raced out to the Shaffer home, and Sarah obeyed instructions to the letter.

MEDIATORS CHANGE COURSE OF ACTION

NEW PLAN DEVISED AT NIAGARA FALLS ENCOURAGES ALL.

REBELS MAY BE CONSULTED

Will Probably Confer With American Delegates Informally Without Necessity of An Armistice.

Niagara Falls, Ont., June 23.—The mediators have proposed a new course of action which not only will prolong the proceedings, but may eventually work out a solution of the Mexican problem.

Plan Closely Guarded.

The nature of the plan which is designed to prevent the deadlock between the American and Mexican delegates, from abruptly ending the conference has been more closely guarded than anything which has transpired at the conferences.

It has become known, however, that another effort is being made to bring the Constitutionalists into close touch with the purposes of mediation without formally admitting them.

The suggestion contemplates separate conferences between the American delegates and representatives of the Constitutionalists. Justice Lamar and Frederick W. Lehmann would continue their dealings with Huerta delegates through the mediation board.

No Armistice Necessary.

In this way all elements in the Mexican situation would be drawn together and there would be no necessity for the declaration of an armistice until some agreement was reached and approved by the Constitutionalists.

The plan was said to be a result of the visit of Minister Naon of Argentina to Washington, where President Wilson is understood to have emphasized the written statement of Justice Lamar that any agreement reached by the mediation board, which was not approved by the Constitutionalists would be a "paper agreement," and would not accomplish the sole purpose of the United States, which is the pacification of Mexico.

It is reported that the Washington government already has extended an invitation to General Carranza to send his representatives to Niagara Falls, N. Y., to confer with the American delegates, but confirmation is lacking.

Mediators Are Silent.

Beyond saying that a definite step has been taken, which has raised their hope the mediators are silent.

It is also said that the three diplomats have revised their original plan for the pacification of Mexico, which had been approved by the Mexicans, but which was objected to in part by the American delegates.

Optimism prevails generally in American quarters while Dr. Naon reiterates that he has a feeling of genuine hopefulness.

There is a general impression that if Constitutionalist representatives are to be received by the American delegates, the discussion of names may be taken up anew, the generalities about types being abandoned for actual consideration of individuals.

Fortune Hunter's Mother Was Not Dealing in Uncertainties, If She Could Help It.

Miss Jeannette Gilder, the brilliant critic, toyed with a pink and gold mustache cup at the mustache cup tea concluding the Bad Taste exhibition in New York.

"The mustache cup," said Miss Gilder, "holds its own even better than the hand-painted cuspidor. But, after all, there is spiritual as well as material bad taste, and a spiritual bad taste exhibition is now in order.

"In the forefront of it I'd put the fortune hunter. Not all our fortune hunters come from across the water. I heard of one the other day who belongs to the oldest family in America.

"But his family is very poor, and so he and his mother have decided that he must marry for money. They were discussing recently, the pair of them, a western girl.

"'Her fortune is large but vague,' said the mother. 'Besides, she is gauche. Her feet are broad and flat. She has a gold front tooth. Her French is execrable. She—'

"'Oh, I could make something out of her,' the young fortune hunter asserted confidently.

"'Yes, but how much—that's the question,' said his mother."

Minding the Doctor.

"It isn't strange that Bob Hilliard should have won the heart and hand of a girl with three millions, for Bob, despite his years, is the handsomest and most elegant creature going."

The speaker, a dramatic critic of Chicago, smiled and continued:

"The last time Bob acted here I met him one morning promenading. And he was superb—top hat, stick, black morning coat, spats fitting without a wrinkle, and one of those cigarette tubes that had just come out, a tube of gold and amber, a foot long, or possibly 18 inches.

"As we chatted, and as he smoked his Egyptian cigarette through this extraordinary tube, I said to him:

"Why on earth, Bob, do you use such a long cigarette tube as that?"

"'My doctor has ordered me,' he replied, 'to keep away from tobacco.'"

Fooled Once.

Little Francis was not to be fooled twice.

The heavy black clouds had massed in the east and west, the lightning was flashing fiercely between the heavy, incessant rolling of the thunder.

Francis was terribly frightened, and his fond mother had gathered her young hopeful into her arms and tried logically to calm his fears.

"Don't be afraid, darling. There's nothing to fear. God sends the thunderstorm to clear the air, water the flowers and make it cooler for us. Now, don't cry, dear; it won't harm you, and everything will be better when it's over."

The little fellow listened intently, and as his mother finished he looked up at her gravely and said: "No, no, mother, you talk exactly the way you did last week when you took me to the dentist to have my tooth pulled."—Chicago Sunday Examiner.

Too Late.

On an Atlantic City pier, gazing sadly out over the blue water, a veteran of the Civil war talked about the late General Sickles.

"A good man," he said, "a brave man, but a most theatrical one. In the black tragedy of his youth, he was kind to his wife, but something marred, something vitiated his kindness—I think it was theatricalism—and the poor young woman died two years after he took her back.

"Once, at an army reunion, I heard Sickles rebuke a man who was running down wives and marriages. Sickles said with a queer smile, a significant smile, perhaps:

"'Ah, Jim, the trouble with the average married man is that he doesn't know what a jewel his wife is till he comes to put her in a casket.'"

Lowest Bidder.

"I have come to ask for the hand of your daughter," announced the young man.

"Have a chair," said her father, kindly. "I presume you have made an estimate of what it will cost to keep my daughter in the style to which she has been accustomed?"

"I have, sir."

"And your figures?"

"Ten thousand dollars a year."

"I'm sorry, my boy," said the older man, "but I cannot afford to throw away $2,000 a year. Another suitor has figured he can do it for $8,000."

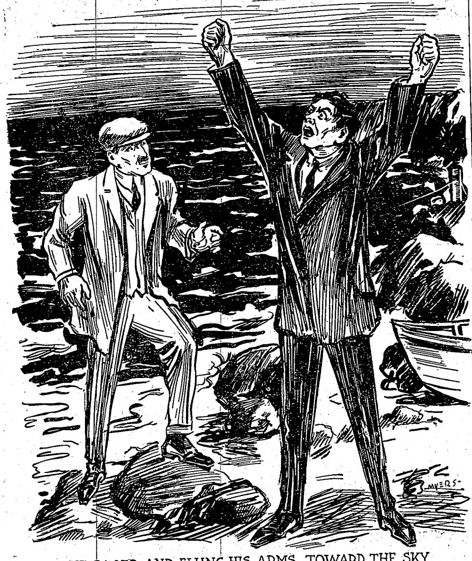
THE DEVIL CHAIR

A Chronicle of the Strange Adventures of John Haynes and His Gyroscope Vehicle

THE MAN AND THE MAELSTROM

By H. M. EGBERT

(Copyright by W. G. Chapman)



HE RAGED AND FLUNG HIS ARMS TOWARD THE SKY

On the lonely rock seven miles from the Norwegian coast John Haynes sat waiting. The gray fogs, lifting momentarily, disclosed the barren shores of the mainland far to the east, uprearing in steep cliffs beside the clefts of the fjords. All round him were the black, turbulent waters, ink-black under a sky of scurrying clouds, save where, two miles away, a line of foam showed that the returning tide was waking the terrific forces of the maelstrom, that giant circular whirlpool from whose clutches no ship has ever emerged. There John Haynes waited, a man so filled with the turbulence of his own angry dreams that he might have been himself one of those elemental, natural forces that played and struggled around him.

Of all the men who had banded themselves together to rob Haynes of his western lands, Frederick Beyers was first and foremost, both as regards the launching of the conspiracy and in the sharing of the spoil. Haynes was an Englishman who had fallen heir to a vast, undeveloped western territory whose value was estimated conservatively at eleven millions of dollars. Failing to induce him to accept a million in settlement of his just claims, the conspirators had leagued themselves with the law, bribed judges and lawyers, and sent him, under a false name, to the penitentiary for a trumped-up crime. Through the trickery of his own counsel Haynes was deprived of the opportunity to defend himself.

The rogues had hoped to enjoy the proceeds of their crimes undisturbed—at least during the fourteen years which Haynes was to serve. But in the prison workshop Haynes had invented a new and terrible machine—a gyroscope, which, attached to the feet, or any vehicle, would drive it at any speed up to two hundred miles an hour. As scientists know, the strangest feature of the gyroscope, which is nothing but a gigantic top, is that it maintains the angle of incidence at which it is first set spinning and cannot be dislodged therefrom. This feature, of course, communicates itself to the vehicle to which the top is attached; hence, it can traverse roads, single lines of railroads, or even rope cables, adhering tenaciously and firmly to the narrowest track. By aid of this contrivance Haynes had effected his escape from the penitentiary and he returned to the world to wreak justice upon his prosecutors.

One by one his enemies received their meed. Some died, some met more dreadful fates, unknown to the world, which, chronicling their disappearance with passing wonder, was unaware of what the rest of the conspirators knew but dared not publish—that Haynes was working out the vengeance which he was resolved to exact to the uttermost. Frederick Beyers was the boldest of those remaining. He did not wait for the blow to fall, but abandoning to his son the care of his business interests in Chicago, fled with his millions to the shelter of his steam yacht, and put out to sea. Provisioned for weeks, with a skilful crew, a library, a chef, and a selection of choicest wines, he cruised the seas. Beyers liked a sea life and was prepared to stretch out the period of his exile indefinitely—that is to say, within reasonable limits; until his own detectives succeeded in cornering his enemy.

But Haynes eluded Beyers' spies with ease. Mounted upon his gyroscope, he could traverse twelve hundred miles in a night. At last, in desperation, they abandoned the search for him. Beyers, condemned to exile for an unlimited period, accepted his fate rather than return to face his enemy. He sailed over the seas of Europe, wintering in the Mediterranean, then spending the summer months in the North sea and the Baltic. He was off Norway when at last Haynes found him.

After he emerged from the penitentiary at Nokomis Falls, Haynes found the daughter from whom he had been separated at the time of his arrest. She was living in a remote hamlet in northern New York, ignorant of her father's fate and thinking him dead. He rescued her and sent her to Chicago, instructing her to await his orders there, after enlisting her in his schemes for revenge. When his chase after Beyers began he instructed Eleanor to obtain a position as a stenographer in Beyer's offices in that city, now controlled by his son, in order that, if opportunity arose, she might obtain information serviceable to the fulfilment of his plans. Eleanor Haynes rose rapidly; within six months she had become young Beyers' confidential secretary; and it was from her that John Haynes discovered where his enemy was to be found.

Beyers was to be at Kristiensund, off the Norwegian coast, on a certain date in October. Haynes, disguised as an English tourist, found his yacht there provisioning. The man himself had gone into the interior for a week's salmon fishing, but was to return on the following Saturday. Nothing could have suited Haynes' plans better. But he found it impossible, in spite of his disguise, to go aboard; the watchman informed him that he was forbidden to admit strangers. As to Beyers, the man confided that he kept armed guards at his side who would not hesitate to shoot trespassers.

Haynes also learned that, since the village did not boast of a hotel, Beyers would sleep aboard the vessel on Saturday night, awaiting the Sunday morning tide which should give depth of channel to enable her to clear the narrow passage of the fjord, in which she found shelter from the turbulence of the North sea.

Haynes had five days in which to plan and achieve. He took the train to Kronstad, a northern port, and, representing himself to be an agent for a ship's chandler, he purchased there twelve thousand yards of strongest cordage. This he had placed aboard a sailing sloop in sections, and, loaded almost to the gunwale with his strange freight, he set his course for the lonely, uninhabited rock seven miles from Kristiensund, from which he hoped to draw Beyers to his destruction.

The scheme which he had contrived was the most fiendish that could have entered the brain of the most desperate and conscienceless criminal. It was, in its way, worthy of any of the famous murderers of the days when murder flourished as a fine art in Italy. Between the isolated rock and the mainland, at certain tides, there swept and eddied and sucked the giant whirlpool, the maelstrom, the most terrible monster of all the formidable perils of the sea. From the maw of this terrific monster no boat, once caught, has ever escaped. Drawn into it from distances of half a mile or more, its victims, with accelerated pace, rush to their destruction, spin for a few seconds upon the circumference of the monster, look, horror-stricken, into its gaping jaws, and then, circling at a terrible speed, plunge down to death, a thousand fathoms below.

Although, when the tide runs slack, boats may cross the site of the maelstrom unscathed, yet so potent is the terror which it inspires that none dare to approach it. No wonder, then, that the rock on which Haynes took up his abode was uninhabited!

He spent two whole days splicing his rope together. When at last the entire length had become a single piece, he spent a third day winding it around a series of strong poles which he placed deep in the sand, fortified by pyramids of rocks until they were immovable under the strongest strain that he could bring to bear. Then, filling his gasoline tank, he tested his gyroscope and set it up in such a manner that in its revolutions it would wind in the whole length of cordage. When this had been completed he let the gyroscope run down, fastened one end of the rope to the tiller of his boat, and, on the Friday night, when the tide ran low, he pulled for the mainland, towing the rope behind him, which unwound automatically as the gyroscope, no longer in action, spun like the gigantic top it was and drew the lengths of cordage from the poles.

The night was so intensely dark that Haynes could only gauge his direction from the revolving lamp in the lighthouse upon the great cliff which dominated the entrance to the fjord; and even with its aid he was so far drawn out of his course by the current that he landed finally two miles to the south of his destination, beneath the railroad terminal, which at this point approached within a score of yards of the cliff's edge. A train had just arrived with tourists aboard. Through the still air Haynes heard a woman's laugh and shivered for a moment, for the voice sounded strangely like that of his daughter. Almost it dissuaded him from his purpose; it was difficult to retain his mind at the tension necessary for its accomplishment when the thought of Eleanor came to him. But he dismissed this weakness and, with a shrug of the shoulder, pulled hard along the shore in the direction of Kristiensund.

Evidently the tourists had been bound for a neighboring village, not Kristiensund, for everything was dark. The inhabitants had retired to bed long since; while, from the fact that the vessel itself was dark, Haynes concluded that Beyers had not yet returned from his fishing trip. True, he might have elected to seek such shelter as the peasants in the vicinity of the station could offer him, in preference to the hazards of a night drive back to his ship through the darkness. Listening to assure himself that the watchman was not on deck, he paddled noiselessly to the stern end of the ship, and, taking the rope between his teeth, plunged overboard, found his footing on the sandy bottom on which the yacht rested, and fastened the rope securely around the rudder's base. When he emerged, breathless, dripping and shivering in the night air, he held the vessel captive; for, even had the steersman suspected that an invisible bond held her at the mercy of a man seven miles distant upon a barren island, the knowledge would come too late. Once in the grip of the waves, the vessel could not be stayed.

The early dawn was in the sky when John Haynes scrambled up the rocks of his island refuge. Without waiting to change his clothes, he filled his gasoline tank again and set the gyroscope in motion. The lengths of dripping cordage came up slowly out of the sea and wound themselves around the top. Haynes detached them as they looped themselves round it and carried them from post to post. At last the rope tightened, there came a hardly perceptible pull, and hastily he shut off the mechanism. That pull was the resistance of the ship, seven miles distant. Out of the mist-wrapped seas she answered him. He was her master, and master of those aboard.

But whether that were so or not did not matter to the man in the boat.

That he would have to sacrifice the lives of innocent men in order to achieve his revenge did not occur to Haynes. Nor would he have cared; for his whole soul was set upon the death of the chief of his enemies.

Haynes slept most of the day, but all through the night of Saturday he lay awake upon his lonely rock, shivering in the cold, and ever and anon taking the rope in his hands to feel that slight and indifinably thrilling resistance which told him that the yacht still lay at her anchorage. If she should sail too late! But that could not be; she could never emerge from the shallow waters of the fjord except at such a time as the same tide which carried her awakened the sleeping forces under the black surface of the ever-tossing sea. For the tide which bore the vessel from her sandy bed would also set in motion the slow, gigantic eddying of the whirlpool.

At four o'clock he took the rope in his hands and felt the strands tighten under his fingers. At five, when the waves were dashing more strongly on the rocks under the force of the tide, he pulled again. This time there came no pull in answer. The ship had sailed!

He touched the pin which set the gyroscope awhirl and, in the increasing light, saw the long, dripping lengths of rope emerge again. He ran from post to post, winding them round them in a fever of haste. But, as fast as he ran, the ship and gyroscope outpaced him. The cordage gathered, long fathoms of line, already green with the sea growths that had fastened themselves on it, upon the rocks behind him.

No matter; though the cordage lay loosely upon the rocks it would tighten soon enough when the pull of the maelstrom strove with the gyroscope. It was his purpose to set these two forces against each other, to hold the vessel suspended over the edge of the whirling trough for a full hour, kept there by the instrument which he had devised, before stopping the motor force and letting the ship plunge headlong into the sucking seas. He laughed loudly at the thought of his revenge.

A ray from the sun pierced the fog clouds. It shone on the black waters and brought into view the distant coast with its tall towering cliffs. Between them rolled the whitening surges of the maelstrom, two miles away. And equidistant between the pool and the shore was a tiny ship, as small, to his view, as a top ship on a pond, heading straight toward him.

His vengeance was on the point of accomplishment. Now, as the sun gained fullest mastery over the mists and illumined the vast breast of the sea, he could perceive that the oncoming vessel was sailing not head first, but stern first, her head pointing valiantly toward the receding shore. But all her engine power was helpless against the pulling force of the tide and the busy gyroscope that hummed beside him.

He had been so intent upon his task that he had not seen the boat which was approaching from behind a jutting angle of the rocks. It was not till her keel grated that he sprang to his feet, to meet the man who came toward him, clambering over the rocks. Then he gasped in amazement and dismay, and, overcome by his sudden advent, stood gaping at him, incapable of action.

For this was Frederick Beyers! But there was no thought of hostility in his mind, no sign of anger on his face; nor did he think to draw the pistol in his pocket, though Haynes was unarmed.

"You are surprised to see me here?" he asked. "You want to know how I came? I rowed across the strait this morning, before the tide set strong, to give you this." He drew a letter from his pocket, addressed to Haynes, but unstamped, and it was in his daughter's writing.

"Yes, I learned that you were here," said Beyers. "And I resolved to place my life in your hands, for I am tired of this ceaseless flight. Besides, things are different now. Read your letter, and then, if you still want revenge, we will fight our battle out here on these rocks."

Haynes opened the letter and hastily skimmed its contents. He flung it from him with a groan and sprang toward his enemy, who was examining the gyroscope with astonishment. He did not understand the purpose of it, nor of the poles and cord.

"The ship!" screamed Haynes, and pointed seaward. Beyers looked and for the first time saw the nearing vessel. She was traveling at a pace quite perceptible, stern on, and by her motions it was obvious that something astonishing was happening to her.

"I ordered her to wait at the entrance to the fjord," said Beyers. "She must be coming in search of me."

"Man! man!" yelled Haynes, catching the other by the arm, "do you see that line of foam toward which she is traveling? That is the maelstrom. Do you understand? There is no power on earth can save her. And it is you whose life I sought, not that of—my daughter."

He raged and flung his arms toward the sky, and the hum of the gryoscope sounded like the death-call to his hopes. In fact the man had wrought the destruction not of his foe, but of all he held dear. For the letter stated that his daughter had arrived at Krisiensund two nights before. She was married to Beyers' son. She begged his forgiveness; she was going with her husband to seek his father and she would carry the letter with her in order to send it to her father as soon as she could discover him. And he must put his revengeful plans behind him.

Presently Beyers touched the other upon the arm.

"Can nothing be done?" he asked. "Remember, if your daughter is aboard the Viking, my son is also. Can we forget our enmity now and fight to rescue them?"

His words recalled Haynes to his senses. He looked out. The ship was traveling at a fearful pace toward that line of foam, which heaved and shuddered as the unchained devil beneath it reared himself and stretched out his gaping jaws for his victims. Suddenly a hope, born of desperation, came to the Englishman.

"There is a chance!" he muttered. "There's one chance in a thousand—the gyroscope can pull the ship across the whirlpool without sinking her—if the rope stands the strain!" He rushed towards the machine. "Pull in the coils and follow me," he shouted, and the two raced furiously from pole to pole, winding in the slack of the rope, while the gyroscope hummed and buzzed busily and the oncoming vessel leaped racing toward the maelstrom.

At last the rope rose taut out of the sea. The slack was folded. They dared look seaward again and saw the yacht turning slowly upon a circular course that never closed, since at each completed circle she rode nearer toward a central point, blacker than pitch in the midst of the spume-tossed waters. It was the heart of the maelstrom.

Yet the tug of the gyroscope was not ineffective, for, though the ship plunged like an unbroken colt, it could be seen that she still evaded the pit that yearned for her, and, though she spun like a top upon the dizzy edge of it, the pull of the mechanism counteracted the force of the maelstrom. And neither gained, and round and round that crater of death the vessel raced, half under water and yet upheld by the strong centrifugal force of her swift motion.

If she could stay thus until the tide went down and the devil returned to sleep beneath the top of the waves! But even now the force of each contending power was equal, and the tide was not at the full. Two hours must pass, and long before that time the gyroscope would fail and the rope slacken and the maelstrom claim its prey. Or even earlier the cable might part asunder.

Had the pull been direct it would have parted long ago, for the rope was by far the weakest of the three contending forces. But since the whirlpool's power was not direct, but always exerted laterally, the rope had play as the ship circled upon her course, and hence held, though it was now stretched like a taut bridge over the waters.

A desperate hope entered Haynes' brain.

"Beyers," he shouted, catching at the other's arm like a maniac, "if I make fast the rope, twining it tightly among these poles, do you think you can hold in the slack after I shut off the gyroscope?"

The other did not understand. Haynes shut off the machine one instant, and the rope shot through his companion's hands and cut them to the bone. Beyers dropped it with a scream. Haynes started the gyroscope, picked up the rope, and wound it among the poles, fastening it in knots with all the force that he could bring to bear. When he had tied seven or eight he took the slack in his hands and touched the pin of the machine again. The humming ceased; Haynes, straining against the rope, held it with an effort. He fastened seven more knots and tried again. This time he held the rope easily. When he let go there was a straining of the posts, but the rope did not run seaward.

"Now, Beyers," he said, handing the slack to his companion, "hold this as best you can and watch the posts. I am going to remove the gyroscope. There will come a time when the pull of the maelstrom will uproot these poles and carry the rope away. But that should not be for an hour. For half an hour, at least, we are safe. Hold the slack firm; fight with every ounce of your strength; fight as though you were one of these living rocks that have fought against the elements through uncounted ages—for there are lives more precious than our own at stake."

He hurried down to the edge of the sea and, grasping the boat which Beyers had brought, he dragged it to the small strip of sand which formed the anchorage and landing place. From his own sailing sloop he brought a hammer and nails and planks and cords. Then, lifting the gyroscope, he set it under the keel of the overturned boat.

"How does the rope stand?" he shouted to the man above.

"Holding!" cried Beyers briefly, and Haynes set to work. In ten minutes, with planks and nails, he had secured the gyroscope to the keel of the boat. Beside him the green, dripping rope skimmed the top of the sea. It ran, a snaky, undulating ribbon over the waters to where the Viking reached and spun over that pool of death. She was tilted more dangerously now, but still centrifugal force upheld her.

"Come here!" called Haynes, and, when Beyers ran to him, he added, "lift up the boat with me and plant her so that the rope catches the groove in the wheel under her."

Beyers obeyed, and now the boat lay once more on the sand, the rope stretched under her and climbing the rocks behind her. Haynes motioned Beyers back to his place. He stepped inside and, bending over, touched the pin which set the gyroscope beneath the boat in action.

Instantly the boat rose on the rope. She stood erect as though floating on the pond of a mill; her timbers quivered, and suddenly Beyers, watching above, saw her dart off across the surface of the sea, running like an arrow across that undulating line to where the yacht circled the edge of the maelstrom. His eyes could hardly follow her course.

Two minutes later a little group, lashed to the deck of the Viking, saw a boat by her side, apparently anchored in the air. The yacht swung at so great an angle that her gunwale was level with that of the boat, and the seas swept both incessantly. And though the vessel swung round at an appalling speed, and heaven and sea were blended in one infuriate cloud, and a roar as of thunder had long since deafened their ears and dulled their senses, that boat rested beside them as though beside a mooring stage.

Haynes looked down. He looked down into an immense, eddying space, a pool of blackest night edged with white foam, a crater which, instead of belching forth, tugged down. All was motionless in the center of this terrific hole in the sea, and the walls of it were solid as earth and ridged with streaks and splashes of fire. And, looking down, he felt an irresistible impulse to leap into it.

Then the memory of those whom he had come to save revived his swimming senses.

He looked up. Eleanor stood lashed beside him, not six paces away, and by her her husband. And near them was a little group of sailors, similarly lashed to the rail. He shuddered and stretched out his arms.

"Eleanor!" he called.

She saw him but she did not heed him. She thought him but the fantasy of delirium. Nor did the others heed but gravely looked at him. Their senses had been numbed by the imminence of death and by the whirl of the ship.

Although the boat spun round beside the ship, rising and falling in its dizzy, circling course, she maintained a perfectly even keel, and her nose, thrust hard against the vessel by the impelling force of the gyroscope, made the two one. There was not an inch of space between their sides. Haynes drew his knife and cut Eleanor's bonds and held out his hand to her.

"Come, Eleanor!" he said.

She obeyed him as though hypnotized. She did not speak or seem to recognize him, but gravely stepped into the boat and, at his bidding crouched there. In like manner Haynes rescued her husband—then the sailors. Then, when the boat was full, Haynes leaned over the side and reversed the gyroscope.

Two minutes later the boat's keel grated upon the island shore. And then, as though a marble statue thawed into life, Eleanor awoke, and flung her arms about her father's neck weeping, and the rest awoke and knew that their dream had proved to be reality.

But before either could speak a cry came from above, and Beyers ran down the rocks, shouting and pointing seaward. As though shot from a cannon the lengths of line went hurtling through the air, screaming against the wind like sirens. And, with a plunge the Viking reared herself and disappeared beneath the waves.

Beyers grasped Haynes' hand silently.

Holding Trade.

"You look disgruntled," said the shoe man.

"Yes," snapped the hatter. "Had a little rush just now, and a couple of prospective customers walked out without being waited on."

"They seldom get away from me," declared the shoe man. "I take off their shoes as soon as they come in."—Judge.

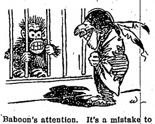
Indians at Philadelphia Zoo Laugh at Animals



PHILADELPHIA, PA.—Whoever thinks an Indian never laughs should have been at the Zoological gardens the other afternoon when a group of seven Blackfeet braves and four squaws, in full warpaint and feathers, saw for the first time the curious wild animals from all parts of the world. The redskins simply roared with mirth from the time they struck the garden until they left. Every animal amused them highly, particularly the monkeys, and both furnished amusement for the great crowd in attendance.

Medicine Owl, one of the huskiest of the braves, stopped stock still in front of the cage holding the largest baboon in the garden. He let loose several loud guffaws and attracted Mr. Baboon's attention. It's a mistake to try to make a monkey out of a baboon. He resents it. This particular baboon did, anyhow, and he showed his anger by shaking the bars of the cage, chattering shrilly and making the most horrible of faces. The madder he got the more Medicine Owl laughed and the more Medicine Owl laughed the madder the baboon became. The other Indians joined in Medicine Owl's screams and the baboon went into a frenzy. He tore around the cage until he could stand it no longer. With a last frightful grimace at the convulsed redskins he dashed headfirst against a swinging door leading to the outside cage and dived right through, disappearing from view.

None of the other animals paid as much attention to the Indians' laughter as the baboon. The lions, tigers and other members of the cat family were too busy feeding to give any notice to the Indians as they passed through the carnivora house.

Sporty Driver Finds "Uncle" Is the Town Police

BOSTON, MASS.—Ovide W. Meumier drove his rig jauntily through the streets of Holbrook. Carelessly he glanced to the right and left, drinking in the admiring looks of the populace. He looked like real money and he knew it. He was in high fettle.

But Orvide didn't know just how shrewd the Holbrookites are, and the result was that the next day he was fined $50 for carrying a loaded revolver by Judge Avery in the Quincy police court, and was wanted by the Fall River police for the larceny of the rig he so sportively drove.

When Orvide met up with Thomas Carrig he believed he had come to the very man who would buy the rig. The horse was a beautiful, high-stepping bay, and the carriage was one of the sporty variety. It was then that Ovide made his first mistake.

He offered the rig to Carrig for $22. But Carrig has a son who wasn't the "rube" Ovide thought he was. The son, John, became suspicious, for he knew horseflesh. He called up the police department, Chief Walter Crooker. The department responded, represented himself as John's uncle, and invited Ovide to take him to the uncle's office where the trade could be carried through.

Ovid didn't suspect any rude trick, so he drove to the office. There's where he made his second mistake, for on his arrival at the so-called uncle's office he found himself under arrest.

Andrew Carnegie a Prisoner in His Own Garden

HELP ME OUT OF HERE—
NIX

NEW YORK.—Andrew Carnegie left here the other day on board the Oceanic, singing a song of peace, but he told of having his temper ruffled on the previous night when he was accidentally made a prisoner in his own yard. He found that he had closed a door with a spring lock and could not get back into his house, so he paced back and forth in the garden, eagerly looking through the steel pickets that rise 12 feet above the street. A boy about twelve years old came ambling up the street whistling a song of spring.

"Come here my boy," said Mr. Carnegie, peering out from the garden.

"What do you want?" said the boy.

"I am Mr. Carnegie and I find that I have locked myself out here in the garden. Will you please go around to the front door and tell the servants of my predicament."

"Not me," said the boy, with a wave of his hand. "You ain't Mr. Carnegie. If you were you wouldn't be kept out there in the yard."

"Now, really, my good boy, I am truly Mr. Carnegie."

"Nobody home, nobody home," said the boy, starting to walk away.

"The thing was beginning to distract me," said Mr. Carnegie, as he told of the incident. "I had gone into the garden to pick a bouquet to take with me on shipboard. So I called to the boy again, telling him I would give him one of the flowers I had in my hand if he would notify the servants."

"Oh, I'll take a chance," said the boy. He did and he waited for a larger reward than the flower when he learned that the man who spoke to him really was Mr. Carnegie.

Wanted Charity Organization to Build Her Fire

SEND SOME ONE TO MY HOUSE TO BUILD A FIRE—

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.—The women engaged in social service work at the Charity Organization society are skilled in the art of lending a sympathetic ear to the daily tales of woe that come to them. They are quick to discern the cases where aid is worthily deserved and gladly do everything in their power to put the unfortunate on his feet. And they are just as quick to see through the efforts of schemers to get something for nothing. But when a middle-aged woman, neatly dressed, walked into the office and placed her application for aid before one of the women, all the previous training and experience almost failed to serve her.

"I want you to send someone out to my house to build a fire," said the woman, smiling sweetly. Seeing the look of amazement spreading over the face of the woman behind the desk, she evidently thought some explanation was due. "You see I just rented a house," she said, "and I must have a fire built to warm it up. I thought the woman I rented the house of would see to that or I wouldn't have rented it."

"Well, the nerve of some people," was the sentiment the charity worker felt like expressing. But she did not. She assumed a very solemn air and told the applicant for "aid" that the society was only too willing to supply the cupboards of hungry families, put coal into empty coal bins, and provide clothing for the worthy, but that the society had not reached that millennial state when it would assume the task of fire making for able-bodied people as another branch of the relief work.

VOTED FOR HIM TWICE ON SAME DAY

© HARRIS & EWING

Representative Michael Donohoe of Philadelphia, who, his friends boast and his enemies admit, won his election less upon political issues than his attractive personality, takes but a small part in practical politics.

"I'm very green at the game," he declares (a good color for a native-born Irishman, by the way), "which makes me somewhat of a shining mark in some respects. The morning after my last election there breezed into my office a fellow, large and pleasant. He effusively congratulated me with both hands and every breath—which was alcoholically overcharged—and assured me of the satisfaction it had given him to vote for me. Thanking him, I asked:

"'What part of the district do you live in?'

"'Oi'm from over th' bridge,' he replied in rich County Carlow brogue! (Mr. Donohoe doesn't have to make any effort to get that brogue.)

"'What ward do you live in?'

"'And Oi'm in Kelly's ward, to be sure, y'r honor,' he replied.

"'Kelly's ward?' I queried, for I did know enough to identify a well-known local leader. 'Why Kelly's ward isn't in my district at all!'

"'Sure, an' it isn't at all, at all,' exclaimed the sly rogue, with delightful coolness. 'But I voted for yez, Misther Donohoe,' he added with a chuckle—'twice!'"

"JERRY" DONOVAN'S CHANGE OF HEART

Representative "Jerry" Donovan, a Democrat from Connecticut, who bristles indignantly when he contemplates absenteeism in the house, renounced the other day an opportunity to preside over that body and gave to Speaker Clark the credit of unintentionally preventing a night session.

Under the special rule for the consideration of the antitrust bills the house was to hold night sessions while general debate continued. When the hour for the dinner recess arrived one Saturday Representative Webb asked unanimous consent that adjournment be taken until Monday, setting aside the night session.

"I object," said Mr. Donovan.

"We have nobody to speak," said Mr. Webb, casting his eye over the twenty-odd members present.

"Then go ahead with the reading of the bill," said Mr. Donovan. "Where is everybody? Where are the distinguished gentlemen who ought to be on the Republican side?"

"Where are the Democrats?" interjected a voice from the Republican side.

"Well, I'm tired of all this debate," said Mr. Donovan. "You must meet tonight unless the gentleman in charge of the bill agrees to knock off five hours from the time."

Mr. Webb said he couldn't think of doing this.

"The chair names the gentleman from Connecticut to preside at the night session," said Speaker Clark.

"Rather than preside over this body," said Mr. Donovan, who is serving his first term, "I will withdraw my objection."

WINGO TELLS ONE ON HIMSELF

© HARRIS & EWING

Representative Otis Wingo of Arkansas looks more like the southern congressman imaged in the popular mind than any man in the capital's public life. In Prince Albert coat, black slouch hat and black string tie falling over a capacious expanse of white shirt front, as he walks sedately down the corridor, he seems to have stepped bodily from the pages of some political novel.

And Mr. Wingo knows it; also he is proud of it. Hence, when he told the following little story on himself it was only upon the solemn oath of his auditor that not a word of it should appear in print.

It seems that Mr. Wingo, having in tow a visiting constituent whom he wished to impress with his political magnitude, was standing waiting at the door of an elevator in the House office building. Mr. Wingo rang the bell; but to his disgust the descending elevator swept airily by without even hesitating. This hurt.

"Why didn't you stop for me on your way down just now?" queried Mr. Wingo sourly as they were descending on the next trip.

"Couldn't stop for you," replied the elevator boy with lofty finality. "Had a congressman on board."

"And this," ejaculated Mr. Wingo, as he told the story, "before that constituent!"

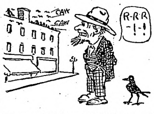
MAN WHO CAPTURED SANTA ANNA

"And so Gen. Santa Anna surrendered to me," said Sergt. Peter Daly, "and I introduced him to the line sergeant, and off we all went to Gen. Winfield Scott. And," Sergeant Daly added, impressively, "that ended the war."

On the porch of his daughter's comfortable frame cottage in the Bronx, New York city, on these warm days sits Peter Daly, and smokes his pipe, and tells what he remembers of "the war." There is only one war for Peter Daly, and although he is ninety-one years old, and no one thinks of calling him "Sergeant" nowadays, the salient episodes of his career as a fighter stand out as clearly, and as significantly, as if they had happened yesterday. Sergt. Peter Daly has almost forgotten that the Civil war was ever fought, or that we had battles in 1898 in the West Indies and Manila bay. The Mexican war was his war, and Winfield Scott was his general. And he, Peter Daly, was the man to whom the Mexican commander surrendered.

WASHINGTON GOSSIP

This Farmer Man Knew Something About Crows



WASHINGTON.—Consider crowds:

A farmer man was going along a business street up Georgetown way when, above the clash of traffic, he heard a sound that caused him to look upward. And there on a chimney ledge perched a crow shrilling out his:

"Caw, caw, caw."

While the farmer man was craning his neck, another man, in passing, paused to inquire fraternally:

"Pet of yours got away?"

The answer went off like an explosion:

"What in thunder do you suppose a farmer wants with a crow except to shoot him? I'm plagued to death every year of my life with the darn things watchin' my corn hills from the fence rails, and the first thing I hear when I get to town is this infernal cawin'. What do you reckon that rascal up yonder means by wasting his time here where there are no crops to rob, huh?"

"Oh, we've got a rookery of 40,000 crows near Arlington, and I've watched their goings and comings for forty years. You could time a clock by their movements. Every morning in the early gray they fly down the Potomac to their feeding grounds."

"That's where they get me, blank 'em!" The farmer man made his adjective good and strong—no, not good, just strong!

"Caw, caw, caw," shrilled the crow.

Not So Bad as Cynics Would Have Us Believe

A MAN was limping through Lafayette square.

It was so early of a Sunday morning that the grounds were empty except for the man and a lone person who was coming down a path toward him, and the same primeval stillness lay over the streets outside, not counting the iconoclastic rattle of passing cars.

The man limped because of a stiff leg that had to be helped out with a cane, and it was a slow limp because, again, his architecture included a bay-window front incompatible with high speed. He carried a newspaper and was lumbering toward a tree-shaded bench, when—

Something in the grass caught his eye. It must have been an important find, for, stiff and stout as he was, he made an elaborate effort to reach down to it——and failed.

Then he straightened up, gave a jiu-jitsu twist to his body and tried to stoop sideways. He failed again.

Nobody wants to be officious, but the lone person who had come along and was about to pass thought it might be a case of dropped specs, or something vital like that, and volunteered first aid.

"Thank you, madam. I would very much like to have one of these white clovers if I might tax your kindness."

The lone person picked exactly one clover from the white powdered grass, and handed it to him. The man accepted it with a bubble of confidence due the occasion.

"These little blooms take me back a half century to the farm that was my home when I was a boy."

The woman smiled appreciative recognition of the sentiment as she passed on; the man lumbered over to his bench and—well, that was really all there was to it except—

When a stiff, stout man, over fifty, can carry about with him enough honest boyhood to prize a clover top for the sake of its associations, the world can't be half so bad as the cynics would have us believe.

This Congressman Comes From a Land of Plenty

I COME FROM WHERE TH' ICY WATERS OF TH' ATLANTIC BEAT UPON TH' BLEAK CRAGS O' MAINE TO—

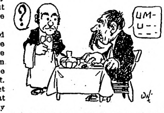
"I COME," said Representative Holland of the Norfolk, Va., district—and there was a world of pride in his tones—"I come from that land famed the world over for its good things to eat. A land the fair renown of whose oysters and terrapin and hams is sung throughout the length and breadth of the nation from where"—and Mr. Holland, waxing eloquent, harked back to valedictorian days—"from where the icy waters of the Atlantic beat upon the bleak crags of Maine to where the placid waters of the blue Pacific kiss the golden—"

"It's a fact, sir, a fact," concluded Mr. Holland, when reminded that these stories must be limited to 400 words. "I'm right about it; dead right!" And Mr. Holland is right about it; dead right. Just listen to this luscious litany of the succulent, savory things hailing from the district that calls him representative—a litany he chants with reverent ecstacy, as who wouldn't:

Lynnhaven oysters, canvas-back duck, diamond-back terrapin, Crisfield crabs, Norfolk spots, Chesapeake shad, sora, reedbirds, Smithfield hams, March strawberries, April green peas—

Here, waiter, quick! What's tariffs to terrapin, or currency bills to canvas-backs! And don't forget the peanut!

Thing That Thrills Some Visitors to the Capital



ONE thing about the small town visitor that thrills is the niceties he preserves in eating. If a confirmed habitue of one of Washington's fashionable restaurants happens to drop a particularly choice bit of meat on the tablecloth he calmly and unhurriedly retrieves it. He is not nervous about it. He is not even nervous if the waiter looks at him reproachfully.

The writer saw one huge, bronzed man with a mighty walrus mustache and an appearance which justified the belief that he could face 15 bad men with guns and not wink an eye. The bad man had ordered a veal cutlet. And one of the best bits of the cutlet escaped the curtain-draped cave that he called his mouth and fell slushily upon the white cloth. The mighty man extended a hamlike hand to pick it up and had almost captured his game when, looking up, he caught the eye of the waiter. His face turned crimson. His colossal hand flapped feebly around, while he pretended to be trying to look at the salt cellar, the sauce—anything. The waiter went toward him icily.

"Anything, sir?" he wanted to know.

"N-n-nothin'," faltered the big man. "I was—"

"Salt, sir?" asked the waiter, solicitously.

"Ye-es," he stuttered.

The salt was handed him and he spoiled the remainder of his cutlet with it.

And during the rest of the dreary meal he ate solemnly, sadly, hopelessly.

AUSTRIAN HEIR AND WIFE SLAIN WHILE ON TOUR

Royal Couple Escape Bomb Only to be Shot Shortly Afterwards--Both Assassins Are Youthful Servians.

Sarajevo, June 30.—Archduke Francis Ferdinand, heir to the Austro-Hungarian throne, and his morganatic wife, the Duchess of Hollenberg, were assassinated while driving through the streets of Serajevo, the Bosnian capital.

Student Fired Shots.

A youthful Servian student fired the shots which added another to the long list of tragedies that has darkened the reign of Emperor Francis Joseph.

The archduke and his wife were victims of the second attempt in the same day against their lives. First a bomb was thrown at the automobile in which they were driving to the town hall. Forewarned, however, of a possible attempt against his life, the archduke was watchful and struck the missile aside with his arm. It fell under an automobile which carried members of his suite, wounding Count Van Boos-Waldeck and Colonel Merizzo.

Both Mortally Wounded.

On their return from the town hall the archduke and the duchess were driving to the hospital when the Servian, Gavrio Prinzip, darted at the car and fired a volley at the occupants. His aim was true, for the archduke and his wife were mortally wounded. With them at the time was the governor of the city, who escaped injury.

The bodies of his murdered companions collapsed across him and protected him from stray bullets.

The governor shouted to the chauffeur to rush to the palace at top speed. Physicians were in prompt attendance, but their services were useless as the archduke and his wife were dead before the palace was reached.

Bomb Filled With Nails.

The bomb was filled with nails and lead filings and the explosion was violent.

The iron shutters on many shops were pierced by flying fragments and iron railings were shattered. About a score of persons were injured, several of them being women and children.

The murders occurred with such rapidity that many persons near the scene did not even hear the shots. The street is very narrow and assassin was able to fire at close range.

The first attempt against the archduke occurred just outside the girls' high school. His car had started after a brief pause for an inspection of the building when Gabrinovics hurled the bomb. This was so successfully warded off by the archduke that it fell directly beneath the following car, the occupants of which, Count von Boos-Waldeck and Colonel Merizzo, were struck by slivers of iron.

Archduke Proceeds On.

Archduke Francis Ferdinand stopped his car and after making inquiries as to their injuries and lending what aid he could, continued his journey to the town hall. There the burgomaster began the customary address, but the archduke sharply interrupted and snapped out:

"Herr Burgomaster, we have come here to pay you a visit and bombs have been thrown at us. This is altogether an amazing indignity."

After a pause, the archduke said:

"Now, you may speak."

On leaving the hall the archduke and his wife announced their intention of visiting the wounded members of their suite at the hospital on their way back to the palace. They were actually bound on their mission of mercy, when, at the corner of Rudolf strasse and Frantz Josef strasse, Prinzip opened fire.

Couple Both Shot.

A bullet struck the archduke in the face. The duchess was wounded in the abdomen and another bullet struck her in the throat, severing an artery. She fell unconscious across her husband's knee. At the same moment the archduke sank to the floor of the car.

The assassins were interrogated by the police and both seemed to glory in their exploit. Prinzip said he had studied for a time at Belgrade. He declared he had long intended to kill some eminent person from Nationalist motives. He was awaiting the archduke at a point where he knew the automobile would slacken speed, turning into Franz Josef strasse. The presence of the duchess in the car caused him to hesitate, but only for a moment. Then his nerve returned and he emptied his pistol at the imperial pair. He denied that he had any accomplices.

Both Assassins Young.

Prinzip is 18 years old. Nedeljo Gabrinovics is 21. He told the police he had obtained the bomb from anarchists at Belgrade, whose names he did not know. He denied also that he had accomplices and treated the tragedy with cynical indifference.

Anti-Servian demonstrations followed. The crowds knelt in the streets and sang the national anthem. The mayor of Serajevo issued a proclamation to the residents of the city, denouncing the crime and declaring that by the confession of the assassin it was shown beyond all doubt that the bomb thrown at the archduke's car came from Belgrade.

It is said that after the attempt with the bomb near the Girls' high school the duchess tried to dissuade the archduke from venturing into the motor car again. To allay her fears, M. Potiorek, governor of Bosnia, said:

"It's all over now. We have not more than one murderer in Serajevo."

Whereupon the archduke decided to go on.

News Overwhelms Emperor.

Vienna.—When news of the assassination of Archduke Francis Ferdinand was imparted to the aged emperor he exclaimed: "Terrible! Terrible! I am spared nothing."

Austrian opinion regards the tragedy the result of a well-prepared conspiracy. It is asserted that when it became known at the Servian legation here that the archduke intended to go to Bosnia he was advised not to undertake the journey, as certain Servian desperadoes were planning an attempt against his life.

Archduke Disregards Warning.

The archduke disregarded the warning and approached to Serajevo. He took up his residence at a watering place near the Bosnian capital and attended various fetes as well as army maneuvers which ended Saturday. He issued an army order expressing great satisfaction at the maneuvers.

Telegrams have been received from all parts of the kingdom announcing the immense sensation caused by the crime. All public festivities have been cancelled.

Anti-Servian demonstrations occurred outside the Servian legation and stones were thrown at the residences of prominent Servians. Troops were ordered out to suppress the disorders.

It is reported here that several Bosnians and Serbs have been arrested at Serajevo for complicity in the plot, which is said to have wide ramifications. The newspapers have issued special editions with black borders expressing abhorrence of the crime.

Ever since the publication of an imperial rescript, on Oct. 7, 1908, proclaiming the annexation of Bosnia-Herzegovina to Austria, strong opposition to Austrian rule has been displayed by the Serb and Moslem residents of those provinces.

Former in Turkish Territory.

Bosnia and Herzegovina were formerly included in European Turkey, but the Austro-Hungarian occupation was authorized in 1878 by the treaty of Berlin. The treaty, however, contemplated the evacuation of the occupied provinces after the restoration of order. In 1908 there was a reform movement in Turkey which might mean the revival of Ottoman power, and Russia, after her war with Japan, showed weakness. Events in the near East seemed propitious and, with small formality, the Austrian government added the two provinces to its territory. In this act Archduke Francis Ferdinand is said to have played an important part.

Servia was so incensed at Austria's action that she threatened war, but after several months of negotiations among the powers, capitulated and accepted the situation.

It is feared that the Serajevo tragedy will still further embitter the none too friendly relations between Austria and Servia.

Born in 1863.

Vienna, June 29.—The assassination of Archduke Francis Ferdinand not only complicated already troubled Austro-Hungarian succession, but also removed from the stage of international affairs one of its most secretive and romantic figures.

Born at Gratz, Styria, on Dec. 18, 1863, the son of the late Archduke Charles Louis and Princess Annunciata, daughter of King Ferdinand of the two Sicilies, his succession to the throne seemed remote. The heir apparent was Crown Prince Rudolph, son of Emperor Francis Joseph.

When Francis Ferdinand was but 8 years old his mother died, and his father gave him into the hands of Jesuit teachers, with instructions that he be brought up untainted by the wickedness of the nineteenth century. Consequently the nephew of the present ruler was not educated as a future wearer of the crown. But when the tragic end of the crown prince in 1889 brought him to the steps of the throne he began assiduously to prepare himself for the high position which seemed destined to be his.

Dissipated Early in Life.

His early youth was clouded with dissipations which threatened to result in his undoing. In fact an episode, the exact nature of which has never been disclosed, resulted in his banishment from Austria, only to be recalled after the sudden death of the crown prince.

Though various archduchesses and princesses were suggested as proper objects for the attractions of the new heir apparent, he persistently refused to act in accordance with them, and in 1900 he horrified court circles by announcing his intention to marry—not an archduchess, but a simple lady-in-waiting to an archduchess, the Countess Sophie Chotek, daughter of a diplomatist of an ancient but far from royal house.

But under the law such a marriage between a member of the royal house and a subject, while binding between man and wife, was morganatic—which means that it would require the archduke formally to renounce all possible claims of his wife to royal rights and of his children to possible succession to the throne.

Francis Joseph Displeased.

Francis Joseph, however, was never pleased with his nephew's conduct, but he gave his imperial consent to the marriage upon condition that the archduke strictly observe the Hapsburg laws and never attempt to place his morganatic wife upon the throne or establish the right of succession for his children.

The real significance of the whole matter, however, lies in that the tragic death of the archduke and his wife before the former's ascension to the throne leaves the heir apparent to the throne, not the elder of the archduke's two sons, but his nephew, Archduke Karl Francis Joseph, son of the late Archduke Otto, brother of Francis Ferdinand.

Oldest European Ruler is Saddest Monarch of All

FRANCIS JOSEPH,
Emperor of Austria.

WHY EMPEROR IS SAD.

Many family tragedies have made Francis Joseph known as "the saddest of monarchs." A list of tragedies marking his rule is as follows:

His wife, "the good Elizabeth," was assassinated in Switzerland by an anarchist.

His brother, Mixmilian, was executed in Mexico.

His only son, Rudolph, was a suicide.

His sister-in-law, the Duchess d'Alencon, was burned to death at a charity bazaar in Paris.

His favorite grandchild married against his wishes and her love ended in the shooting of her rival.

His nephew and heir-apparent, Archduke Francis Ferdinand, and his morganatic wife were assassinated.

"Equal Suffrage Sure"—Clark.

Washington, June 29. — Speaker Clark told a delegation of women from the National Woman's Suffrage association that "woman suffrage is as inevitable as the rising of tomorrow's sun." "For 6,000 years," said the speaker, "men have been trying to run the world and some think they have made a bad mess of it. I hope that when you women run it you'll improve on it. The only question you folks have to consider is how most expeditiously to get what you are after.

Emperor Is Very Sad.

Vienna, June 29.—Francis Joseph is today the most lonely monarch of Europe. The tragedy which robbed him of a nephew and niece, the former his heir was only one of many that have saddened his life. Assassinations and suicides have taken from him those who were nearest and most dear. A strange fatality has pursued the house of Hapsburg and misfortunes have come in quick succession. Only the emperor himself has seemed immune.

Fletcher Home on Furlough.

Washington, June 29.—After serving in Mexican waters more than a year, during which he directed the occupation of Vera Cruz, Rear Admiral Frank P. Fletcher has reached Washington aboard the dispatch boat Dolphin. Secretary Daniels has chosen Rear Admiral Fletcher to succeed Rear Admiral Badger as commander in chief of the Atlantic fleet and it is expected the recommendation for the promotion will be made to the president during the officer's furlough in Washington.

State News of General Interest

LIES BY ROADSIDE FOR OVER 48 HOURS

SCORES PASS BY WITHOUT EXAMINING FORM OF UNCONSCIOUS LAD.

IS EMACIATED FROM HUNGER

Curiosity of Constable Saves Farmer Boy From Death—On Way Home After Absence—Probably Fainted.

Minneapolis, June 24. — A young man, son of a wealthy farmer, lay semi-conscious and nearly perished from hunger along the roadside in Bloomington township, just outside Minneapolis, from Saturday until Monday night; farmers by the score passed him, but gave him no heed, and he would have died had not the curiosity of a passing constable been aroused. Then the young man was brought to Minneapolis and Tuesday night was taken to his father's home. He is emaciated and weak, but physicians say he will recover. He is Ernest Kenely.

The young man is the son of Thomas Kenely, who lives near Tracy, Minn. Silas Pond, near whose farm young Kenely fell by the roadside, said he saw him Saturday, but to all questions put he received no answer.

Saturday night Kenely must have dragged himself and a heavy valise he was carrying to a place of shelter, for he was seen again Sunday down the road about forty rods from the Pond farm. Members of the road-working crew said they saw the form of a man by the road, but thought it was a traveler taking a brief rest.

When he was still in the same spot Monday night the town constable, W. A. Roberts, investigated. The constable loaded the man into a buggy and took him to the farmhouse of A. E. Lyman. Milk was given him and this was gulped down, and then Kenely's memory revived and he whispered his name. He also said his father's name was Thomas. The father was telegraphed by Sheriff Otto S. Langum and hastened to Minneapolis.

According to the elder Kenely, his son has been away from home since last March and had not written.

GOOD ROADS DAY OBSERVED

Northern Minnesota Profits By Day Set Aside, But Rain Hinders Work in Southern Sections.

St. Paul.—Good Roads day in Minnesota, proclaimed by Governor Eberhart, was observed generally throughout the state, according to reports reaching St. Paul.

More activity was noted in the northern sections of the state than in the southern portions because recent heavy rains in the latter districts made effective work almost impossible.

One hundred business and professional men of Bemidji donned overalls, shouldered picks and shovels and devoted the day to road making. They started with the blowing of factory whistles at 8 a. m. and quit with the blast of 5 p. m., tired, worn and with blistered hands.

John Moberg was in general charge of the work. The men were divided into sections.

Commercial and automobile clubs in the territory surrounding Mankato united in the good roads work. Efforts were centered on the road leading to Lake Washington. Farmers were too busy to lend assistance and much of the work was done by business men. Scrapers and drags were used in several parts of the county. Where the new Dunn law has been observed in Blue Earth county the roads are in good condition.

Under the direction of J. J. Davey, state highway division engineer, 150 men and 40 teams worked on the road between Chatfield and West Chatfield. The Civic league served dinner.

Merchants and members of the Rochester auto club devoted the day to road construction. State Engineer Lester Bailey also had a crew of men at work in the county.

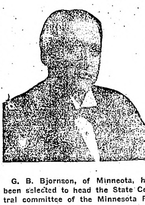
Brothers Lost in Swamps.

Grand Rapids.—Two brothers by the name of Shaffer have been lost for a week in the swamps of Busticagon township. Deputy Sheriff Charles Gunderson went to direct a search for them. The men but recently moved into the section, which is sparsely settled and full of swamps. They are known to have left home over a week ago, and as no trace or word has been received from them, it is feared they are unable to find their way back.

Two Missing Since June 14.

Grand Rapids.—Word has been received that the body of one of the two Shafer brothers, who disappeared from their farm near Bigfork, has been found at the foot of Muldoon rapids, about 15 miles above that village. The two men, who had resided in the section but a short time, have been missing since June 14, and searching parties have been all through the north country. No trace has been found of the other brother, and it is thought he also met his death in the river.

G. B. BJORNSON, WHO HEADS G. O. P. STATE COMMITTEE



G. B. Bjornson, of Minneota, has been selected to head the State Central committee of the Minnesota Republicans. At a conference last week at the state capitol the choice was announced. Mr. Bjornson was secretary of the anti-machine Republican conference committee and it was largely due to his efforts that W. E. Lee made so wonderful a showing in the recent primaries.

TORNADO HITS FLOUR CITY

FOUR PERSONS KILLED AND $300,000 PROPERTY LOSS.

Big Storm Centers Over Lake and Park Regions Imperiling Lives of Hundreds.

Minneapolis. — Four persons are known to be dead, two others are believed to have perished, many are suffering from injuries, and property valued at $300,000 was the toll as checked up Wednesday of a wind storm that swept over Minneapolis and the western part of Hennepin county just after 10 p. m. Tuesday night.

The storm was the most serious that has struck the city since the storm of Aug. 20, 1904, when the damage reached half a million dollars. This latest storm took a heavier toll of lives in the city and caused more injuries.

Canoeists Are Caught.

Striking Minneapolis when the city was unprepared and unwarned, the storm caught 400 canoeists on the lakes, capsized more than a hundred boats, tore frame houses from their foundations and wrecked other buildings. Several Minneapolis homes are in ruins as are some very costly brick barns and other buildings at Fort Snelling.

The southwest residence section of Minneapolis and the Fort Snelling reservation received the full attack of the storm.

Lighting, telephone and telegraph systems went down with the first blow, leaving part of the city in darkness, with intermittent streetcar transportation and the police and fire departments powerless to ascertain the loss of life or the damage.

The Death List.

The dead are as follows:

Miss Loretta Grimes, 23 years old, Jordan, Minn., drowned at Lake Harriet; Louis Grams, 101 Western avenue, drowned at Lake Harriet; Margaret Kelly, 1705 University avenue S. E., drowned with Grams when the two were blown out of a canoe; Esther Munson, 17 years old, St. Louis Park, crushed by timber in wrecked home.

Two unidentified men were also seen on Wayzata bay in sailboad and heard calling for help after storm struck. They are believed to have perished.

The storm swept over southwest Minneapolis with a roar, carrying before it all resistance, bearing down whole groves of trees, crushing and unroofing houses. Men went scurrying through the streets towards the lakes where hundreds were on the water and women closed down windows at home, but the wind velocity mounted so fast that soon no one could stand against it. Electric street lights went out.

Trobec Resigns as Bishop.

St. Cloud.—Rt. Rev. James Trobec, bishop of St. Cloud, one of the oldest and best known Catholic prelates of the Northwest, received word from Rome today of the acceptance of his resignation. He desired to retire in favor of a younger man. He is 76 years old.

Cass Lake.—F. A. Bachelor of Chicago, president of the Baltimore & Ohio Terminal railways, is at the head of a party of eastern railway officials who are spending several weeks at Cass Lake.

Southern State Losses Large.

Pipestone.—Through passenger and freight service on the Great Northern between the Twin Cities and Sioux City was resumed after a suspension of over a week on account of the floods which took out thousands of feet of track fifteen miles south of here. Nearly a thousand laborers and fifteen gravel trains worked day and night putting the tracks into their normal condition. Railroad men estimate that the damage by the flood will cost the Great Northern between $300,000 and $500,000.

3 PARTIES PICK CHAIRMEN

Nominees of Four Political Parties Meet, But Democrats Fail to Make Selection.

St. Paul.—The nominees of four political parties in Minnesota met at the state capitol and named the men who are to compose their campaign committees.

Bjornson G. O. P. Chairman.

Gunnar B. Bjornson of Minneota was appointed chairman of the republican state central committee at the state conference of republican candidates on the nomination of William E. Lee, candidate for governor. Governor A. O. Eberhart issued a statement saying he will support Lee.

The republican state central committee is to consist of 137 members. Part of these were selected and the remainder will be chosen at a meeting to be called by the chairman of the conference, Secretary of State Julius A. Schmahl.

An executive committee of seven, headed by Chairman Bjornson was named by Mr. Lee, on motion of J. A. Caswell, clerk of the supreme court. The other members are: W. O. Clare, Minneapolis, secretary; George H. Selover, Minneapolis, treasurer; T. H. Salmon and Fred H. Carpenter of Minneapolis; Lew Drill and Samuel Garry of St. Paul.

The executive committee, it was agreed, will name one member of the committee from each county. Mr. Lee named a long list of members at large and each candidate for a state office was allowed to select one.

Martin O'Brien of Crookston surprised the Democratic conference by bringing a letter addressed to W. S. Hammond, candidate for governor, in which he thanked Mr. Hammond for asking him to remain chairman of the state committee, but said he could not accept because of business reasons. The choice of chairman was left to Mr. Hammond by the democratic candidates, who met in the senate chamber.

C. W. Halbert of St. Paul, brother of H. T. Halbert, a candidate for governor, was mde chairman of the progressive state central committee; Dr. L. M. Crafts, Minneapolis, vice chairman; Henry W. Libby, Minneapolis, secretary, and Kenneth Gregg, Minneapolis, treasurer.

T. E. Latimer of Minneapolis, former secretary, was made chairman of the socialist state committee and Jake Anderson of St. Paul, secretary. They made up the executive committee, with J. E. Sala, Minneapolis; R. A. Henning, Brainerd, and J. A. Johnson, Duluth.

The prohibitionists were unable to organize for lack of a quorum. W. G. Calderwood was among the few candidates present.

MINNEAPOLIS ATHLETIC CLUB

One of New Buildings Which Is Transforming Minneapolis Business Section.

Activity in building construction in Minneapolis is rapidly transforming the central business district. In addition to the bank and office buildings and theaters, one of the most important improvements is the new Minneapolis Athletic club. Construction on this building is now at the eleventh story and the work is going on at the rate of about a story a week. The building located on Second avenue South, near Sixth street, very near the business center, will be fourteen stories, steel and concrete and finished in stone and light terra cotta. The entire building will be used by the club. In addition to the extensive space occupied by foyer, lounging rooms, library and billiard room, there will be a marble plunge or swimming pool 60 feet long and shower, Turkish, electric and steam baths; a gymnasium 96 feet long equipped with every form of apparatus; hand ball courts; bowling alleys; rifle range, etc.

One interesting feature is the conveniences and enjoyment which the club will afford non-resident members. The members already enrolled in this class gives assurance that the club will be the headquarters of prominent business and professional men throughout the Northwest, where they will come in contact with the 2,500 Minneapolis members.

600 Attend Summer School.

St. Cloud.—With over 500 on the opening day and an increase in the enrollment daily since the first class was called a week ago, the St. Cloud normal summer school enrollment is near the 600 mark and establishes a new attendance record for summer. The students are chiefly teachers in the rural schools who are taking advantage of the opportunity to advance themselves toward a higher grade teachers' certificate.

Another Blast Victim May Die.

St. Cloud. — Physicians hold out small hopes for the recovery of Jacob Dably, one of the men injured in the quarry explosion here when one man was killed and three other workmen seriously injured. Dably has been in an unconscious state since the accident and is hovering between life and death. In the event he does recover his eyesight will be gone and hearing impaired, and he will be crippled for life. The bodies of all four men are filled with granite chips.

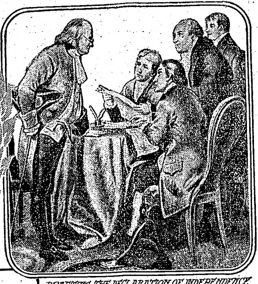
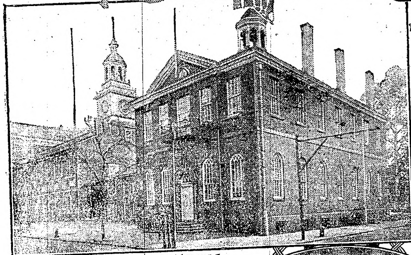
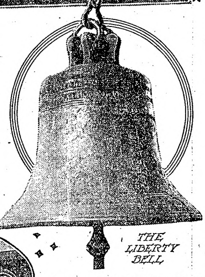
The OLD CRADLE Of LIBERTY



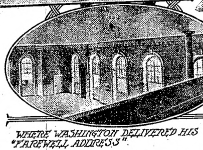
DRAFTING THE DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE



CONGRESS AND INDEPENDENCE HALLS



THE LIBERTY BELL



WHERE WASHINGTON DELIVERED HIS "FAREWELL ADDRESS".

UNTIL the year 1776 the historic shrine of American liberty in Philadelphia was known as the State house; but after that it was called Independence hall. Thousands have made their reverent pilgrimage thither from distant places as to a sacred shrine, and yet a great many are unfamiliar with the history of the most famous edifice in America. They may not know that it was begun in 1729 and finished in 1734, and that in those days the plan of it was considered so palatially ambitious that its building was bitterly opposed by those who, like John Gilpin's wife, were of a frugal mind. The cost was $16,250, and the wings that were added five years afterward brought the total amount to $28,000. Doubtless there were many who dubiously shook their heads at the extravagance. What would they have thought of a city hall occupying several acres and costing $24,000,000?

Although in the immediately pre-Revolutionary days the purpose to which Independence hall was put was serious enough, the long gallery upstairs had often been the scene of "revelry by night" before those times that tried men's souls. In 1736 the mayor, William Allen, invited most of Philadelphia to a feast; in 1756 the assembly gave Governor Denny a most pretentious banquet; and again, in 1757, Lord Loudon, commander-in-chief of his majesty's forces in America, was lavishly entertained, and the uninvited grumbled at the outlay.

When the first congress met in Philadelphia, in 1774, there was a "sumptuous collation" in the State house, attended by 500 persons, and as they drank their toasts cannon were fired, as happened in the case of Hamlet's unamiable father. The same hall that was the scene of those elaborate banquets became the prison of the American officers captured in the battle of Germantown, and after the bloody field of Brandywine it was a hospital.

It was in this building that Washington delivered his memorable farewell address; Lafayette was the guest of honor here at a reception in 1824; and here the bodies of John Adams and Abraham Lincoln lay in state.

Thus it will be seen that the social and historic associations of the edifice are innumerable, leaving out of the reckoning what happened there on the Fourth of July, 1776.

The signers of the Declaration came near not having a bell to announce their epoch-making resolution to the world. As soon as the building was completed, in 1734, it was planned to buy a bell commensurate with the dignity of the new State house. Then the advocates of economy—or parsimony—arose in their might and fought the project tooth and nail, representing that the "great cost of the State house had imposed a heavy tax upon the citizens and further expenditure was useless." After several years of more or less acrimonious debate it was decided to have a bell; and it was then discovered that there was not a foundry in the colonies capable of fashioning it, the repressive policy of parliament having well-nigh destroyed manufacturing enterprise in the new world. So the colonists had to send to London for a bell, giving specific directions as to the dimensions—the weight was 2,030 pounds.

When at last it arrived, in 1752, it was more than a nine days' wonder; the Pennsylvania farmers flocked to the wharf from far inland to acclaim its arrival. It proved all that any reasonable mortal could want in the way of a tintinnabulum. Its tones were far-carrying and sweetly musical, and all true-born Philadelphians (including those who had opposed the expense) were proud of it. Alas! as it was being transported with festal ceremony from the water's edge to the intended site in the belfry some nervous weakling gave way beneath his corner of the ton of metal and the bell fell to the ground and was mortally injured. It had to be recast, and Isaac Norris, who superintended the operation, announced with pride that the result was "a good bell, which pleases me much that we should first venture upon and succeed in the greatest bell, for aught I know, in English America—surpassing, too, the imported one, which was too high and brittle."

The great occasion in the life of the Liberty Bell was not due to arrive until 24 years afterward. It was on the 15th of May, 1776, that the general assembly gave instructions to its delegates in congress to present to that body a resolution in favor of the mighty schism from England, and the formal declaration of the colonies' independence. Richard Henry Lee on the 7th of June arose and solemnly moved that "the united colonies are, and ought to be, free and independent states, and that their political connection with Great Britain is and ought to be dissolved." John Adams of Massachusetts seconded the resolution, and thereupon a long and vehement debate began. It was adopted by the closest possible majority—seven colonies giving it their approval, six voting in the negative.

A committee was then appointed to draw up the Declaration. Its members were Benjamin Franklin, John Adams, Thomas Jefferson, Roger Sherman and Robert R. Livingston.

The committee reported the result of its deliberations on June 28, the other members of congress in the interim having bestirred themselves to learn the wishes of their constituents.

Thomas Jefferson, as every one knows, was the author of the Declaration. He wrote it in a house at the present site of 700 Market street, now occupied by the Penn National bank building, and the very desk on which the immortal document was drafted is now in the library of the state department in Washington.

It is not necessary to quote the solemn language of the Magna Charta of our American liberties. It was accepted almost as it came from Jefferson's hands, though a few passages were expunged which, it was feared, might give offense to America's much-needed friends in the mother country.

On the Fourth of July all the delegates except those of New York (whose representatives signed a few days later) had appended their names to the document and had pledged their lives, their fortunes and their sacred honor in the cause of liberty. Then came the moment for the Song of the Bell—a song whose reverberations shall not cease till the last page of American history has been written.

Truly prophetic was the biblical motto which Isaac Norris is said to have chosen for the bell: "Proclaim liberty throughout the land and to all the inhabitants thereof." And rapturously did the assembled multitude and the distant patriots receive the announcement of the bell, that at last the 13 colonies had become the 13 United States, and the days of the dominion of the foreign oppressor were forever past.

LAST FOURTH OF JULY

Last Fourth of July I was only six,
A reg'lar little chump,
I got into a dreadful fix.
You see there was a stump
In our back yard, where I used to play
All sorts of things alone;
On Sundays 'twas a pulpit,
On week days 'twas a throne.
I was preacher Sundays,
And the pickets on the fence
Were the people that I preached to,
But I didn't preach no sense.

On other days I was a king.
The pickets were my people.
I wore a golden paper crown
All pointed like a steeple.
Well, Fourth of July my cousin Bob
Came from the great big town,
With crackers, punk and fireworks
To do the Fourth up brown.
I told him how I was a king,
He is bigger some than me,
And he said we would have a siege,
The stump would be my fort,
And he would try to blow it up,
He said 'twas lots of sport.
So I got up upon the stump,
And the crackers in a row
He piled up thick around the foot,
You should have heard it blow!
The stump caught fire, I lost my head,
My father carried me to bed.

I stayed in bed a long, long time,
All bandaged—'twasn't fun.
I'm big this year—you needn't smile,
I'm not so big a chump,
And if we have another siege
Bob can sit on the stump.

INDEPENDENCE DAY FAVORS DISPLAY OF THE RED, WHITE AND BLUE.

Warm weather does not in the least interfere with the plans of the maid who is ambitious enough to entertain a coterie of friends at some kind of an end-of-the-season festival; and the approaching Independence day holiday admits of so many forms of novelties in decorations and devices that a pretty little luncheon or piazza supper is a comparatively easy thing to prepare.

Of course, the red, white and blue predominates and the symbols of the patriotic Fourth are reproduced in cardboard and paper with such realistic effect that the candy counters in the large department stores seem to have changed their usual stock for a supply of fireworks.

There are most natural looking packages of firecrackers with the usual Chinese paper covers and glaring red posters. The contents are red candy sticks for all the world like the real firecracker. There are candy boxes in the form of Roman candles, pinwheels, large cannon crackers, etc., all of which will make good souvenirs of the occasion. Crape paper is used for a greater variety of boxes and baskets than ever and very pretty and fanciful little devices are on hand, mostly in red, white and blue.

Red paper forts hold up warlike little cannons, keeping guard over the supply of candy stored within; the Liberty bell is reproduced in crape paper, and other ideas, all suggestive of the great event of '76.

The paper manufacturers have tablecloths and napkins ornamented with American flags, and flags in all sizes are found made of crape paper and attached to wooden sticks. Those in paper are a little more attractive than the ordinary stiff muslin affairs. The candelabra, too, may be in the spirit of the event with its red, white and blue candle shade, and altogether without much trouble or expense a table may be fitted up which will be patriotic enough in its appearance to satisfy the stanchest of admirers of Uncle Sam and Old Glory.

FATAL WORDS.

"Ever hear from that college chum of yours who went to Colorado?"

"Oh, he's dead, poor chap. He may be said to have talked himself to death."

"What do you mean?"

"He called some Alkali Ike out there a liar."

AN OLD TIN PLATE

By JOHN GREGG.

A dusty piece of tin plate, one side of which bore the legend, "Tompkins Avenue!"

Carol Marston, the young lawyer, looked at it idly. It was lying in a dry ditch beside the roadway, on the outskirts of the town. Some prowling dog had probably unearthed it from the six inches of soil in which it had lain for years.

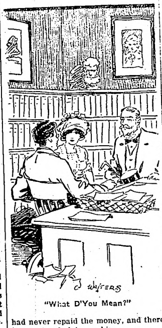
The discovery seemed not of the smallest importance. Marston had long since dismissed it from his mind when he had a call from Pretty Elsie Vincent.

"Sit down, Miss Vincent," he said, offering her a chair. He knew her by sight, although they had never spoken to each other. "What can I do for you?"

"I want to bring a suit against the Richards company," answered Miss Vincent. "They engaged me by the month as telephone operator in their new apartment house at New avenue and Seventh street, and dismissed me on the seventh with a week's pay because they are cutting out the service."

"Well, you seem to have a clear case, Miss Vincent," said the young lawyer, after he had learned some further particulars. The flagrant meanness of the action stung him. Old Sol Richards had the reputation of being the meanest man in town; but this was worse than anything he had done, for Lewis Vincent had started him in business, twenty years before.

Lewis Vincent had died when Elsie was a baby. He had once been wealthy, but had backed a note for Richards, and when he died it was found that all the property had to go to meet it, Richards being insolvent. The man had become wealthy since then, but he had never repaid the money, and there was no legal claim on him.



"What D'You Mean?"

"And I just mean to get this forty-five dollars out of the old skinflint," said Elsie to Carol Marston. "Just to show him what I think of him. Now, why is it, if I have a clear case, no other lawyer will take it?"

"You have tried?' inquired Carol.

"Yes," the girl admitted. "You see, Mr. Marston—" here she blushed prettily—"you seemed so young."

Carol smiled rather grimly. "I guess they are all afraid of Richards," he said. "That's why. He is a man of considerable influence, you know. But I will take your case—and win it, too."

"And I have a lot at the corner of Tompkins avenue and Seventh street," the girl confided, "so I can pay you by selling that. It is all father had to leave me, and it isn't worth more than a couple of hundred dollars, because the town didn't grow the way he thought it would, but—"

Well, being a practical lawyer, Carol did not refuse her offer and assure her that he would take her case for nothing, even though he was conscious of certain flutterings in the region of the heart when he looked at her across his table. And so the case was filed.

Richards had two reputations. One was that of being the meanest man in town; the other of being the most vindictive. Carol expected to receive a visit from him, and he was not disappointed. Three days later Richards came stamping into his office.

"What's this I hear about your filing a claim against me on behalf of that Vincent woman?" he roared.

"I don't know what you have heard, Mr. Richards, but it is true," answered Carol.

"Do you know I can ruin you, young man?" cried the infuriated old man. "Say, are you plumb crazy?"

"Can't say," answered Carol imperturbably, "but that claim is going to be met."

"We'll see," grunted Richards, and stamped out again.

That was the beginning of the trouble. One by one Carol's clients dropped away from him. The case never came into court, for Richards paid; and thenceforward Carol was deprived even of the solace of Miss Elsie's occasional visits. The young man had little capital, and it seemed that Richards would make good his threat.

And then one night, while he was turning over the situation in his mind, there flashed across it the remembrance of that old tin plate.

It was a flash from the subconscious, and for a long time Carol Marston could not imagine why the thought of it recurred so incessantly. And then, suddenly, a dim remembrance came to him which made him start up with a cry of joy.

The next morning he paid a visit to the town hall and spent the whole forenoon burrowing among old maps and charts of the village. Although it was an ancient settlement, the population, as with many small towns adjoining cities, was largely a floating one, and hardly anyone in the place had lived there more than a few years. Hence the surprise of the discovery was somewhat mitigated; nevertheless, it assumed enough importance to inspire the young man to write an urgent letter to Richards, inviting him to come to his office.

Meanwhile he had had a talk with Elsie which made the young woman's eyes sparkle with gladness. And, emboldened by the very kind look that she bestowed upon him, Carol Marston ventured to make a singular request of her which, while it threw her into confusion, did not produce any decided rebuff.

When Richards stamped into the lawyer's office, anticipating a plea for mercy, he was considerably astonished to see Miss Vincent there, and Marston seated at his desk and bearing no traces of spiritual humility.

"Well, young man, so you've come round, eh?" growled Richards.

'Sit down," said Carol. "Mr. Richards, when you attempted to deprive Miss Vincent of three weeks' salary I did not realize that you were actually in possession of stolen property of hers."

"What d'you mean?" growled Richards, turning pale, nevertheless.

"The records of our town were destroyed by fire fifteen years ago," Marston went on; "but fortunately certain deeds were saved—among them that to your apartment house at the corner of New Avenue and Seventh street."

"This is a conspiracy!" yelled Richards, rising.

"Miss Vincent," continued the young man, "possesses one of those deeds, giving her possession of a vacant lot at Seventh street and Tompkins avenue."

He rose and, shaking his finger with that dramatic air that was well known in the courts afterward, continued:

"You infernal scoundrel, Tompkins avenue used to run where New avenue runs today, and Miss Vincent's lot is that on which your apartment house now stands!"

Five minutes later Richards got up from the floor and wiped his knees, which were very dusty.

"I'll send that check for ninety thousand as soon as I can fix the mortgage, Mr. Marston," he whimpered. "And you'll let it go at that?"

"Yes," nodded Elsie, and Marston said "yes" obediently.

But it was not more than a minute before Miss Elsie was saying "yes" also—in obedience to the singular stipulation above mentioned.

DO REALLY WONDERFUL WORK

Spiders in Paraguay Spin Webs That Might Almost Be Referred to as Cables.

The roads of Paraguay are about five yards wide throughout, and the trees meet overhead at a height of some 18 feet, thus forming a tunnel of very uniform dimensions. In the clear parts of this tunnel, that is, where it is not choked up with the giant nettle—it is full, from roof to ground, of enormous spiders' webs, stretching clear across the road, the big trees usually being chosen as anchorages and the total clear span being thus more like eight yards than five.

The main cables or framework of the nets are composed of five or six strands of thick yellow web, and are almost as strong as cotton thread, says the Wide World. The rest of the net is made up of single and double strands of the same stout material, which is as sticky as it is strong. Every yard or so one of these nets extends across one's path, making it necessary to hold a cutlass or a fairly stout stick at arm's length in front as one walks.

The makers of these troublesome but picturesque obstructions are large, highly colored, gaudy-looking spiders, with bodies that look as if they were about to explode, they are so blown out and glossy.

At intervals in some more open space where the sky is visible, one will notice a different kind of web, far more irregular in shape, but far larger than the others. Not content with the space available in the tunnel, these webs are stretched in complicated mazes from the ground to the very tops of the surrounding trees, with clear spans frequently 20 or 30 yards from one tree to another.

From these main cables smaller ones extend to the ground—a drop of 15 or 20 yards—and the spaces in between are filled up with a mass of webs spun in all directions.

Of No Use to Him.

THE SUNBEAM.

BY W. G. HUNT.

Published every Friday, at Sunbeam, Pennington County, Minnesota.

Entered as Second-class matter August 30 1905, at the post office at Sunbeam Minn. under the Act of Congress of March 3,1879

For Representative in Red Lake County, Duffy received 630 votes, Stenvick 91, and Jones 72. How is that for an endorsement from a man's home county?

When Northern Minnesota has new settlers arrive from other states, they can be shown, if they came from Missouri, that we have one of the best localities in the United States for a man of moderate means to start on a farm.

It is amusing to hear some of the supporters of Eberhart, making the claim that the Democrats voted for Lee, when anyone that is at all posted knows that that party had as warm a fight on their hands for the governor nomination as the Republicans did.

It will certainly be a warm race between Congressman Hammond, the Democratic nominee, for governor and Wm. E. Lee, the Republican candidate. The people may be quite sure that their fight for reform in the administration of state affairs is over, so far as the governorship is concerned, as either one of these gentlemen will make a house cleaning soon after January 1st, 1914.

The Eberhart supporters adopted the same dirty political tactics as the Stenvick supporters in this county, which was the sending out of lying roorback letters two or three days before election, to try to influence voters. The Eberhart supporters wrote to the Scandinavians that Lee was a catholic, and from a so called anti catholic league to the catholics that they should not vote for Eberhart because he was a close friend of Bishop Ireland, which they felt sure, would be sure to make every catholic vote for him. The Stenvick supporters slipped a letter to every well known county optionist, that Duffy was opposed to county option, and we suppose that they took particular pains to inform the liquor interest that he was a rabid county optionist. Such dirty work may do for once, but any man that engages in it will soon loose the confidence of the people to such an extent that they would not believe him when he was telling the truth.

William E. Lee, Long Prairie, Minn., candidate for governor on the Republican ticket at the General Election on November 3, 1914--sounds good to a lot of us poor folks, doesn't it? Mr. Lee trimmed Gov. Eberhart "to a frazzle;" as the immortal Teddy might ejaculate, in the primaries a week ago, and demonstrated beyond any reasonable doubt, that the people of Minnesota are tired of having someone else dictate their affairs. Cong. Hammond defeated Lawler, and the race at the general election will be between Lee and Hammond with the chances even. Democracy stands an excellent chance and so does Republicanism. The question is the Man. Mr. Lee is a banker. He knows, naturally, how to cut down expenses, and that is the big issue just at this time in Minnesota. Mr. Hammond is a Minnesota Congressman. He has always stood for the good things in national affairs. He doesn't wait to be told what to do, because he doesn't have to be told. He would make good as Governor.—Deerwood Times

There has not been an amendment made to the Drainage laws for the past two sessions of the legislature, that has not been made in the interest of the Drainage Companies. The Drainage Companies have kept Attorney Brown of Thief River Falls down there looking after their interests while the farmers and tax payers have had D. P. O'Neill, who is a h—l of a good man to look after their interests, when he is speakin to them in a country school house.

The legislative fight, in this the 65th district will certainly be a warm one. D. P. O'Neill understands the political game from A to Z. and he has some of the smoothest politicians in this district behind him, backed up by the loose change of the Drainage Companies' and the Bemidji Normal School builders. Hanson is only an ordinary honest business man who well knows the needs of this district and will truly and honestly represent the people. He has the support of the people who understand the record made by Mr. O'Neill in the last session of the legislature, and while they may not be as tricky politicians or have as much capital behind them as the gentleman first referred to, they will let them know that they have been in a fight before they land O'Neill in that State Senate.

(PAID ADVERTISEMENTS.)

C. L. HANSON, candidate for State Senator of the 65th District. Respectfully solicits your Vote and Support.

JUDGE OF PROBATE
Candidate for Re-election
I respectfully solicit your vote and support.

Swords That Snapped.

A great many swords were brought home after the war between the states welded in the middle, because the young officers who owned them had bragged about their elasticity and had broken them in trying to demonstrate it. The tragedy happened in this way:

The young officer in setting out for the war had been given a fine sword by his admiring friends at home. He was told and made to believe that his sword was of tried Damascus or Toledo steel and that it would bend double without breaking. In camp somewhere the young captains and lieutenants would fall to vaunting their trusty blades, and on a bet one of them would stick the point of his sword into a tree and begin to bend the hilt around to meet the point. And just as the hilt came around the blade snapped in two in the middle. (Very few of these presentation swords were as Damascus or as Toledo as they were supposed to be.)

After that the two parts of the sword had to be welded, and the weapon shows the welding to this day.—New York Mail.

Dynamite is being used to deepen ditch number 53.

The mosquitoes have been very fierce the past month owing to the continued rains.

Sam McMahon is doing the toating for the ditching crew on ditch 53.

The roads are in bad condition owing to the heavy rains we have had the past week.

Otto Causin of Highlanding left last week for Cavelier, N. Dak. where he is visiting relatives.

Most of the people around this locality will celebrate July 4th, at James O'Brien's place.

M. G. Thoreson autoed down to Thief River Falls Tuesday, and return Wednesday afternoon.

The Clearwater River is very high and in some places has overflowed the banks and done some damage to crops.

This is the season of the year that it pays to pull out any stray mustard that may be growing in your fields.

H. T. McAnulty was up from Red Lake Falls yesterday, trying to sell this school district a new heating plant, for the school house.

Mrs. Narveson is having a new roof put on her grainary this week. K. M. Kratzer has been assisting the boys on the carpenter work.

There was rather a light acreage of corn planted this year, owing to the late spring, but it is looking fine with good prospects of making a heavy crop.

If any one tells you that mosskeg land will not grow fine flax, just tell them to call and see a field that we have on section 31, town of Highlanding.

The ditch contractors on ditch 47 are having a hard time trying to dig it with teams, and have resorted to the old method of the hay knife and fork to get out the first layer of mosskeg.

The rains this week raised Red Lake River enough so that Ole Hanson managed to get his steam boat up home, where it will undoubtedly remain to join the family of derelict steam boats of the Red Lake River.

A crew of men and teams are working on ditch 53, deepening it and digging the branches out. It is getting to be time that this work was done, as some of the farmers who are heavily taxed for this ditch get no benefit from it until the branches are completed.

We tried a new experiment this spring of sowing mosskeg heavily to timothy on new breaking before seeding it to flax. We have seven acres sown, and if it proves to be good hay meadow next year with a heavy crop of timothy, the drained low lands will be as valuable as the high land.

The firm of Halverson and Thoreson, at Highlanding has been dissolved by mutual consent. Mr. Thoreson will continue the business and Mr. Halverson will will go into the realestate business for the present, but may decide to build a new store at the end of the Electric Line Railroad six miles north of Highlanding.

We publish this week the announcements of C. L. Hanson, for State Senator and Wilhelm Michelet for Judge of Probate. While it is early in the campaign some of the candidates, are inclined to follow the example set by Miss Goodwin for the nomination for Superintendent of Schools, who went on the principal of the early bird, in fact the people got so accustomed to reading her request for their support that they almost considered her one of the family by June 16.

W. H. Wilde was transacting business at Crookston, Red Lake Falls and Thief River Falls, this week.

G. L. Palmer was over taking the assessment on the south side of the river this week. He has been laid up with rheumatism which put him behind with the work.

Astronomically Speaking.

Before he became a newspaper man James S. Black was a collector in Flagstaff for awhile. He was given a bill against Director Lowell of the observatory and tramped up the long hill from the town to see the astronomer one hot June morning when the mountain sun blazed its hottest.

Arrived at the top, Black inquired of an attendant if Lowell was there. After the manner of collectors he followed up a negative answer with inquiries as to his probable return.

"Will he be back this afternoon?"

"No."

"Will he be back tomorrow?"

"No."

"Will he be back next day?"

The attendant couldn't say.

"Well," said Black, getting desperate, "do you know when he will be back?"

"Oh, he'll be back for the transit of Venus!" said the attendant.

"That finished it," said Black in telling the story. "Not being an astronomer, I gave up that bill."—Popular Magazine.

Nose Tip Vaccination.

The young Japanese diplomat pointed to his father, the marquis.

"That's father," he said, "the old fellow with the saucer shaped scar on the tip of his nose. All Japs of the older generation have that scar."

"Yes," said the debutante.

"Yes; it's a vaccination mark. In the old days, when compulsory vaccination first began, we Japs vaccinated everybody on the tip of the nose. Why? Well, because it was a good place, where there's no movement to rub off the scab, and also because the vaccination scar on the nose was easily identified by the medical officers of the government. A man didn't have to take off half his clothes in order to prove that he'd been vaccinated.

"Yes; the nose tip vaccination had its good points, but before the modern hankering after beauty it had to go."—New York Tribune.

Ancient Gallantry.

The respect and veneration paid to the fair sex formed an essential ingredient in chivalry. Principle of female adoration so predominently displayed in every aspect of chivalry extended its influence to the laws of the times, for we find James II. of Aragon ordering in this manner: "We will that every man, whether knight or no, who shall be in company with a lady pass safe and unmolested unless he be guilty of murder."

And Louis II., Duke of Bourbon, instituting the order of the Golden Shield, enjoins his knights to honor, above all, the ladies and not permit any one to slander them, "because," adds he, "from them, after God, comes all the honor that man can acquire."

Old Love Letters.

Wife—I came across a bundle of your old love letters today. Husband—Did you read them over? Wife—Yes. Husband—And what was the effect of that perusal? Wife—I wondered which was the bigger fool—you for writing them or I for marrying you after receiving them.

A Hint.

"Yes," said the young student thoughtfully, "when I get interested in a subject I never stop until I have embraced it thoroughly."

"That's nice," was the besitating reply. "Do—do you think I'm an interesting subject?"

Mrs. Short—Oh, dear, I do wish we were rich! Just think of the good we could do if we only had lots of money! Mr. Short—True, my dear, but we can do a great deal of good in a quiet way now. Mrs. Short—Yes, of course, but no one will ever hear of it.

As Smart as His Boy.

When Sir William Gilbert was twenty-seven and was known to the world as a promising writer, his father, who was a retired naval surgeon, wrote a semimetaphysical, semimedical book entitled "Shirley Hall Asylum," his first book.

Edith A. Brown, when preparing a biography of the younger man, having heard that the son was the incentive from without which spurred into action the inherent but dormant literary talent of the father, asked if such was the fact.

"Yes," replied the author of the "Bab Ballads" and the wittiest librettos ever written. "I think the little success which had attended my humble efforts certainly influenced my father.

"You see," he added, with a suspicion of a smile, "my father never had an exalted idea of my ability. He thought if I could write anybody could and forthwith he began."

A Question of Brains.

At a club frequented by doctors the discussion came up recently whether a person could live without a brain. During the discourse one of the doctors said: "When I was practicing medicine in Indiana a remarkable case came under my supervision. A man while out hunting had leaned upon his shotgun and the weapon had gone off accidentally, making a large wound in his head just above the ear. The brain was laid bare and in bringing the patient to the hospital a handful of the gray matter leaked out. He was trepanned and finally recovered, his mental faculties apparently as good as ever."

"Your story is interesting," interrupted an auditor, "but it sounds to me somewhat inconsistent."

"Why so?" questioned the narrator.

"Because," answered the other doctor, "if he had ever had a handful of brains he wouldn't have leaned on the gun."—National Monthly.

SYNOPSIS.

Challis Wrandall is found murdered in a road house near New York. Mrs. Wrandall is summoned from the city and identifies the body. A young woman who accompanied Wrandall to the inn and subsequently disappeared, is suspected. Mrs. Wrandall starts back for New York in an auto during a blinding snow storm. On the way she meets a young woman in the road who proves to be the woman who killed Wrandall. Feeling that the girl had done her a service in ridding her of the man who though she loved him dearly, had caused her great sorrow. Mrs. Wrandall determines to shield her and takes her to her own home. Mrs. Wrandall hears the story of Hetty Castleton's life, except that portion that relates to Wrandall. This and the story of the tragedy she forbids the girl ever to tell. She offers Hetty a home, friendship and security from peril on account of the tragedy. Sara Wrandall and Hetty return to New York after an absence of a year in Europe. Leslie Wrandall, brother of Challis, becomes greatly interested in Hetty. Sara sees in Leslie's infatuation possibility for revenge on the Wrandalls and reparation for the wrongs she suffered at the hands of Challis Wrandall by bringing his murderess into the family. Leslie, in company with his friend Brandon Booth, an artist, visits Sara at her country place. Leslie confesses to Sara that he is madly in love with Hetty. Sara arranges with Booth to paint a picture of Hetty. Booth has a haunting feeling that he has seen Hetty before. Looking through a portfolio of pictures by an unknown English artist he finds one of Hetty. He speaks to her about it. Hetty declares it must be a picture of Hetty Glynn, an English actress, who resembles her very much. Much to his chagrin Leslie is refused by Hetty. Booth and Hetty confess their love for each other. The latter declares that she can never marry as there is an insurmountable barrier in the way. Hetty admits to Sara that she loves Booth. Sara declares that Hetty must marry Leslie, who must be made to pay his brother's debt to the girl. Hetty again attempts to tell the true story of the tragedy and Sara threatens to strangle her if she says a word. Sara insults Hetty by revealing that all the time she has believed Hetty to have been [illegible] her relations with Challis Wrandall. Later she realizes that Hetty is innocent. Leslie again proposes to Hetty and is rejected. Hetty prepares to leave Sara, declaring that after what has happened she can remain no longer. Hetty starts for Europe. At sea she receives a message from Booth that he has started on a faster steamer and will be waiting for her on the other side. Booth meets her and accompanies her to London. In an attempt to escape from him Hetty starts for Paris, but finds Booth on the same boat. She persists in her refusal to tell him the secret which keeps them apart. She declares that Sara alone can tell him. Booth leaves for America determined to get the story from Sara.

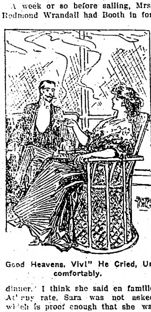
The weeks slipped by. He was with her almost daily. Other people came to her house, some for rather protracted visits, others in quest of pillage at the nightly bridge table, but he was seldom missing. There were times when he thought he detected a tendency to waver, but each cunning attempt on his part to encourage the impulse invariably brought a certain mocking light into her eyes and he veered off in defeat. Something kept telling him, however, that the hour was bound to come when she would falter in her resolution; when frankness would meet frankness, and the the veil be lifted.

There were no letters from Hetty, no word of any description. If Sara knew anything of the girl's movements she did not take Booth into her confidence.

Leslie Wrandall went abroad in August, ostensibly to attend the aviation meets in France and England. His mother and sister sailed in September, but not before the entire colony of which they were a part had begun to discuss Sara and Booth with a relish that was obviously distasteful to the Wrandalls.

Where there is smoke there is fire, said all the gossips, and forthwith proceeded to carry faggots.

A week or so before sailing, Mrs. Redmond Wrandall had Booth in for dinner. I think she said en famille. At any rate, Sara was not asked, which is proof enough that she was bent on making it a family affair.



Good Heavens, Viv!" He Cried, Uncomfortably.

After dinner, Booth sat in the screened upper balcony with Vivian. He liked her. She was a keen-witted, plain-spoken young woman, with few false ideals and no subtlety. She was less snobbish than arrogant. Of all the Wrandalls, she was the least self-centered. Leslie never quite understood her for the paradoxical reason that she thoroughly understood him.

"You know, Brandon," she said, after a long silence between them, "they've been setting my cap for you for a long, long time." She blew a thin stream of cigarette smoke toward the moon.

He started. It was a bolt from a clear sky. "The deuce!"

"Yes," she went on in the most casual tone, "mother's had her heart set on it for months. You were supposed to be mine at first sight, I believe. Please don't look so uneasy. I'm not going to propose to you." She laughed her little ironic laugh.

"So that is the way things stood, eh?" he said, still a little amazed by her candor.

"Yes. And what is more to the point, I am quite sure I should have said yes if you had asked me. Sounds odd, doesn't it? Rather amusing, too, being able to discuss it so unreservedly, isn't it?"

"Good heavens, Viv!" he cried uncomfortably "I—I had no idea you cared—"

"Cared!" she cried, as he paused. "I don't care two pins for you in that way. But I would have married you, just the same, because you are worth marrying. I'd very much rather have you for a husband than any man I know, but as for loving you! Pooh! I'd love you in just the way mother loves father, and I wouldn't have been a bit more trouble to you than she is to him."

"Gad, you don't mind what you say!"

"Failing to nab you, Brandy, I dare say I'll have to come down to a duke or, who knows? maybe a mere prince. It isn't very enterprising, is it? And certainly it isn't a gay prospect. Really, I had hoped you would have me. I flatter myself, I suppose, but, honestly now, we would have made a rather nice looking couple, wouldn't we?"

"You flatter me," he said.

"But," she resumed, calmly exhaling, "you very foolishly fell in love with some one else, and it wasn't necessary for me to pretend that I was in love with you—which I should have done, believe me, if you had given me the chance. You fell in love, first with Hetty Castleton."

"First?" he cried, frowning.

"And now you are heels over head in love with my beautiful sister-in-law. Which all goes to prove that I would have made just the kind of wife you need, considering your tendency to fluctuate. But how dreadful it would have been for a sentimental, loving girl like Hetty!"

He sat bolt upright a d stared hard at her.

"See here, Viv, what the dickens are you driving at? I'm not in love with Sara—not in the least—and—" He checked himself sharply. "What an ass I am! You're guying me."

"In any event, I am right about Hetty," she said, leaning forward, her manner quite serious.

"If it will ease you mind," he said stiffly, "I plead guilty with all my heart."

She favored him with a slight frown of annoyance.

"And you deny the fluctuating charge?"

"Most positively. I can afford to be honest with you, Viv. You are a corker. I love Hetty Castleton with all my soul."

She leaned back in her chair. "Then why don't you dignify your soul by being honest with her?"

"What do you mean?"

For a half-minute she was silent. "Are you and I of the same stripe, after all? Would you marry Sara without loving her, as I would have done by you? It doesn't seem like you, Brandon."

"Good heaven, I'm not going to marry Sara!" he blurted out. "It's never entered my head."

"Perhaps it has entered hers."

"Nonsense! She isn't going to marry anybody. And she knows how I feel toward Hetty. If it came to the point where I decided to marry without love, 'pon my soul, Viv, I believe I'd pick you out as the victim."

"Wonderful combination!" she said with a frank laugh. "The quintessence of 'no love lost.' But to resume! Do you know that people are saying you are to be married before the winter is over?"

"Let 'em say it," he said gruffly.

"Oh, well,' she said, dispatching it all with a gesture, "if that's the way you feel about it, there's no more to be said."

He was ashamed. "I beg your pardon, I shouldn't have said that."

"You see," she went on, reverting to the original topic, "people who know Sara are likely to credit her with motives you appear to be totally ignorant of. She set her heart on my brother Challis, when she was a great deal younger than she is now, and she got him. If age and experience count for anything, how capable she must be by this time."

He was too wise to venture an opinion. "I assure you she has no designs on me."

"Perhaps not. But I fancy that even you could not escape as St. Anthony did. She is most alluring."

"You don't like her."

"Obviously. And yet I don't dislike her. She has the virtue of consistency, if one may use the expression. She loved my brother. Leslie says she should have hated him. We have tried to like her. I think I have come nearer to it than any of the others, not excepting Leslie, who has always been her champion. I suppose you know that he was your rival at one time."

"He mentioned it," said Booth drily.

"I should have been very much disappointed in her if she had accepted him."

"Indeed?"

"I sometimes wonder if Sara spiked Leslie's guns for him."

"I can tell you something you don't know, Vivian," said he. "Sara was rather keen about making a match there."

Vivian's smile was slow but triumphant. "That is just what I thought. There you are! Doesn't that explain Sara?"

"In a measure, yes. But, you see, it developed that Hetty cared for some one else, and that put a stop to everything."

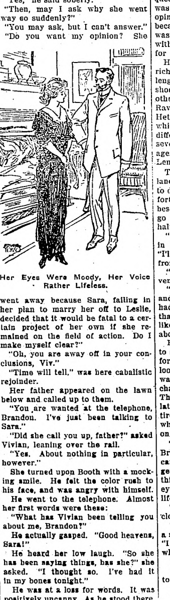
"Am I to take it that you are the some one else?"

"Yes," he said soberly.

"Then, may I ask why she went away so suddenly?"

"You may ask, but I can't answer."

"Do you want my opinion? She went away because Sara, failing in her plan to marry her off to Leslie, decided that it would be fatal to a certain project of her own if she remained on the field of action. Do I make myself clear?"



Her Eyes Were Moody, Her Voice Rather Lifeless.

"Oh, you are away off in your conclusions, Viv."

"Time will tell," was here cabalistic rejoinder.

Her father appeared on the lawn below and called up to them.

"You are wanted at the telephone, Brandon. I've just been talking to Sara."

"Did she call you up, father?" asked Vivian, leaning over the rail.

"Yes. About nothing in particular, however."

She turned upon Booth with a mocking smile. He felt the color rush to his face, and was angry with himself.

He went to the telephone. Almost her first words were these:

"What has Vivian been telling you about me, Brandon?"

He actually gasped. "Good heavens, Sara!"

He heard her low laugh. "So she has been saying things, has she?" she asked. "I thought so. I've had it in my bones tonight."

He was at a loss for words. It was positively uncanny. As he stood there, trying to think of a trivial remark, her laugh came to him again over the wire, followed by a drawling "good night," and then the soughing of the wind over the "open" wire.

The next day he called her up on the telephone quite early. He knew her habits. She would be abroad in her gardens by eight o'clock. He remembered well that Leslie, in commenting on her absurdly early hours, had once said that her "early bird" habit was hereditary: she got it from Sebastian.

"What put it into your head, Sara, that Vivian was saying anything unpleasant about you last night?"

"Magic," she replied succinctly.

"Rubbish!"

"I have a magic tapestry that transports me, hither and thither, and by night I always carry Aladdin's lamp. So, you see, I see and hear everything"

"Be sensible."

"Very well. I will be sensible. If you intend to be influenced by what Vivian or her mother said to you last night, I think you'd be wise to avoid me from this time on."

Prepared though he was, he blinked his eyes and said something she didn't quite catch.

She went on: "Moreover, in addition to my attainments in the black art, I am quite as clever as Mr. Sherlock Holmes in some respects. I really do some splendid deducing. In the first place, you were asked there and I was not. Why? Because I was to be discussed. You see—"

"Marvelous!" he interrupted loudly.

"You were to be told that I have cruel designs upon you."

"Go on, please."

"And all that sort of thing," she said sweepingly, and he could almost see the inclusive gesture with her free hand. He laughed but still marveled at the shrewdness of her perceptions.

"I'll come over this afternoon and show you wherein you are wrong," he began, but she interrupted him with a laugh.

"I am starting for the city before noon, by motor, to be gone at least a fortnight."

"What! This is the first I've heard of it."

Again she laughed. "To be perfectly frank with you, I hadn't heard of it myself until just now. I think I shall go down to the Homestead with the Carrolls."

"Hot Springs?"

"Virginia," she added explicitly.

"I say, Sara, what does all this mean? You—"

"And if you should follow me there, Vivian's estimate of us will not be so far out of the way as we'd like to make it."

True to her word, she was gone when he drove over later on in the day. Somehow, he experienced a queer feeling of relief. Not that he was oppressed by the rather vivacious opinions of Vivian and her ilk, but because something told him that Sara was wavering in her determination to withhold the secret from him and fled for perfectly obvious reasons.

He had two commissions among the rich summer colonists. One, a full length portrait of young Beardsley in shooting togs, was nearly finished. The other was to be a half-length of Mrs. Ravenscroft, who wanted one just like Hetty Castleton's, except for the eyes, which she admitted would have to be different. Nothing was said of the seventeen years' difference in their ages. Vivian had put off posing until Lent.

The Wrandalls departed for Scotland, and other friends of his began to desert the country for the city. The fortnight passed and another week besides. Mrs. Ravenscroft decided to go to Europe when the picture was half-finished.

"You can finish it when I come back in December, Mr. Booth," she said. "I'll have several new gowns to choose from, too."

"I shall be busy all winter, Mrs. Ravenscroft," he said coldly.

"How annoying," she said calmly, and that was the end of it all. She had made the unpleasant discovery that it wasn't going to be in the least like Hetty Castleton's, so why bother about it?

Booth waited until Sara came out to superintend the closing of her house for the winter. He called at Southlook on the day of her arrival. He was struck at once by the curious change in her appearance and manner. There was something bleak and desolate in the vividly brilliant face: the tired, wistful, harassed look of one who has begun to quail and yet fights on.

"Will you go out with me tomorrow, Brandon, for an all-day trip in the car?" she asked, as they stood together before the open fireplace on this late November afternoon. Her eyes were moody, her voice rather lifeless.

"Certainly," he said, watching her closely. Was the break about to come?

"I will stop for you at nine." After a short pause, she looked up and said: "I suppose you would like to know where I am taking you."

"It doesn't matter, Sara."

"I want you to go with me to Burton's inn."

"Burton's inn."

"That is the place where my husband was killed," she said, quite steadily.

He started. "Oh! But—do you think it best, Sara, to open old wounds by—"

"I have thought it all out, Brandon. I want to go there—just once. I want to go into that room again."

CHAPTER XVII.

Once More at Burton's Inn.

Again Sara Wrandall found herself in that never-to-be-forgotten room at Burton's inn. On that grim night in March she had entered without fear or trembling because she knew what was there. Now she quaked with a mighty chill of terror, for she knew not what was there in the quiet, now sequestered room. Burton had told them on their arrival after a long drive across country that patrons of the inn invariably asked which room it was that had been the scene of the tragedy, and, on finding out, refused point-blank to occupy it. In consequence he had been obliged to transform it into a sort of store and baggage room.

Sara stood in the middle of the murky room, for the shutters had long been closed to the light of day, and looked about her in awe at the heterogeneous mass of boxes, trunks, bundles and rubbish, scattered over the floor without care or system. She had closed the door behind her and was quite alone. Light sneaked in through the cracks in the shutters, but so meagerly that it only served to increase the gloom. A dismantled bedstead stood heaped up in the corner. She did not have to be told what bed it was. The mattress was there too, rolled up and tied with a thick garden rope. She knew there were dull, ugly blood stains upon it. Why the thrifty Burton had persevered in keeping this useless article of furniture, she could only surmise. Perhaps it was held as an inducement to the morbidly curious who always seek out the gruesome and gloat even as they shudder.

For a long time she stood immovable just inside the door, recalling the horrid picture of another day. She tried to imagine the scene that had been enacted there with gentle, lovable Hetty Glynn and her whilom husband as the principal characters. The girl had told the whole story of that ugly night. Sara tried to see it as it actually had transpired. For months this present enterprise had been in her mind: the desire to see the place again, to go there with old impressions which she could leave behind when ready to emerge in a new frame of mind. It was true that she meant to shake off the shackles of a horrid dream, to purge herself of the last vestige of bitterness, to cleanse her mind of certain thoughts and memories.

Downstairs Booth waited for her. He heard the story of the tragedy from the innkeeper, who crossly maintained that his business had been ruined. Booth was vaguely impressed, he knew not why, by Burton's description of the missing woman. "I'd say she was about the size of Mrs. Wrandall herself, and much the same figger," he said, as he had said a thousand times before. "My wife noticed it the minute she saw Mrs. Wrandall. Same height and everything."

A bell rang sharply and Burton glanced over his shoulder at the indicator on the wall behind the desk. He gave a great start and his jaw sagged.

"Great Scott!" he gasped. A curious grayness stole over his face. "It's—it's the bell in that very room. My soul, what can—"

"Mrs. Wrandall is up there, isn't she?" demanded Booth.

"It ain't rung since the night he pushed the button for— Oh, gee! You're right. She is up there. My, what a scare it gave me." He wiped his brow. Turning to a boy, he commanded him to answer the bell. The boy went slowly, and as he went he removed his hands from his pockets. He came back an instant later, more swiftly than he went, with the word that "the lady up there" wanted Mr. Booth to come upstairs.

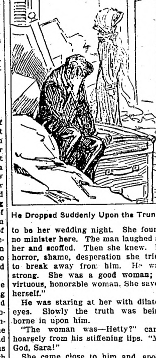
She was waiting for him in the open doorway. A shaft of bright sunlight from a window at the end of the hall fell upon her. Her face was colorless, haggard. He paused for an instant to contrast her as she stood there in the pitiless light with the vivid creature he had put upon canvas so recently.

She beckoned to him and turned back into the room. He followed.

"This is the room, Brandon, where my husband met the death he deserved," she said quietly.

"Deserved? Good heavens, Sara, are you—"

"I want you to look about you and try to picture how this place looked on the night of the murder. You have a vivid imagination. None of this rubbish was here. Just a bed, a table and two chairs. There was a carpet on the floor. There were two people here, a man and a woman. The woman had trusted the man. She trusted him until the hour in which he died. Then she found him out. She had come to this place, believing it was to be her wedding night. She found no minister here. The man laughed at her and scoffed. Then she knew. In horror, shame, desperation she tried to break away from him. He was strong. She was a good woman; a virtuous, honorable woman. She saved herself."



He Dropped Suddenly Upon the Trunk.

He was staring at her with dilated eyes. Slowly the truth was being borne in upon him.

"The woman was—Hetty?" came hoarsely from his stiffening lips. "My God, Sara!"

She came close to him and spoke in a half-whisper. "Now you know the secret. Is it safe with you?"

He opened his lips to speak, but no words came forth. Paralysis seemed to have gripped not only his throat but his senses. He reeled. She grasped his arm in a tense, fierce way, and whispered:

"Be careful! No one must hear what we are saying." She shot a glance down the deserted hall. "No one is near. I made sure of that. Don't speak! Think first—think well, Brandon Booth. It is what you have been seeking for months—the truth. You share the secret with us now. Again I ask, is it safe with you?"

"My God!" he muttered again, and passed his hand over his eyes. His brow was wet. He looked at his fingers dumbly as if expecting to find them covered with blood.

"Is it safe with you?" for the third time.

"Safe? Safe?" he whispered, following her example without knowing that he did so. "I—I can't believe you, Sara. It can't be true."

"It is true."

"You have known—all this time?"

"From that night when I stood where we are standing now."

"And—and—she?"

"I had never seen her until that night. I saved her."

He dropped suddenly upon the trunk that stood behind him, and buried his face in his hands. For a long time she stood over him, her interest divided between him and the hall, wherein lay their present peril.

"Come," she said at last. "Pull yourself together. We must leave this place. If you are not careful they will suspect something downstairs."

He looked up with haggard eyes, studying her face with curious intentness.

"What manner of woman are you, Sara?" he questioned, slowly, wonderingly.

"I have just discovered that I am very much like other women, after all," she said. "For awhile I thought I was different, that I was stronger than my sex. But I am just as weak, just as much to be pitied, just as much to be scorned as any one of my sisters. I have spoiled a great act by stooping to do a mean one. God will bear witness that my thoughts were noble at the outset; my heart was soft. But come! There is much more to tell that cannot be told here. You shall know everything."

They went downstairs and out into the crisp autumn air. She gave directions to her chauffeur. They were to traverse for some distance the same road she had taken on that ill-fated night a year and a half before. In course of time the motor approached a well-remembered railway crossing.

"Slow down, Cole," she said. "This is a mean place—a very mean place." Turning to Booth, who had been sitting grim and silent beside her for miles, she said, lowering her voice: "I remember that crossing yonder. There is a sharp curve beyond. This is the place. Midway between the two crossings, I should say. Please remember this part of the road, Brandon, when I come to the telling of that night's ride to town. Try to picture this spot—this smooth, straight road as it might be on a dark, freezing night in the very thick of a screaming blizzard, with all the world abed save—two women."

In his mind he began to draw the picture, and to place the two women in the center of it, without knowing the circumstances. There was something fascinating in the study he was making, something gruesome and full of sinister possibilities for the hand of a virile painter. He wondered how near his imagination was to placing the central figures in the picture as they actually appeared on that secret night.

* * * * * * *

At sunset they went together to the little pavilion at the end of the pier which extended far out into the sound. Here they were safe from the ears of eavesdroppers. The boats had been stowed away for the winter. The wind that blew through the open pavilion, now shorn of all its comforts and luxuries, was cold, raw and repelling. No one would disturb them here.

With her face set toward the sinking east, she leaned against one of the thick posts, and in a dull, emotionless voice, laid bare the whole story of that dreadful night and the days that followed. She spared no details, she spared not herself in the narration.

Humility.

We tell this story because it seems to us a beautiful story that ought to be told. It concerns General Bell and the opening of the gigantic amphitheater in Manila that follows the lines of the land. The general was much praised for having built this imposing and enormous structure. He pointed to the savage Igorrotes that were standing about, trying to understand what was going on. "I did not build it," he said. "God Almighty built it, but if you want to take building in a different sense, to consider what we did, using the great plans of nature, those poor fellows built it."—Harper's Weekly.

Not Properly Equipped.

Little Gardner, whose big brother had been presented with a bicycle, asked his mother if he could not have one, too. "You're not old enough," she replied, "but I will buy you a velocipede." "I can't use a velocipede on these rough roads," he exclaimed. "The motor cars use the rough roads every day." The youngster thought for a moment, then with a look of scorn remarked: "Do you think I am filled with gasoline?"—New York [illegible]

"Father, is mother your soul mate?" asked little Willie Botts.

"Er—yes; I guess so, son," answered Mr. Botts, cautiously.

"Umph!" snorted Mrs. Botts. "I'm not your soul mate, Henry, but if I ever catch you looking at her, there's going to be trouble in the family."

New Wireless for Aeroplanes.

John Hays Hammond, Jr., has perfected at Gloucester, Mass., a wireless telegraph apparatus for aeroplanes which he intends to sell to the government. His instrument embodies several new features which have not yet been made public, among them a new coherer 20 times as sensitive as those now in use. This will enable aviators to receive messages as well as send them. To the present time the wireless instrument used on aeroplanes have been only to transmit, and the inability to receive messages has kept the operators tied to their base of instructions.

ECZEMA ITCHED AND BURNED

R. F. D. No. 2, Seymour, Mo.—"My scalp broke out with fine pimples at the start. They itched and burned so much that I was compelled to scratch them and they would fester and come to a head and break out again. The trouble was attended by such burning and itching I could not sleep, also when I sweat it burned the same. My hair fell out gradually and the scalp kept rough and dry with itching and burning. After about two years the pimples broke out between my shoulders. My clothing irritated them. I was troubled with that eczema five or six years.

BOOM IS COMING SAYS PRESIDENT

Mr. Wilson Predicts Business Will Have Great Revival

WHEN THE TRUST BILLS PASS

Speaking to Virginia Editors, He Makes Final Reply to Opponents of That Legislation, and Prophets of Evil Times.

Washington, June 26.—The greatest business boom in the history of the United States is promised by President Wilson. This, he says, will be brought about under a "new constitution of freedom" given by the anti-trust legislation soon to be passed by congress.

Though the president spoke to a group of Virginia editors in the White House, he really was addressing the entire country, and was making his final reply to the opponents of trust legislation at this session of congress and to prophets of evil times.

"We know what we are doing," Mr. Wilson said. "We purpose to do it under the advice—for we have been fortunate enough to obtain the advice—of men who understand the business of the country; and we know that the effect is going to be exactly what the effect of the currency reform was, a sense of relief and security.

Boom to Follow Program.

"Because, when the program is finished, it is finished; the interrogation points are rubbed off the slate; business is given its constitution of freedom and is bidden to go forward under that constitution. And just so soon as it gets that leave and freedom there will be a boom of business in this country such as we have never witnessed in the United States.

"I, as a friend of business and a servant of the country, would not dare stop in this program and bring on another long period of agitation. Agitation longer continued would be fatal to the business of this country, and if this program is delayed there will come agitation, with every letter in the word a capital letter. The choice is a sober and sensible program now completed or months upon months of additional conjecture and danger.

"It is a matter of conscience as well as a matter of large public policy to do what this congress I am certain is going to do, finish the program. And I do not think that it is going to take a long time. I believe that the temper of those engaged in this great thing is admirable, that the various elements sometimes in antagonism in the congress of the United States are drawing together, and that we shall see an early statesmanlike result for which we shall all have abundant reason to be thankful.

Fever Lasted Long Time.

"I want to suggest this to you: Business has been in a feverish and apprehensive condition in this country for more than ten years. I will not stop to point out the time at which it began to be apprehensive, but during more than ten years business has been the object of sharp criticism in the United States.

"Business men have acted as some men do who fear they will have to undergo an operation, and who are not sure that when they get on the table the operation will not be a capital operation. As a matter of fact, as the diagnosis has progressed it has become more and more evident that no capital operation was necessary; that at the most a minor operation was necessary to remove admitted distemper and evils.

Guessing Unfair to Business.

"There is nothing more fatal to business than to be kept guessing from month to month and from year to year whether something serious is going to happen to it or not, and what in particular is going to happen to it if anything does.

"The guessing went on, the air was full of interrogation points for ten years and more. Then came an administration which for the first time had a definite program of constructive correction; not of destructive correction, but of a constructive correction of admitted evil—a clear program, disclosed so far as possible in a general program, in its particulars as well as in its general features. And the administration proceeded to carry out this program.

"First, there was the tariff and business shivered. 'We don't like to go in; the water looks cold;' but when the tariff had been passed it was found that the readjustment was possible without any serious disturbance whatever. So that men said with a sense of relief, 'Well, we are glad to get that behind us and it wasn't bad after all.'

"Then came the currency reform. You remember with what resistance, with what criticism, with what systematic holding back a large body of bankers in this country met the proposals of that reform, and you know how, immediately after its passage, they recognized its benefit and its beneficence, and how, ever since the passage of that reform, bankers throughout the United States have been congratulating themselves.

"Then we advanced to the trust program, and again the same dread, the same hesitation, the same urgency that the thing should be postponed. It will not be postponed, and it will not be postponed because we are the friends of business."

WESTERN CANADA'S NATURAL RESOURCES

PETROLEUM, NATURAL GAS, COAL AND FARM LANDS.

The developments that have taken place recently in the oil and gas fields of Western Canada have but added another to the many previous evidences that have been produced, showing the great wealth that has been an unknown asset for so many generations.

The latest reports from the oilfields at Calgary show that there is a production there that would appear to equal the best paying fields on the continent. Experts have been on the ground for some time. It is said that one of the wells is able to produce 2,000 gallons an hour. If this is so there are but about a dozen wells in the world of greater production. During the past week discoveries of surface indications have been made which show that oil exists over a considerable portion of Alberta and Saskatchewan, while in Manitoba there have also been showings. At Battleford, Saskatchewan, a few days ago discoveries were made which led to the filing for leases on twenty thousand acres of land, all having strong surface indications. Companies were formed to carry on immediate work, and in a couple of months, or probably less, the story will be told whether oil exists in paying quantities.

But there are also the coal deposits and the natural gas deposits that are helping to make of Western Canada one of the wealthiest portions of the continent.

With the grain fields covering these hidden riches it is no wonder that a continued range of optimism is to be seen everywhere. Early reports of seeding of all grains being successfully completed all over the country are followed by reports of excellent and strong growth everywhere. During the first week in June most of the wheat had reached a growth of from twelve to twenty inches, with the most even appearance, almost universally, that has been seen for years. Oats appeared equally well, and covered the ground in a way that brought the broadest kind of a grin to overspread the farmer's countenance.

Barley, a favorite with the hog raisers, had taken good root, and was crowding oats for a first place, as to length of shoot. Cultivated fodder grasses are getting great attention, as a consequence of the inclination to go more largely into mixed farming, and the raising of hogs, cattle and horses. The weather is reported fine, just what is needed, and if present favorable conditions continue, the grain crop of Western Canada for 1914 will be the largest average in the history of the country.—Advertisement.

ON EGYPT'S FAMOUS RIVER

Sailing on Its Placid Waters Rowers Weirdly Chant as They Tug at Their Oars.

As we sat on deck, beneath the minarets of the mosque, the skies slowly turned from orange to lilac and purple of night, throwing a strange pink light over the city's buildings, Ariche Bell writes in the Cleveland Plain Dealer. The minosa trees and date palms became black and great white cranes, seemingly knowing that their wings had an appropriate background, circled over our heads, over the deep azure river and over the many white sailed dahabeahs that were floating along in the breezeless night, propelled by rowers who were chanting weirdly as they tugged at the oars.

Dimly we could see the black draped figures of numberless women approach the river's brink and we knew that the splashes in the water were caused by the dropping of the heavy jugs, which they twirl around till they are filled, after which they raise them laboriously to their heads and then skip up the banks and disappear in the darkness of the night.

The sounds of the city ceased and all was quiet. All but the plaintive lay of a piper who must have been somewhere not far off on the bank of the river. It seemed that he was playing the love song of Larbi or Beni Mora. It was monotonous and drowsy and invoked sleep. In the morning before dawn I heard the boys pulling the stake near my window. I had fallen asleep to native music, and now I was awakened by their song. As we started up the river, the clarion call of the muezzin rang out from the minaret. For good Mohammedans it meant that a new day had begun—but for infidel Americans, there were several additional hours of sleep.

Teaching the Children.

In the Woman's Home Companion appears a department called "The Exchange," in which various contributors give household suggestions. A Texas woman tells, as follows, how she has taught her children to pick up their playthings:

"Being a busy homekeeper with three healthy babies to watch over, I try to teach them to help themselves. One great problem is to get scattered toys picked up and put away in proper places. I secured a good-sized soap box, which I covered neatly with denim, and to which I fastened four casters. At night this is our 'freight train' and it's a very simple matter to get my men to push the car around and collect scattered freight (toys)."

Eldon, Mo.—"I was troubled with displacement, inflammation and female weakness. For two years I could not stand on my feet long at a time and I could not walk two blocks without enduring cutting and drawing pains down my right side which increased every month. I have been at that time purple in the face and would walk the floor. I could not lie down or sit still sometimes for a day and a night at a time. I was nervous, and had very little appetite, no ambition, melancholy, and often felt as though I had not a friend in the world. After I had tried most every female remedy without success, my mother-in-law advised me to take Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. I did so and gained in strength every day. THE DEVIL CHAIR

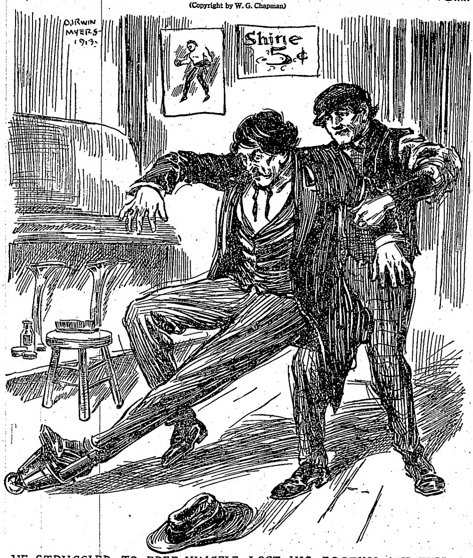
THE MAN IN THE BALANCE

By H. M. EGBERT

(Copyright by W. G. Chapman)



HE STRUGGLED TO FREE HIMSELF, LOST HIS FOOTING, AND FELL BACKWARD INTO THE FELLOW'S ARMS.

Governor Harding was within a few months of the expiration of his term of office, and within as many days of learning whether he would be renominated to succeed himself or no. And Fortune, who had smiled unexpectedly on him before, now seemed cold and reluctant.

Five years before Governor Harding, then an unknown lawyer, had allied himself with and placed his services at the disposal of the Nokomis Land company, a confederacy of masterly thieves who had pounced upon the rich territory to which a certain John Haynes, an Englishman, had fallen heir. When Haynes arrived in the western state in which his property was situated, he found the gang in control of it. He refused an offer of a million dollars for what was worth nearly twelve times that, and, torn from his wife and daughter, he was sent to the penitentiary for fourteen years upon a trumped-up charge. The gang, loyal to one another, gave Harding a hundred shares and secured for him the gubernatorial nomination.

With Haynes under duress, there seemed no obstacle to the conspirators' enjoyment of the plundered property. They controlled the state absolutely and Harding, forced into power by them, became notorious for the corruption and inefficiency of his administration. But, five years after the enterprise of these men had been crowned with success, alarming news came out of the Nokomis Falls penitentiary. Haynes, in the prison workshop, had invented a diabolical machine—a gyroscope, which, when attached to any vehicle, would drive it upon a single wheel at any rate of speed up to two hundred miles an hour. It could be attached to the feet, to rolling chairs, bicycles, automobiles, aeroplanes even. By means of this mechanism, journeying about the country at an incredible rate of speed, Haynes dealt out retribution upon the conspirators. His blows fell with lightning-like rapidity—now here, now there; and, one by one, the members of the Nokomis Land company disappeared forever from the sight of their fellows. Their fate, unknown to the survivors, became the more terrible in their eyes. They fled to other cities, to Europe, even—and even there Haynes found them.

Harding he had left to the last, knowing that the man dared not seek safety in flight. He was fastened both by ambition and by greed to the executive desk in Cheynesboro, the state capital. During his investigations Haynes had discovered his daughter and sent her to Chicago, to await his call; his wife was still lost to him, but he had reason to believe that Harding knew where she was to be found, and he had resolved that, after he had completed his vengeance upon the rest, he would seek out and wrest the truth from him.

The flight of the conspirators proved a serious blow to Harding's ambitions. When they disappeared they were forced, necessarily, to relinquish their grip upon the state.

Now the renomination was at hand, and the governor, bereft of the assistance of his former sponsors, faced a hostile public almost alone. In his desperation he had announced his intention of addressing a great mass meeting in the large square that the new capitol faces, speaking from the steps the day before the nomination, in appeal for public support.

In spite of the detectives with whom he surrounded himself, the governor was totally unaware that Haynes had been for two months in Cheynesboro. Under an alias Haynes had flown in the local aviation meet, whose course was around the capitol dome. Haynes came in third and won no prize—but he had left his gyroscope at home! Even in the swiftness of that aerial journey he could perceive the rottenness of the structure, the badly laid blocks of marble, the cracks that spread from pediment to lintel and from abacus to cornice; and it was then that the plan came to him to utilize this scandal for Harding's downfall.

He did not wish his death, for he had achieved vengeance many times over. He wished rather to be quits with this man, to pay off his score and have done with the last item in those plans which, once a fixed idea of vengeance, had grown, through accomplishment, to be but a debt and a duty.

There had been something of dignity in Harding's public life. The man was no common trickster; literate, cultured, he was in high standing with the better elements in the community. The men who had backed him had been swindlers on the grand scale; there was none of the chicanery of the cheap politician about any of them. Even now, when alone, many believed Harding to be the victim of circumstances. And Haynes realized that only ridicule could upset the Harding myth and that this would strike home to the public imagination where mere denunciation failed.

He went to Paulding, the governor's most implacable adversary, and outlined his plans. Paulding was unconvinced.

"How are we going to do it?" he asked. "How could any man do such a thing?"

"I only ask," said Haynes calmly, "that at eight in the morning on which he is due to make his speech, you have the reporters and photographers ready in the square, in advantageous positions. Say as much or as little as you like—but don't let Harding get wind of it."

"Then I shall say nothing at all," Paulding replied. "My dear man, suppose you could do such a crazy thing, what have you to get out of it?"

"Only the settlement of a little private grudge," Haynes answered; and thus he dismissed himself. Paulding did not reveal the proposition; he thought it too wild and impossible; but he did drop hints to the editors of the anti-Harding press.

Harding lived in a new suburb, fashionable and occupied, so far as it had been developed, by costly edifices. It was some little way out of Cheynesboro, and through it passed the uncompleted trolley line which ran into the desolate sandhills of the surrounding country and was destined to link up Cheynesboro with Benderville, fifteen miles away. Haynes had studied the governor's habits carefully during the period of his stay in Cheynesboro. He learned, for one thing, that Harding's guards, with whom he had surrounded himself as a protection against the fate he feared, left him when he boarded the trolley car at the foot of the capitol hill, or entered his automobile—though he used this latter conveyance seldom, especially since he had realized the need of increasing his popularity as a man of the people. He left the trolley at his street corner, had his shoes polished by a protege, a little Greek boy who owned a stand there, and walked the block to his house, where he was again under the protection of a detective, assigned to him by the chief of police under the guise of an assistant secretary.

Haynes must strike at him, then, during his walk along that single block. And he must act within two days, for Harding's speech at the square would seal his fate one way or another, and almost certainly would bring him the renomination he sought for.

It was just before dark upon the evening before the event that Harding, stepping jauntily and a little pompously off the street car, approached the shoe-stand, to discover a new operator in waiting with the brushes.

"Who are you?" asked Harding curtly, as the fellow came cringing up to him rubbing his hands invitingly.

"Me Donatello," answered the fellow. "Tony, he sold out to me and gone home to Greece."

Donatello was certainly a marvel at shining shoes. He had finished one foot and was beginning to work on the other, when the governor heard a gentle, purring sound, apparently proceeding from the interior of the stand on which his foot was resting.

"What's that?" he demanded.

"That's the electreesty," said Donatello. "This is an electreck shoe-stand. He no work properly, an' so I polish him myself."

"Well, get a move on," growled Harding, planting his foot firmly in the form.

Haynes proceeded with extreme deliberation, however, for one thing was essential to the fulfilment of his scheme: He must wait until the street car, which ran for three or four miles beyond the governor's residence, returned, and left the single line clear for its successor. In spite of his deliberation he had almost finished his task, and the governor was manifesting signs of impatience, when at last, the car came rumbling back on its return route into Cheynesboro. Haynes gave the last flick to his polishing cloth.

"Good!" he said, straightening himself, and as he did so, he gave a slight kick to the bottom corner of the shoe-stand. Instantly the purring sound grew louder until it became like that made by a top running at a high rate of speed. Governor Harding rose, tried to detach his foot, and, to his amazement, found that the form in which he had rested it came away with the shoe. He struggled to free himself, lost his footing, and fell backward into the fellow's arms. As Donatello raised him, he perceived that the bottom of the form was set with a little wheel, surrounding a top-like mechanism, and that both were revolving at an incredibly swift speed. Harding ripped out an oath, freed himself, and set his foot to the ground.

An instant later he was whizzing down the street at fifty miles an hour, making a bee line for the bend of the trolley track, which here curved into the open country. He shouted loudly for help. Then the wheel caught the line, and, with a resonant click, snapped fast, and the unfortunate man raced out of sight, bent for the terminus twelve miles out of the town in the midst of the sandhills, and too astonished to shout again.

Haynes plucked off his greasy cap and took a felt hat from the box. He hid his overalls beneath the seat of the chair, set down the polishing brushes, and strolled up the street. A man came out of a house near by.

"Did you hear anyone scream?" he asked.

"I did," said Haynes. "Some boy, I fancy, over in those lots."

"It sounded like a man's voice," said the other. "I thought it might have been another hold-up."

"Well, if it was, it's over by now," said Haynes.

The other hesitated and then went back grumbling.

Haynes, ascertaining that the road was deserted, started off leisurely in the direction which the governor had so amazingly taken. A car caught him and deposited him at the end of its route, four or five miles away. An eight-mile tramp now lay before him, and he set off blithely, quite certain as to what he would find when he reached the end of those straight lines of metal. When, a couple of hours later, his feet fell noisily among the debris of gravel that heaped the roadway beside the unfinished track, he heard faint calls for help coming apparently from beneath him. He stopped and looked around. He saw the flats stretching away on either side of him, low sand hills covered with a coarse growth of green—but he did not see Governor Harding.

"That's very odd!" mused Haynes. "Hello!" he shouted. "Hello! Did somebody call?"

An answering cry came out of the ground. Then Haynes perceived a deep gravel pit, from which road material had been excavated by the workmen, immediately behind the embankment of soft earth which they had built at the end of the track. This wall was broken in the center as though by some heavy body—and behind it, in the pit, twenty feet below the surface of the ground, he saw the governor lying. He was half smothered in sand, and on one foot, elevated in the air, the gyroscope was still performing its duties.

"Is somebody down in that pit?" called Haynes.

"Yes, I am," the governor shouted back indignantly.

"And I've been here a couple of hours at least, shouting at the top of my voice, and not a soul came."

"How on earth did you get down there?" asked Haynes.

"Stop your fool questions and get me out," the governor answered. "I'm nearly buried alive."

Haynes scrambled down, dislodging a shower of small stones, which struck the governor upon the face and neck and aroused his angry protests. When Haynes reached the bottom he perceived that Harding's fury was not unjustified. He was scratched and wounded, his face and hands were covered with blood, and his clothes were almost torn from his body.

"Ah," said Haynes, looking at the whirring machine. "You're a scientist, sir. You've been experimenting, I see. Perpetual motion?"

"No!" yelled Harding loudly. "A fool of a shoe-cleaner fixed this infernal electrical mechanism to my shoe, and it carried me along the car line and plunged me into this hole. Damn him, I've had to hold my foot in the air ever since I came here. If I set it down to rest the infernal instrument sprays up the dust all over me. I might have buried myself a foot deep by this time if I had let it go on working."

Haynes was content. Evidently Harding had no suspicion that this was the dreaded gyroscope.

"Why don't you take it off?" demanded Haynes.

"I've tried—and cut my finger to the bone," protested the governor. "The thing won't come off. It's glued to my shoe. And the odd thing about it is I can't reach my boot to take that off. The thing pulls my leg out perfectly straight."

"Let me try," answered Haynes. He bent down and turned off the motor power. The gyroscope revolved more and more slowly and presently came to a stop, the wheel following suit. Then Haynes detached it.

"Perfectly simple, you see, sir," he said. "Now let me help you out of this." He raised the prostrate man, looked into his face, and started back in apparent alarm. "Why—it's Governor Harding, isn't it?" he said.

"It is," said the governor sourly. "And I suppose this adventure will be in every newspaper in Cheynesboro tomorrow morning."

"It won't get out through me," Haynes answered respectfully. "No, sir, rely on me. But you don't remember me, I see, sir, though we have met before. My name is Jones—I flew in the aviation meet last week. I've got my machine right handy, and if you will accompany me, I can take you home in a jiffy."

"You're sure there's no danger?" asked Harding.

"She's as safe as a train, governor. We'll fly low, too—not higher than the dome of the capitol, relatively speaking. We must go that high, you know, sir, to avoid being dashed into the ground by sudden winds. This way!"

He led the governor to the little hangar which he had set up close to the terminus of the line, where, hidden behind the intervening sandhills, it would not have attracted the attention of any passers by. The gyroscope he left lying in the pit; that he could secure afterward, if he should need it. It would not serve the purpose that he had in mind.

"Here she is," he sang out, as they approached the wooden structure. "Now you wait there, sir, until I bring her out."

He went in, tested the apparatus, inspected the motor, and wheeled the machine into the open. "Jump in, governor," he said cheerily. "We can make Cheynesboro in twelve or fifteen minutes."

Governor Harding got in gingerly and took his place, clutching for support upon the vertical bar in front of him.

"But we won't," Haynes continued, as the machine, after bouncing across the flats, took the air and soared to a height of some three hundred feet.

"Eh?" said the governor, his voice trembling from the emotion produced on him by this unexpected sensation of aerial travel.

"I said we could make Chenyesboro in twelve or fifteen minutes, but we won't."

"What do you mean?"

"We're going somewhere else, you damned, thieving scoundrel," said Haynes in a soft, even voice, as he handled the wheel. He did not even turn his head.

"What the deuce do you mean, sir?" cried Harding, angrily. "Are you trying to kidnap me? What do you want—money?"

"No, governor, I'm not one of the Paulding gang," answered John Haynes. "Guess again. Did you ever wrong anybody in your life—wrong him unpardonably and ruin his life and that of those dependent on him?"

"Plenty of them, sir, plenty," shouted the governor. "I've trodden down many good men in my time and I hope to do it again. That's life, sir. I'm no damned sentimentalist. Kill or be killed, eat or be eaten—it's the law of the jungle and the law of humanity. Just now you seem to have the upper hand over me. How much do you want?"

"I don't want money, Harding."

"Then what do you want? Who are you? Are you the man you spoke about? What have I done to you?"

"I'll tell you when we get down," Haynes answered. "We make a stop upon the way, you know. Now sit back; I'm going to make a steep bank here. Put your hands together on this horizontal bar—so."

Harding obeyed and in a moment Haynes snapped a pair of handcuffs on his wrists. The governor yelled with rage; he would have struck the other with the metal, but just then the monoplane tilted so sharply that he was forced to grasp at the bar with his fingers instead. Haynes laughed and brought the machine down to the ground.

"Now, governor," he said, turning upon him, "I'll tell you who I am. Did you ever hear of the Nokomis Land company?'

"Haynes!" shouted the other, peering at him through the darkness, trying to distinguish his features. "Haynes?"

"Haynes," answered his companion.

"Well, I guess you've got me. What is it to be? Murder? I'm ready!"

"No, I don't want your wretched carcass, you dog," said Haynes bitterly. "I want to know where my wife is—my wife who was torn from me nearly six years ago when you leagued yourself with Robertson and Beyers and the rest of them to put me away for fourteen years in the penitentiary. Where is she? You know."

"Yes, I know," said Harding. "And I shall continue knowing."

"You won't tell me?" cried Haynes in astonishment.

"No. Why should I? What bargain have I that you won't kill me as soon as I tell you?"

"What bargain have I that you'll tell me the truth if I spare you?"

"All right," said the governor, indifferently, "kill me."

"If I kill you," said Haynes, "I shall toss you overboard from an altitude of five thousand feet."

"Go ahead," said Harding, but his lips were trembling.

Haynes bent over the levers of the machine. As he did so the governor's arms descended with the full force of his power, and the steel cuffs just grazed his companion's head. Had Haynes not happened to move aside at that instant, his skull would have been fractured. A moment later he had flung himself upon the governor, and the two men wrestled and fought in the darkness, tumbling out of the car and sprawling over the sandy plain.

There could be but one end to that encounter. Two minutes later Haynes had the governor at his mercy. Around his throat he clenched the fingers of his strong right arm, while with his left he drew a length of cord from the machine. Two minutes later Governor Harding was trussed like a chicken, his limbs and trunk being so inextricably bound that he could not stir at all, save to wriggle his ankles. Then, having his enemy helpless, Haynes lifted him into the car.

"Bite the bar," he sneered, mockingly. "Bite hard for you'll have to cling by your teeth now. We're going to fly again. O, by the way, I forgot that you're going to wear blinkers."

Haynes drew from his pocket a long strip of dark cloth, which he doubled and redoubled, passing it tightly over the other's eyes, and fastening it behind. With a second strip, crossing the forehead and fastening under the ears, he made his enemy secure. Then he soared skyward.

"Now, governor," he said presently, when he had recovered sufficiently to control his emotions, "where is she?"

The trussed, motionless figure emitted a short laugh. "I shall not tell you," he answered.

Haynes tilted the left plane suddenly and the machine veered and sank earthward at a dangerous angle. The governor's body slid toward the edge of the machine. Haynes grasped him by the cords which bound him. "Where is she?" he shouted in his ear.

Harding was silent.

Haynes, baffled by this unconquerable determination, shot upward again, flew in a series of wide circles, and presently began to descend once more. Harding, helpless and blind, felt that the circles which the machine was describing were becoming shorter and shorter. Presently the monoplane stopped with a jar, bounced, bumped, and stood still. Haynes leaped from the car and dragged his enemy out. A moment later Harding felt himself placed upon a hard, round seat, apparently no larger than the seat of a small chair, but having a slight concavity, and an encircling rim. Then Haynes unbound the cords which fastened his enemy's legs.

"Stretch your feet downward," he said, and involuntarily Harding obeyed. His feet encountered nothing.

"Listen!" said Haynes, and, taking his watch from his pocket, he let it fall. There was a long interval of silence. Then, far away, but clearly audible, came the sound of the smashing metal below.

"This seat," said Haynes, "is all that rests between you and eternity. Stay motionless and you may be seen and saved, if anybody should pass this peak. Move and you fall to death. Where is she?"

Harding shut his lips tight, but the fingers of his hands were clenched and deadly was the terror that gripped him.

"Governor," said Haynes, more gently, "your courage is worthy of a finer cause. Have you not many times in your career, been in such a situation that neither you nor your opponent could give each other guarantees against treachery? What did you do? You made what is called a 'gentleman's agreement,' and kept it in honor. Tell me where she can be found and I pledge my honor to leave you and never return."

"Take me back to my home then," Harding answered.

Haynes kicked at the stone seat. It swayed, tilted, threatened to fall.

"Where is she?" he asked again.

"If you kill me you will never learn."

"Yes. Your private papers tell. You have written to Robertson."

Suddenly the governor shouted into Haynes' ear. "She's in China," he yelled. "At Chung Ling, twelve miles north of Wu Chang. She went there as a missionary after she thought you and her daughter dead. Now leave me in the name of God."

Haynes left him without response. A moment later Harding heard the whir of the motor as the monoplane disappeared into the distance.

Dawn came. Though he could not dislodge the bandage upon his eyes, he saw the light dimly through it, he felt the warmth of the rising sun as it crept over the horizon and shone upon his face. And presently, to his amazement, he heard distinctly the footsteps of a man treading on gravelly ground below, and, raising his voice, he yelled with all his might.

He heard the footsteps and shouted again. He heard a cry and answering shouts. Then all at once, to his amazement, he heard the din of a multitude as they came running from all points of the compass. He heard laughter, shouts faintly borne to him; then voices screaming and a gathering uproar.

He did not shout again. He knew now where he had been placed by Haynes. The intuition told him what his intelligence withheld. He was perched somewhere upon the top of the capitol building!

And now the din of trolley cars and the roar of vehicles mingled with the shouts of the multitude; and ever the turmoil grew, uninterrupted now, a resonant and continuous roar. And all at once shouts came from behind, and men came rushing along the parapet and scrambling up the outside of the dome.

They cut his cords and took the bandage from his eyes. Harding looked out, blinking in the unaccustomed light. His surmise had been true: The men who had rescued him stood gaping in amazement at him, but underneath was a huge, jeering mob, pointing upward, with ten thousand fingers. Photographers, perched everywhere, were clicking their cameras at him. Yells of derision and sarcastic shouts came from all points. Men were clambering over buttresses toward him, blackening the white marble like ants on a wall.

Harding looked up, and suddenly his head fell on his breast and tears of shame gushed from his eyes.

He was seated in one of the scales of Justice.

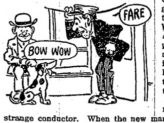
HAPPENINGS IN THE CITIES

This Dog Is a Regular Patron of a Trolley Line

GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.—Druggist John Harvey's beagle hound, Gyp, five years old, has a passion for trolley car riding. All the regular conductors on the Berkshire line, running between Great Barrington and Canaan, Conn., are his friends. Hardly a day goes by that Gyp does not enjoy a trolley ride. At the hour when he knows a car is due he takes a position on Main street near one of the white posts where stops are made, and when a car stops he looks up to see if it is the conductor he knows, and if it is he boards the car. After the round trip he leaves the car, barking his thanks to the conductor for his ride.



One day after boarding a car he noticed that it was in charge of a strange conductor. When the new man demanded "ticket!" of a passenger in front of whom Gyp was standing, Gyp remarked "bow-wow!" which was his usual way of saluting his friend, the regular conductor.

"Hello! who pays your fare?" asked the conductor.

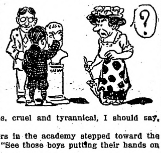
"Bow-wow," replied Gyp.

The conductor was on the point of putting him off the car when the motorman interposed:

Quite often Gyp goes hunting alone. Does he walk to the hunting grounds? Not a bit of it. He boards a trolley car and rides out several miles into the country to his favorite piece of swale, where the rabbits are thickest. There he leaves the car and enters the swale to spend most of the day hunting.

Boys Break the Rules in Academy of Fine Arts

PHILADELPHIA, PA.—It happened in the Academy of the Fine Arts in this city. A gentleman came in accompanied by four lads ranging apparently from ten to fifteen years. They were laughing and chatting at a merry rate. They had come to "see the sights" and were being ushered in the section that holds the statuary.



"Ah, ha, boys! Here is a fine bust of Julius Caesar. What do you think of him?"

The tallest boy ran his fingers lightly over the head.

"He has a finely proportioned head; I like his forehead, but the jaw is strong and the mouth seems cruel."

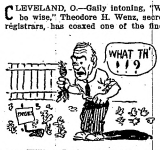
"Let's have a look at him," said another of the boys, moving forward. He fingered the bust carefully. "Yes, cruel and tyrannical, I should say, judging from his face."

A woman among the other visitors in the academy stepped toward the group, after whispering indignantly: "See those boys putting their hands on those statues? I'll stop that."

She was about to do so when the boys and their companion turned away from the statue they had been examining. As they faced the other visitors all comments stopped. The boys were blind.

City Flower Beds That Will Tease the Palate

CLEVELAND, O.—Gaily intoning, "Where ignorance is bliss 'twere folly to be wise," Theodore H. Wenz, secretary of the elections board bureau of registrars, has coaxed one of the finest market gardens in Cleveland into being in the belief that he was growing flowers. With whole-hearted enthusiasm he delved and dug, early and late, planting beet seeds for petunias, lettuce for cosmos, radishes for asters, lima beans for pansies and tomatoes for celosia plumosa.



The back to nature impulse hit Wenz last winter and he spent his evenings at his home, studying the culture of flowers. As soon as the frost was out of the ground he began operations. First he wrote Congressman William Gordon for literature and, well supplied with data, he began to delve into the subject.

With the first warm days of spring he ordered a consignment of flower seeds and displayed them to his fellow employes in the board of elections offices, and right there is where he made his tactical error. William Schnerer, recorder of naturalization papers, had not forgotten that Wenz had substituted two dozen glass eggs for a like number of the poachable commodity, belonging to him and he was not slow in emptying out the flower seeds and replacing them with those of vegetables.

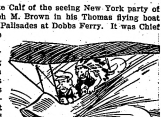
Each day Wenz has issued bulletins on his "flower garden" and the other day he said:

"I tell you posy beds are the envy of the neighborhood. A funny thing happened last night though. I was showing a woman who lives next door the plants last night and asked her what she thought of my asters.

"She said: 'They look like radishes, and your petunias look like beets, the cosmos like lettuce and the pansies like beans.' Doesn't it beat all how ignorant some people are?"

Big Chief "Two Guns" Up in Air in "Eagle Canoe"

NEW YORK.—Chief Two Guns White Calf of the seeing New York party of Blackfeet Indians sat beside Ralph M. Brown in his Thomas flying boat the other morning and spun over the Palisades at Dobbs Ferry. It was Chief Two Guns' first air trip, but it came very near being his last.



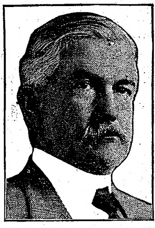
As Mrs. Two Guns and the party were shading their eyes and watching the flying boat rise gracefully from the water and soar over the Palisades toward the happy hunting grounds Chief Eagle Calf, who is the interpreter for the party, told Agent Charles R. Griffin that he anticipated bad medicine for Chief Two Guns before the flying canoe came to earth.

He had just spoken the words, according to Griffin, when the flying boat ran into an air pocket, swerved to one side and then, taking an angle of 60 degrees, dived for the Hudson. Barely 100 feet over the water Pilot Brown got the boat under control and it took to the water like a duck and skimmed across the river to the party.

Chief Two Guns lost no time in getting to land and after gesticulating and uttering a series of "Hows" said in perfectly good English, "Heap fine eagle canoe. Ugh oof! Me no 'fraid!" But he did not interpret his Indian grunts, and if grunts mean fear in Blackfeet he grunted louder than the exhaust from the engine when the eagle canoe took its downward course, according to Pilot Brown.

"He hung on tight," explained Mr. Brown, "and don't you forget it, he grunted."

GIVES CREDIT TO GORGAS

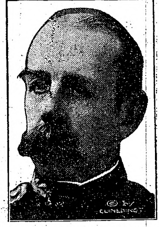


"America will get all the credit perhaps for completing the Panama canal, but in giving praise where it is due, the work of the French engineers and those engaged in the early digging of the canal ought not to be overlooked," remarked Henri Borgia of Paris, an engineer, recently. "The French overlooked the most important requisite in the Panama canal zone—that of proper sanitation. Had our engineers been supported in their work by a Colonel Gorgas, the American nation might not have had the opportunity to buy the canal.

"I think it only justice that some tribute be paid the French for their share in this great project. It is true they failed, but not through lack of funds, as is proved by the beautiful palace, the magnificent gardens, and the record of sumptuous living of the officials. Neither was failure due to the unwillingness of the French peasantry to contribute of their brawn, evidence of which is seen in the overfilled graves.

"The success of the American was not wholly due to his greater knowledge of engineering nor to his improved machinery; neither was it due to his ability to get into his hands large amounts of money, but to the victory over the humble mosquito.

BRIGADIER GENERAL SHARPE'S BIG JOB



More armies have been destroyed by starvation than by battles. The duke of Wellington once said that he did not consider himself much of a general, but that he prided himself on being a first-class commissary officer. "Many can lead troops," he remarked; "I can feed them."

The big job of feeding Uncle Sam's fighting men is in the hands of Brig. Gen. Henry G. Sharpe, commissary general of the United States army.

In war there is unavoidable waste of food supplies, and for this reason it is necessary to furnish much more than is actually eaten. American soldiers in the field waste quite as much as they eat. The waste of our troops in the Philippines fed half of Aguinaldo's insurrectos in a way that surpassed their wildest dreams of luxury.

The quantity of stores required for one day's subsistence of half a million men in the field is: Hard bread, 500,000 pounds; bacon, 262,500 pounds; sugar, 100,000 pounds; desiccated vegetables (potatoes and onians), 37,500 pounds; coffee (roasted and ground), 40,000 pounds; beans, 75,000 pounds; tomatoes, 50,000; jam, 33,750 pounds; vinegar, 5,000 gallons; salt, 20,000 pounds; pepper, 1,250 pounds. These supplies have a total net weight of about 1,300,000 pounds, and to transport them requires 50 freight cars of 40,000 pounds capacity, or 214 army wagons.

ALFONSO'S PRIVATE BARBER

An undersecretary of the Spanish legation told at a dinner party a little story about the king of Spain, according to the Rehoboth Sunday Herald.

"King Alfonso," he began, "is fond of taking motor trips incog. He motored recently through a wild region of Castile. He put up with his modest entourage at a more than modest inn.

"'I am sure,' he said, laughing, 'that they won't know me here!'

"Well, they did not know him there. They treated him like an ordinary traveler. So much so, in fact, that when he went to shave the next morning he found there was no mirror in his room. So he went down into the inn yard in his shirt sleeves and there a chambermaid brought him a broken piece of mirror, which he set up beside the well and proceeded to lather cheeks and chin.

"The girl stood chatting with him. Finally she said in an odd voice:

"'You are not just an ordinary traveler, are you?'

"'Why do you ask me that?' laughed the king.

"'I don't know,' said the maid. 'But there's something about you—perhaps you belong to the royal court at Madrid?'

"'Yes, I do,' he answered.

"'Perhaps you work for his majesty himself?'

"'Yes, I do.'

"'And what do you do for him?' asked the pretty chambermaid.

"'Oh, lots of things,' the king replied. 'I'm shaving him just now.'"

LOVE WINS KAISER'S SON

German nobility, society and officialdom are astonished at the announcement that Prince Oscar of Prussia, fifth son of Kaiser Welhelm, is to marry Countess Ina Marie, daughter of Count Bassewitz of Mecklenburg.

It is the first instance on record where a man of the reigning branch of the Hohenzollerns has been morganatically engaged to wed. While the young countess is a woman of rank, she is not of royal blood.

It is assumed that the emperor, who consented to the engagement, will confer a higher rank in the nobility on the young countess. The emperor's consent is said to have been granted owing to the lack of an available German princess and to his aversion to foreign marriage for his son. The countess met the prince while she was a lady in waiting to Empress Augusta Victoria.

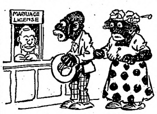
By flatly announcing his intention to marry the girl of his choice, regardless of Hohenzollern precedent and family tradition, Prince Oscar won the instant admiration of the German public. The revelation of the romance was a sweet morsel under the tongues of all Berliners.

WASHINGTON GOSSIP

Lemuel Was Wrong—He Came Back Next Day

WASHINGTON.—Lemuel ambled into the marriage license office the other day wearing his workaday clothes.

"Does I get my license heah?" Lemuel wanted to know.



"You do," responded the clerk.

"Den," said Lemuel with dignity, "you kin make it out fo' me."

He unhesitatingly gave answers to the various form questions propounded to him. And when this was concluded he reached for the paper which he had signed.

"Not yet," said the clerk gently, "not yet. You must take the oath and pay the dollar.

"Take de oath?" said Lemuel. "Man, what kind of oath is dat?"

"You must take oath that what you have stated is the truth."

"And den," said Lemuel in a pained voice, "after I take dat oath I gotta pay a dollar besides?"

"It is the law," said the marriage license clerk solemnly.

Lemuel turned toward the door.

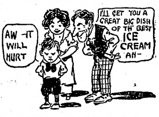
"I reckon I'll wait till next yeah," he stated. "I didn't reckon when I cum to get married you white folks would make me do all de wo'k."

But Lemuel was wrong. He didn't wait until next year. He came next day. And at the outside door of the courthouse the voice of his future bride could be heard as she dragged him toward the office. And these were her soft sentiments:

"Now, you triflin' no-account, you all gimme dat dollah en' I'll pay fo' de license. And if you don't tak' dat oath right I'll bus' you when I get outside sho's I live!"

Shedding of Teeth Is a Most Interesting Subject

YOU are respectfully invited to consider the shedding of teeth. It is a most interesting subject of thought, in that it touches the memory-wire that connects with our own milk-molars way back in the last century, when we were—Remember? There is a young gentleman out Cleveland park way who had two loose ones, in front, that wobbled, but would not shed. He was offered every inducement to have them pulled—ice cream and other lures—but as every proposition had a very literal string to it, the young gentleman hung on to his teeth. And the teeth hung on to him—as a door hangs on by one hinge.



AW —IT WILL HURT
I'LL GET YOU A GREAT BIG DISH OF TH' BEST ICE CREAM AN—

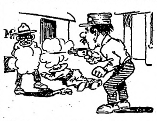
The other day the special Providence which plays nurse to small boys arranged that little cousin Virginia, in a hammock on the porch, should swing against the young gentleman with such satisfying results that, the first thing the Big Man heard when he whizzed home was:

"It's out, papa! Virginia kicked it out."

The household celebrated with due jubilation, and more enticing suggestions were thrown out as to the advisability of having mamma pull out the other tooth, which was—"so loose, darling, it couldn't possibly hurt—"

Will Next Use a Net to Catch Train Robbers

THERE'S many a slip 'twixt shooting the train robber and getting the reward, and that's why Jim Yokum of Red Bluff, Cal., is going about these days with a rueful countenance on which the gloom is settled as thickly as the white powder on some of the artificial ladies we see nowadays.



Jim's a train hand of some sort. It may be he is an express messenger, or a conductor—of his real grade I know naught. All I know is what Francis John Dyer of Los Angeles and other Pacific coast points told your correspondent, and he said Jim is a train hand. At any rate, Jim saw two men crawl into the mail car of his train while it was stopping at Delta, Cal. Like a true moving picture hero, he drew his shooting irons and began peppering the robbers. They returned the fire, but Jim's unerring aim brought one of the villains to the ground silent. Jim had killed him. The other fellow ran.

Now that was a fair day's work for a train hand, and Jim began to get all swelled up over it, and applied to the post office department for that thousand dollars reward which he understood to be standing for just such cases. The post office department opened his letter, yawned, rubber stamped it, passed it on through several million miles of red tape and returned it to Jim with something like this:

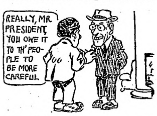
"Sir: In reply to your esteemed favor of recent date we beg to advise that the reward which you claim is offered only in the case of mail train robbers arrested and convicted."

Jim was dumfounded. He had neither arrested nor convicted his robber. He had merely killed him.

The next time he sees a man robbing the mails he intends to throw a net over him and take him to Washington, to the postmaster general, in a box

Gets Amusement Out of Being a "Doppelganger"

EVERY president seems fated to have somewhere in his neighborhood a "doppelganger," as the Germans call it; in English, a "double"—some one who resembles him so closely that he is continually being mistaken for him. President Wilson's double is also in public life. He is Representative McKenzie of Illinois, and they look as much alike as twins—although Mr. McKenzie is said to look more alike than the president, according to the wit of the house press gallery, who is an Irishman, of course.



REALLY, MR. PRESIDENT, YOU OWE IT TO TH' PEOPLE TO BE MORE CAREFUL

As Representative McKenzie was leisurely strolling through the lobby of a Washington hotel one evening last winter a stranger approached him.

"Pardon me, Mr. President," he said, with a frown of concern, "I know you are most democratic in your habits and the people admire you for it, but really, sir, this is too great a risk for the ruler of the United States to take, thus wandering about the city at night, alone and unattended by even a single guard. You owe it to the people to be more careful."

Mr. McKenzie bowed in acknowledgment, and, laying his hand upon his shoulder in a friendly way, thanked him for his kind interest, and, promising to be more careful in future, passed on, leaving the stranger in an ecstatic trance.

"I didn't have the heart to tell the fellow the brutal truth and spoil his evenings for the rest of the winter, at the lodge and the corner drug store and the table when there's company for dinner," remarked Mr. McKenzie

HOME RULE MAY YET CAUSE WAR

ORANGEMEN AWAIT ACTION OF PARLIAMENT AND SUSPENSE GROWS TENSE.

FIGHTING FORCES REVIEWED

Leaders of Covenanters Claim National Movement Not Serious, as Volunteer Companies Are Disorganized.

London, July 7.—With every week of suspense in the settlement of the future government of Ireland the menace of the military preparations by the Ulster and the home rule volunteers increases. The present tendency among the volunteers of the south is to accept leadership by the Nationalist party which John Redmond offered them.

Hostile Armed Camps.

Thus led, there would be a clear division of the home rulers and anti-home rule men into hostile armed camps. The very dangers of a bitter civil war which such a prospect presents, furnishes the best safeguard for peace.

Correspondents of the Associated Press at Dublin and Belfast have written of the situation from the Nationalist and Ulster points of view respectively.

An Interesting Development.

The most interesting development is the plan, hitherto unpublished, of the Orangemen under Sir Edward Carson for taking charge of affairs by force if a provisional government is set up, and the fact that the commercial men of Belfast have used their influence in Ulster councils to postpone radical action until a home rule parliament has been established in Dublin. The great question which confronts the Nationalist volunteers is how far their American sympathizers are likely to come forward with funds for their arms and equipment.

Volunteer Estimates Vary.

Dublin.—Estimates of the number of the Irish Nationalist volunteers vary between 80,000, which is the Dublin Castle figure compiled by the police, and 250,000, which is the estimate given in platform speeches. Careful inquiry shows that there are 50,000 in Leinster, which takes the lead, about 45,000 in Ulster (increasing rapidly), 35,000 in Munster and 25,000 in Connaught.

The difficulty of exact estimate arises from the fact that the movement is not organized from the center. Forces have sprung up spontaneously in every parish, and so far are only loosely connected with the provisional central body. There has been a complete wiping out of all class distinctions, and the rank and file include every grade—farmers, laborers, shop assistants, clerks, doctors, lawyers, and country gentlemen. There is a very strong leaven of time-expired soldiers—old Connaught Rangers, Dublin Fusiliers and Munster Fusiliers, and their experience is proving useful in the drill.

No Central Organization.

Belfast.—The leaders of the Covenanters in Ulster profess to consider the Nationalist volunteer movement as something not to be taken seriously. These Nationalist bands in the Ulster counties drill spasmodically and are not connected with any central organization. All the local leaders act entirely on their own initiative. In some districts the volunteers are split into factions under opposing leaders, who carry on a newspaper warfare.

The Ulster leaders say that the Nationalist volunteers must fail through the impossibility of getting arms. They claim to have many letters from America showing that the Irish there are tired of contributing to home rule, and now that they consider an Irish parliament assured, they propose to let those in Ireland settle their internal questions without help. Even if American sympathizers should refill the war chest the present government measures to suppress gun running in all ports would checkmate them.

"We have two years start in the matter of arming and we mean to keep it," an official of the Ulster Unionist council said to The Associated Press.

10,000 Visit Baths Sunday.

Minneapolis.—With a temperature of 90 degrees at 4 p. m. Sunday and the mercury well above 80 degrees the greater part of the day, the coolness of Calhoun Beach waters was the Minneapolis popular spot. It was the biggest day in the history of the baths. There was a long waiting line most of the day. From 10 a. m. the beach was crowded. Various estimates place the crowd at between 10,000 and 12,000 nearly doubling the July 4 crowd.

Dramatic Author Passes Away.

Roosevelt Locks His Gate.

Oyster Bay, N. Y., July 6.—The gate leading to Sagamore Hill was barred for the first time in years and Colonel Roosevelt was inaccessible from the outer world. It was learned that he cherishes the hope as strongly as he expressed it in 1912, of breaking up "the solid South" through the Progressive party. Although he has given up his trip to the Pacific coast on account of the condition of his health and has cancelled several other engagements, he agreed to go to New Orleans next month to make a speech.

YEAR JUST ENDING SHOWS A SURPLUS

WILSON REGIME MAKES GOOD FINANCIAL SHOWING WHEN REVENUES ARE ALL IN.

$33,784,452 ABOVE EXPENSES

Nearly $33,500,000 Pours In on Last Day, Turning What Looked Like a Deficit Into a Handsome Surplus—The Figures.

Washington, July 3.—Treasury figures, just completed, show that the federal government went through its first fiscal year under the Wilson administration with its income exceeding ordinary expenses by $33,784,452.07.

Last Day Turns Tide.

Nearly $33,500,000 poured into the treasury Tuesday, the last day of the year, and brought the total receipts for the year up to $734,343,700.20, a million and a half above Secretary McAdoo's original estimate. What had promised the day before to be a substantial deficit turned into a surplus.

Corporation and income tax payments furnished the stream of gold at the finish. From this source came $26,161,782.82 between the opening and closing of the treasury year, and Secretary McAdoo and other administration officials are pointing proudly to the total figures as proof of their promises as to what would be accomplished under the new tariff.

Panama Canal Cost.

The treasury surplus this year, at least would be wiped out by the Panama canal expenditures, which have been paid from the general fund. During the 12 months $34,826,941 has been spent on the canal, and when this has been charged off there will be a deficit for the year of $1,010,058.81 on the books. Last year the canal expenditure amounted to $41,741,258 and the final deficit was $400,733. Last year's total receipts were only $691,140,000, but, on the other hand, the ordinary expenditures were only $654,805,000, or $45,754,248 below last year's total.

Secretary McAdoo estimates that approximately 3,500,000 in scheduled income and corporation taxes, assessments not paid in June because penalty did not accrue against these assessments until July 1 would have been a clear surplus for the year of approximately $2,500,000.

KILLS TWO IN KILLING SELF

Poquonock, Conn., July 6.—Three members of a fishing party of four men were drowned in the Farmington river here, when their boat was capsized.

According to the survivor, the tragedy was due to the determination of one of the mn to commit suicde. He leaped into the water, but was dragged back into the boat. He jumped a second time, however, and in doing so overturned the boat.

The drowned men were: Michael Mitelenonus, aged 35; John Watyusky, 22; and William Zatazatzki, 37.

Unionist Peers to Yield.

London, July 6.—The debate in the house of lords on the bill to amend the Irish home rule bill was characterized by general recognition on the part of the Unionist peers that some means of settlement must be found and that the amending bill found the only solution. The Marquis of Lansdowne, Unionist leader, already had announced that it was necessary to find a way out of the calamity which threatened, and that therefore the Unionists would give the amending bill a second reading

VOTE SUPPORTS GEN. HUERTA

RETURNS INDICATE RE-ELECTION OF LEGISLATORS.

Mexico Faces Crisis, Says Report. Huerta-Zapata Alliance Is Rumored.

Mexico City, Mex., July 7.—President Huerta is reported to have received a virtually unanimous vote of confidence in elections held Sunday and senators, in that portion of the republic controlled by Huerta. Early indications showed him to be the favorite candidate for the presidency.

The largest vote in many years was cast both in the capital and nearby towns. The incomplete returns indicate the re-election of practically all the members of the chamber of deputies and senate.

Huerta-Zapata Alliance.

Vera Cruz.—It is rumored here that an alliance between Provisional President Huerta and Emiliano Zapata, the revolutionary leader, is to be formed soon.

Both here and in the capital the conviction exists that a crisis is imminent but only vague reasons are offered for the fear that the next few days will see a development.

Recent statements by Huerta have not been such as to indicate that he contemplated abandoning his power.

Mexicans prominent in the political, commercial and social life of the capital, have been joining in increasing strength, the army of fugitives.

Several foreigners other than British have taken the advice of Sir Lionel Carden, the British minister, to get out of what he regards as dangerous territory.

One of the theories suggested for any alliance Huerta may be able to make with Zapata is that, with the support of this chieftain, he may be able to hold back for many months the Constitutionalists from the north.

ONLY ONE PROPELLER NEEDED

Glenn Curtiss Demonstrates the Stability of America Single Motor—Carrying Tests.

Hammondsport, N. Y., July 6.—Glenn Curtiss made a test flight in the trans-Atlantic flying boat America with only one motor running. The machine flew steadily and little adjustment of the rudder and aileron was required to offset the torque of the single propeller.

It had been held by many that should one motor stop while the machine was in flight it would be necessary immediately to shut down the other in order to avoid overturning the craft, but Mr. Curtiss flew with first one propeller stopped and then the other without affecting the machine's balance enough to be noticed by the crowd watching the flight.

"She will fly strong with the pilots and 12 hours fuel," said Curtiss after the flight.

The load carried was approximately 1,500 pounds, which is equal to nearly 20 hours' fuel and the pilots.

Cup Comes to America.

Henley on Thames, July 6.—The coveted Grand Challenge cup comes to the United States with the defeat of the crews of Great Britian by the Union Boat Club of Boston and the second crew of Harvard University.

"America" Carries 5,000 Pounds.

Hammondsport, N. Y., July 6.—The America, the flying boat built for Rodman Wanamaker, made several flights piloted by Glenn H. Curtiss, carrying the heaviest loads with which she has so far been burdened. The gross weight of the machine on one flight was more than 5,000 pounds. The weight of the so-called "useful load" was estimated at more than 2,100 pounds. On this flight Curtiss carried seven passengers. Dr. A. F. Zahm of the Smithsonian institution was among those given a ride.

ST. PAUL IS HOST TO N. E. A. THRONGS

CONVENTION MET SATURDAY BUT REGULAR SESSIONS BEGIN TODAY.

TO DISCUSS MANY PROBLEMS

Educators of Entire Country Bending Their Energies Towards Improving Conditions Throughout the United States—Closes July 11.

St. Paul, July 6.—Hundreds of teachers, representing every state in the union are here attending the fifty-second annual convention of the National Education association. The throngs which had poured in up to Sunday night were greatly added to today, when the regular session opened. The convention closes July 11.

The meeting of the national council took place Saturday. Educational Sunday was observed yesterday.

Convention Is Divided.

The convention is divided into departments of kindergarten, elementary education, secondary education, higher education, normal school, business education, physical education, science education, special education, school patrons and classroom teachers.

Dr. Joseph Swain, president of Swarthmore college and of the National Education association, explained what the program will include and the important question to come up.

Session for Women.

Tonight the discussion at the general session will be "The Status of Woman." In all the history of the N. E. A., Dr. Swain said, there has never been a session devoted specifically to the interests of woman. This time such problems as the training of women for social responsibilities, the social waste of sex discrimination, the humanities old and new and the preparation of women for Twentieth century life, will be discussed by four women high in educational circles.

Mrs. Lois Kimball Mathews, dean of women at the University of Wisconsin; Sophonsiba Preston Breckenridge, assistant professor of social economy in the University of Chicago; Emma M. Perkins, professor of Latin at the Western Reserve university, and Mary E. Wooley, president of Mount Holyoke college, will be the speakers.

Topic For Tuesday.

The topic of teachers' salaries and pensions will be taken up at the session Tuesday afternoon. This session will be addressed by Margaret A. Haley, business representative of the Chicago Teachers' federation, on the topic, "Present Salaries of Teachers;" Charles W. Dabney, president of the University of Cincinnati, will talk on "Salaries of College Teachers." Grace C. Strachan, district superintendent of schools, Brooklyn, N. Y., will speak on "Salaries Based on the Position and Not on the Sex of Incumbent," and Walter I. Hamilton, agent for the Massachusetts board of education, will talk on "Teachers' Pensions."

Normal Temperatures This Week.

Washington, July 6.—Temperatures averaging near normal over the entire country, with local rains fairly well distributed, are forecasted by the weather bureau for this week. "A disturbance that is now over the Northwest," the bulletin adds, "will move slowly eastward, crossing the eastern states about Wednesday, attended by rising temperatures and local showers and thunder storms. This will be followed by a change to cooler weather over the Northern states east of the Rocky mountains."

FOUR ARE KILLED IN ANARCHISTS' DEN

NEW YORK POLICE BELIEVE BOMB PLANT HAS BEEN DESTROYED.

THINK EXPLOSION ACCIDENTAL

Friends of Victims Charge Murder, However—Much Inflammatory Literature Gives Officers Clew to Work on.

New York, July 7.—In the ruins of the Lexington avenue tenement house, wrecked Saturday by the premature explosion of a powerful bomb which killed Arthur Caron and three other persons, the authorities have found evidence that Caron's apartment was a center for the distribution of inflammatory literature which was printed there and that at the time of the explosion it was apparently a bomb factory, filled with the ingredients of death dealing missles. A small printing press, revolutionary pamphlets and circulars, an electric dynamo, two electric batteries, cartridges and bits of steel, were among the articles uncovered which tend, in the opinion of the police, to show an anarchistic plot at assassination.

Theory of Police.

That a demonstration, halted by the bungling of some one who was preparing an infernal machine for its mission, was planned against the Rockefeller family in Tarrytown, is the theory upon which the authorities are working.

Two of those killed in the wrecked apartment were prominent agitators who were to be placed on trial at Tarrytown today on charges of disorderly conduct in connection with the campaign of demonstration inaugurated against John D. Rockefeller, Jr., as a protest against his attitude in the Colorado coal mine strike.

The body of the fourth victim of the explosion has just been found. It is that of Chas. Berger, known in I. W. W. circles as "the big Swede," an associate of Caron. The other victims were Chas. Hanson and Mary Claves.

The woman lived in an apartment next to the one occupied by Caron and his associates.

Identification of Berger's body was made by Louise Berger, step-sister of Hanson, who lived in the flat where the explosion occurred.

Not An I. W. W.

Equally as interesting as the discovery of anarchistic literature and electrical machinery in the ruins of Caron's room, was the assertion by I W. W. leaders that Caron was not a member of that organization, having recently been refused admission.

They declared that the I. W. W. had nothing to do with the explosion. Why Caron was denied a place among the workers was a point they did not make clear.

A gruesome but suggestive piece of evidence was a severed hand which clutched two small pieces of wire made ready for connections. The authorities believe that the owner of this hand was in the act of making an electric connection for one of the bombs and a battery when the explosion occurred and he was blown to pieces.

Attack on Christianity.

The search for papers and notes was minute and some note books with the names of several anarchists were found, but the police would not say any of them was important as documentary evidence of a plot. There were also pamphlets which had been sold at I. W. W. meetings. One poem, a vitriolic attack on Christianity is believed to have been on the little press.

Louise Berger declared that the three men who died in the explosion were murdered. She made this statement as she was being taken from the morgue, where she had identified Berg's body, to a police station for further questioning.

"Those boys were murdered, I know they were," she said.

Asked if she would continue her membership in the anti-militarist association, she replied:

"Why, of course. Why shouldn't I. Do they think that by killing some of our members they can destroy our organization. Well, they can't, nor will I rest until I have run down the murderers of my brother and the other boys."

Aged Woman Kills Robber.

Yorkville, Ill., July 6.—A dramatic story of a fight to the death in the dark with a masked robber who invaded their home, was told here by Mr. and Mrs Joseph Grimwood, an old couple who live on a farm two miles east of here. The robber died as she was throttling him, Mrs. Grimwood said, after he had been thrown to the floor by her husband. She is a large and powerful woman, although 65 years old.

Hunting for Revolver Used.

Freeport, N. Y., July 6.—While Mrs. Edwin Carman was in Hempstead viewing the body of Mrs. Louise Bailey, the Long Island matron killed by a shot fired through a window in Dr. Carman's office here last Tuesday night, detectives under instructions of District Attorney Smith were pumping out a cess pool and a well in the rear of the physician's residence and a cess pool in the cellar. In one of these three places the detectives expected to find a 38-calibre revolver containing one exploded shell.

MOULDS FATAL TO POULTRY

One Great Cause of Large Number of Deaths Among Poultry, and Particularly Among Chicks.

(By H. L. KEMPSTER, Missouri Experiment Station.)

Mouldy litter in poultry houses and mouldy feed are the cause of a large number of deaths among poultry and particularly among chicks. These moulds taken into the body of the fowl cause a disease known as Aspergillosis. The disease is as fatal as the name sounds. Our scientists have neglected to find a shorter name for the disease, but among poultrymen chicks affected with the trouble are commonly spoken of as "lungers." Many times the disease is mistaken for white diarrhoea. The Missouri college of agriculture, in its investigation of poultry diseases, notes the following characteristic symptoms: The chick stands around in a drowsy manner and shows little desire to eat. The wings hang down, the breath is rapid and a white diarrhoea is present.

An affected chick will be found to have soft, yellow growths from the size of a pinhead to that of a pea, mainly in the lungs, but sometimes in the intestines and mesentery. These growths, clogging the air passages of the lungs, are directly responsible for the death of affected birds.

In mature fowls there are two forms of the disease. The mucous membrane lining the air-sacs and tubes may be covered with a membranous formation which is soft and yellowish and has an offensive odor, or the post mortem will reveal white or yellowish nodules imbedded in the tissues of the lungs.

Early symptoms are that the bird is inactive, sleepy and if forced to run, will fall from exhaustion; breathing is rapid, appetite is diminished and more or less catarrh is present.

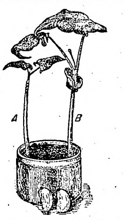
There is no cure for the trouble, but since it is caused by eating mouldy feed or by being permitted access to mouldy litter, it can be entirely prevented by not compelling fowls to eat mouldy food and by keeping them away from mouldy litter.

This is just one of the many poultry troubles that can be entirely avoided by feeding nothing but fresh, clean feed and keeping the pens and yards free from filth and moulds.

MUCH PLANT FOOD IN SEEDS

Interesting Experiment May Be Had by Planting Beans and Watching Development of Plants.

Much of the food of very young plants comes from the seeds to which they are attached. To prove this, plant two beans in a tin can containing sandy soil; water and keep in a warm, light place. Soon after the beans push above ground take a sharp-pointed knife and carefully cut off the two half beans without injuring the rest of the plant. Allow the plants to grow for a week or two and note the more rapid development of the plant to which the half beans are attached.



Experiment With Beans.

The illustration shows beans planted in rich black earth on the same day. Both plants came up on the same day. The half beans were then removed from one. The other, it will be seen, grew faster because the half beans furnished food.

TIME FOR CUTTING CLOVER

With Good Weather Hay Should Be Left in the Windrow Over Night and Turned the Next Day.

Clover for hay should be cut as soon as the first blossoms begin to turn brown, and the hay should be cured in the shade. After the clover has been cut, it should be turned with a tedder as soon as the leaves in the upper part of the swath are well wilted. Before the leaves and stems become dry and stiff, the hay should be raked into windrows. This will shade most of the hay and allow a good circulation of air through it. Clover cured in the windrow does not get stiff like that exposed to the sun in the swath for a day or two. With good weather the hay should be left in the windrow over night and turned a time or two the next forenoon. It should then be ready for the stack the second afternoon. Cured in this way the stems are soft and pliable and much natural moisture is retained in the leaves.

Powdery Mildew.

Powdery mildew is likely to be very bad on young cherry trees, particularly those growing in the nursery row. Such trees should be sprayed three or four times with bordeaux mixture 2-3-50 or either of the lime-sulphurs.

MAIMED BODY FOUND IN LAKE

RAILWAY CLERK EVIDENTLY KILLED SEVERAL DAYS AGO.

Bullet Wound Through Lungs and Battered Head Give Evidence of Struggle—Robbery Possibly the Cause.

Minneapolis.—With an ugly bullet wound through the lungs and the head battered and crushed, the body of Alfred Moore, 50 years old, chief clerk of the freight department of the Dan Patch railroad, was found in Lake of the Isles, off West Twenty-first street.

Coroner Seashore conducted an autopsy at the county morgue, reserved his verdict and indicated that an inquest would be held later. City detectives working on the case report little progress.

The skull was fractured over the left ear, teeth on the lower left jaw were knocked out, front teeth of the upper jaw were loosened, and the nose and left eye were discolored and bruised. A bullet wound in the left breast would have been sufficient to cause death, Dr. Seashore said. There were no powder marks near the wound.

Moore came to Minneapolis a year ago from England, leaving his wife there until he was sure of success in this country.

Moore was last seen alive by friends Saturday noon when he left the company's offices to attend a picnic at Antlers park, given by employes of the road. He did not appear at the picnic. Relatives and friends became alarmed Monday and notified the police.

A watch found in the dead man's clothing stopped at 10:25. Mrs. E. E. Easthagen told Charles S. Barnard, police sergeant, she heard cries for help coming from the lake Saturday night.

Patrolman W. L. Hartley of the park police found Moore's purse in a vest pocket, torn almost in two, and empty. Eleven cents were in a trousers pocket. Oscar Moore said his brother had considerable money on his person.

Detectives searched for a revolver in the lake near the body, but found none. They have tried to trace Moore's movements after he left his office Saturday, but have accomplished little.

RINES ALLEGES COUNT ERROR

Prepares Petition for Recount of Votes Cast in Primary for State Auditor.

Mora.—Petition for a recount of the vote for the republican nomination for state auditor has been prepared by Henry Rines and filed in district court before Judge P. H. Stolberg.

The papers include an order to Julius A. Schmahl, secretary of state, and J. A. O. Preus, certified as the nominee, to show cause why the vote should not be recounted. Judge Stolberg is to fix a date for the hearing.

Mr. Rines alleges that there were numerous errors in the official count, particularly with regard to the second choice, that many first choice votes placed in the second choice column were not counted as they should have been and that second choice votes were incorrectly tabulated.

Mr. Rines has gone to the Twin Cities to make further inquiries into the vote.

SORTER HEADS DEMOCRATS

Harmony at Conference That Selects Minneapolis Man as Chairman.

St. Paul.—Harmony was the predominating feature of the Democratic state conference at the state capitol.

A. L. Sorter of Minneapolis was made chairman. Martin O'Brien was named vice chairman and R. A. Hartigan of St. Paul secretary. Former State Senator S. D. Works was named treasurer. Senator Works was active in the harmony program, which was a feature of the gathering.

Certain trouble in the Democratic ranks was early dispersed when Chairman Sorter was introduced by Martin O'Brien. Mr. Sorter, in a happy talk of 10 minutes paid his compliments to the nominee and predicted success to the state ticket. Mr. Sorter, who in a way is unknown in state politics, surprised the gathering with his telling and happy speech.

Ask Treaty Enforcement.

Bemidji.—Thirty business and professional men organized an 1855 Treaty Enforcement league, with J. J. Opsahl president and Harry Reynolds, secretary and treasurer. Funds are being raised to carry on a campaign for the enforcement of the treaty. Petitions signed by 400 residents ask that saloons be closed. These have been forwarded to the Indian department. Many women are working for the success of the movement.

Freeborn County Crop Outlook.

Albert Lea.—Weather Observer Edward Cary of this city reports that more than 9 inches of rainfall was recorded last month—nearly twice the amount that usually falls. In spite of this excessive rainfall the crops all over the county are looking fine. Small grain is standing well. Some of the corn has been lodged by heavy wind, but it is thought most of it will straighten up again. The potato crop, of which there is a larger acreage this season, is looking exceptionally well. Few bugs are reported.

STATE ASKS "FIRE BREAK"

Great Northern Requested to Provide Safeguard for Forests on Fosston Branch.

Minneapolis.—Following the lead of the federal government in requiring railroads to establish a "fire break" of 250 feet along their rights of way through national forests, the state forestry board will make an effort to obtain similar protective measures in the timber belt of Minnesota. The first attempt will be made on the Fosston branch of the Great Northern road to induce that line to emulate the Soo through the Minnesota national forest.

Before the Soo Line was permitted to construct its Duluth-Red Lake Falls short line through the national forest about Cass Lake, the road was required to provide a "fire break" 250 feet in width through the entire reserve.

The "break" consists of a strip of 100 feet on each side of the track kept entirely bare of trees and undergrowth and beyond this zone a strip of plowed ground on each side twenty-five feet in width.

The federal government is not in position to enforce this plan with reference to the Great Northern, which also runs through the forest as the latter road had a right of way before the national forest was created.

Although the United States is helpless, Minnesota will endeavor by moral suasion and otherwise to place the Great Northern on equality with the Soo in the matter of protecting the forest.

PASTORS OUSTED BY COURT

T. J. and H. J. Strand Will Appeal to Supreme Court, However, in Effort to Resist Dismissal.

Albert Lea.—The adjourned term of the district court was called in this city by Judge Kingsley of Austin and one of the church cases involving Rev. T. J. Strand is up for hearing.

An action to determine who were the legally elected trustees of the West Freeborn Norwegian congregation commonly known as the Manchester church, was tried last March. The court decided that the so-called anti-Strand forces constituted the congregation and that their trustees were the legally elected ones. A stay of proceedings, however, was granted until July 1. Under this stay T. J. Strand and his followers have remained in possession of the church, burial ground and parsonage.

An application was made a few days ago to extend the stay pending an appeal to the supreme court. This motion was heard. The court refused to extend the stay and judgment will now be entered ousting the Strand trustees and seating the legally elected trustees of the congregation. This ends the cases, so far as the district court is concerned, against the two brothers, T. J. Strand and H. J. Strand, pastors of the five Freeborn county churches, as both have now been ousted by the court decisions. Steps are being taken by the Strand forces to appeal.

Home Folks Honor Lee.

Long Prairie.—A sport program, addresses of congratulation and a dance concluded the celebration tendered William E. Lee, Republican gubernatorial nominee, by home folks. Addresses were made by Fred Sherman, state immigration commissioner; Charles Kroonze, Long Prairie; J. W. McKellip, Round Prairie; R. H. Gardner, Staples; E. V. Moore, Eagle Bend;; Fred Moosman, Birchdale township; W. O. Clure, one of Lee's managers. Mr. Lee's response assured the voters of a business administration, if elected. Special trains brought large crowds to the celebration.

Eberhart on Lecture Tour.

St. Paul.—Minnesota will be without a governor at the capitol during this month and August. Governor A. O. Eberhart has accepted the offer of the Redpath-Vawter bureau to fill the Chautauqua dates arranged for former Governor Joseph D. Folk of Missouri. He will receive $3,000 for the lectures. Attorney General Lyndon A. Smith is studying the law to determine just what authority J. A. A. Burnquist, lieutenant governor, will have in the interregnum. The constitution says that the lieutenant governor becomes the chief executive of the state in the event of a vacancy.

Ortonville Crops Flourishing.

Ortonville.—The prospect for a big crop of small grain in this section, especially in Big Stone, Lac qui Parle, Swift and Stevens counties was never better. The lowlands are partially covered with water, but the acreage which will suffer will be very small. Corn will be a good crop. Rye, wheat and barley are heading out. Alfalfa, timothy and clover fields are flourishing far beyond expectation.

Old Plainsman Takes Bride.

Minneapolis. — Captain Jack Hart, former plainsman, government scout and secret service agent, is married. His bride is Miss Raye Thomas of Chicago. The ceremony was performed at the home of a Baptist minister, whose name Captain Jack has forgotten. The couple began their honeymoon with a trip to a cottage on Phelps island, Lake Minnetonka. Captain Hart is 67 years old. His bride is near the same age. They have known each other for five years and have been engaged for one year.

BRAINERD CITY CLERK ROBBED

Three Desperadoes Beat Official and Rob Vault of $1,388—Search Is General.

Brainerd.—Three desperadoes who beat V. N. Roderick, city clerk of Brainerd to unconsciousness and then robbed the city vault of $1,388, are being sought by squads of police at many points throughout the state. The bandits are believed to have boarded a train for Minneapolis immediately after the crime.

Roderick was alone in the office at 10 p. m. Monday, when the robbers entered and attacked him. One man turned out the lights and the others beat him with a club.

He was stunned and knocked to the floor. He had opened the vault doors and the robbers had no difficulty in getting the cash, which was in a money drawer. Checks were thrown away.

The bandits searched Roderick's clothing, but did not take the small change they found there.

As the bandits fled from the building, Roderick regained consciousness for a few moments. He called the police and told of the robbery and then fell unconscious to the floor. The telephone operator who answered his call heard him fall.

Posses were immediately organized. Five suspects were arrested within a few hours, but none of them is believed to be of the bandit trio. Shortly after the robbery two men were seen riding on a switch engine toward the roundhouse and shops on the outskirts of the city. There the men are believed to have boarded an outgoing train for Minneapolis.

Of the amount stolen $1,130 was in bills, $220 in gold and the remainder in silver.

DAN PATCH LINE EXTENDED

Lease From Chicago Great Western Gives Electric Road 87 Miles of Additional Track.

Northfield.—The Dan Patch line is in possession today of the 50-year operating rights over the Chicago Great Western road from Northfield to Mankato and Randolph. The 40-mile length of road that the Dan Patch management operated last year, with gross receipts of $4,615 a mile, or total gross earnings of $190,000, was increased by leases to 127 miles. As rapidly as possible, new operating schedules will be perfected.

The Dan Patch line proper, on its own mileage, operates from Fifty-fourth street, Minneapolis, to Northfield, and on Great Western mileage beyond Northfield to Faribault. Its entry last year into Faribault increased its traffic materially.

The Chicago Great Western road strikes south with its main line through Randolph, which is 10 miles east of Northfield. Its line from Randolph eastward to Red Wing and the Mississippi river is not affected, but from Randolph westward, through Northfield, it has 67 miles of road to Mankato which is the portion of the Great Western system that the Dan Patch has leased.

Posts Letter; Calls Firemen.

St. Paul.—It's quite proper for any person to insert a letter in a mail box, but when some one attempts to insert a letter in a fire alarm box something is sure to be doing. Firemen had visions of a battle with flames yesterday when they sped to Fourth and Sibley streets. They found an embarrassed man near Patrolman McCormick. The man had tried to mail a letter in the alarm box.

PREDICT END OF THE WORLD

Virginia Finns See White-robed Angel and Believe It to Be a Warning.

Virginia.—The appearance of a "white-robed angel" in this city some days ago has been heralded throughout the northwest states by Finnish newspapers. Five residents say they saw the figure so clearly that the toes of its feet were discernible as it alighted on the socialist temperance hall. The Finns believe it is a warning of the second coming of Christ. Many residents firmly believe it appeared.

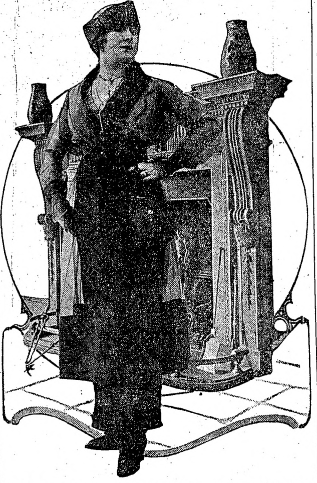
Egg Within an Egg.

Pipestone.—An egg that was discovered at the farm of William Roscoe, Sr., when dinner was being prepared, measured eight and three-fourths inches in circumference, and upon being opened was found to contain, instead of a yolk, another egg that was normal in every particular.

Sheriff Finds Hanging Body.

St. Cloud. — When Sheriff B. E. Schoener of this county reached Fred Schultz's home near Rockville to serve a warrant on the man for beating his divorced wife and driving her and the family from the house last night, he found Schultz's body hanging from a tree. The man had killed himself. Schultz and his wife were divorced this month and Mrs. Schultz was given the farm. The husband was committed to the asylum a year ago, but was discharged as cured.

The Last Word in Summer Gowns



JUST the zest that is added to all our afternoon assemblings by the enticing things that women think up to clothe themselves in simply cannot be estimated. And whether these creations are their own visions worked out in the products of the loom or are the inspirations of those whose profession is gown-making is of little importance. The important thing is the successful effect.

Here is a model from Gautier of Paris that shows how those familiar fabrics, taffeta and net, are set to the rhythm of the new modes as words to music. It is in black with the bodice over white figured net and a tunic of net finished with a broad band of silk about the bottom.

This is the style which has commanded the most attention for midsummer. The long sleeves of net, or chiffon, are featured in the majority of gowns, and a tunic of some sort is everywhere present. This dress is particularly cool looking and particularly comfortable.

The narrow plain skirt of taffeta is ankle length and finished at the bottom with a quilling of silk. There is a lapped seam in it down the front.

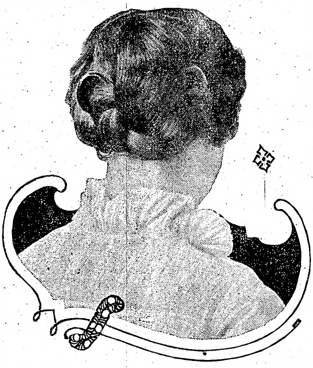
The tunic is rather full and the border of taffeta very wide. There is sufficient body and crispness in the taffeta border to hold the tunic out from the underskirt, and the transparency of net over the taffeta petticoat and the white bodice makes the charmingly cool effect which is the best aspect for a hot-weather costume.

There are narrow frills of net about the wrists and neck and a very new and cleverly arranged collar of taffeta which extends like a fichu about the neck, and crosses, surplice fashion, in front. It terminates at the back in a flat bow.

The simple little hat worn with this dress is of black moire and white lace. These are pretty items in the way of finishing touches to this noteworthy costume. The handbag is of moire, matching the hat. Bracelets set off the arms of the fair wearer, and one of them is worn above the elbow on the left arm.

The short skirt presupposes feet as carefully clothed as it is possible to have them. The stockings are plain black silk and the strapped slippers are decorated with tiny steel buckles.

New Arrangement of the Hair



A SIMPLE style for dressing the hair is pictured here. It employs the large shell hairpins that have met with growing favor this season, and dispenses with any other decoration.

The front hair is waved about the face for this style and parted at the left side in a long part extending from the crown of the head to the forehead. It is combed over the temples and lies in large waves about the face to the cheek, just in front of the ear, a little above the lobe.

At this point the hair is turned back and pinned at each side. Here it is all combed in together to make the back hairdressing.

For this the hair is parted in two strands and one of these is braided loosely, or twisted. This braid is coiled at the back around the remaining strand and pinned down to the head with wire pins. The remaining end is fluffed and pinned to the crown, with its ends thrust under the hair at the top crown. Small, invisible pins are placed in the waves at the front and wherever needed to keep the hair in place, for neatness must be featured in all the new styles of hairdressing.

The two large shell pins are ornamental but they also furnish a substantial support in keeping the hair in place.

This coiffure does not set so close to the head at the back as it appears to in the photograph. The fluffed strand of hair which is drawn through the braided coil and fastened in at the top, is something like a long and broad puff. It extends beyond the back of the head about as far as the usual French twist.

ITCHED AND BURNED

Silverwood, Mich.—"My baby was about six months old when he first began to break out with little pimples on his head and face. Then they would run water and keep getting worse until his head was a regular sore eruption and water would run and stream from it and his face also. His whole body was affected. They were little white pimples which itched and burned something terrible. His clothing seemed to irritate him and it was almost impossible for him to sleep at night. They also disfigured him as they were on his face.

"We tried medicine but without success. The trouble must have lasted three or four weeks when I thought I would try the Cuticura Soap and Ointment. I would bathe him with warm water, as warm as he could stand and Cuticura Soap, then apply the Cuticura Ointment. The very first time that I did this it seemed to relieve him as he slept well and inside of two weeks he was completely healed." (Signed) Mrs. L. White, Jan. 29, 1914.

BY W. G. HUNT.

Entered as Second-class matter August 30 1905, at the post office at Sunbeam, Minn. under the Act of Congress of March 3, 1879

WHY WE WILL NOT SUPPORT O'NEILL.

We propose to place some cold facts before the farmers, and particulary the heavy ditch tax payers of eastern Pennington county, regarding Mr. O'Neill's drainage record, in the last session of the legislature and we shall place the facts from the records in cold type, and we make this offer to Mr. O'Neill; At any time we do not publish facts you can have free space in the SUNBEAM to call us a falsifier. We start out by publishing a resolution passed by the Holt Commercial Club, here it is. Read it and see how you ditch tax payers who have been taxed for uncompleted ditches would like to have a law of that kind passed.

"Whereas, it has come to our knowledge that unreasonable delays occur in the construction of drainage ditches and highways in the territory tributary to Holt, and particulary in portions of Mud Lake district, such delays being a great injustice, entailing material losses, and in many instances great hardships to the settlers whose lands are taxed for such improvements; and

Whereas, we believe that such delays, losses and hardships are directly due to the fact that, under the present drainage laws of this state, contractors have found it ridiculously easy to secure extensions of the time limit specified in their contracts; Therefore, be it

RESOLVED, That the Commercial Club of Holt does hereby express its strong disapproval of a system that permits such injustice to the tax paying land holders, and urges that the drainage laws be so amended at the next session of the legislature as to provide that no case shall any extension of any drainage or, roadmaking contract be granted without a public hearing first being had upon the application for such extension, due notice of such hearing to be given by the county auditor as in the case of preliminary hearing on original ditch petitions; that no extension shall be granted in any case if it be shown at such hearing that the contractor has not, in good faith, used his best efforts to fulfill such contracts properly within the time originally specified; that in all such cases wherein an extension is not granted, the penalty provided in the original contract shall be collected in full by the county in which the work was situated and the auditor shall credit all amounts so collected as penalty to the taxes assessed against lands which may have been damaged, or had their benefits delayed, by reason of the non-fulfillment of such contract; that the distribution of such money collected as penalty shall be decided by the county board, their findings to be based on the report of a committee of three persons to be appointed by such board, and whose duty it shall be to make a personal examination of all lands whose owners or holders may claim a share in the distribution of such money when collected."

Paul Marschalk, representative from Roseau county introduced a bill covering all the points named in the above resolution. The bill was referred to the committee on drainage of which Mr. O'Neill was chairman. Now let us see what has become of it. Mr. O'Neill had attorney W. J. Brown fix up the bill and redraft it. We do not blame Mr. Brown for doing this at all, as he was working for the interest of the N. W. Drainage Company, and of course was only representing the interests of his employers. The new substitute was passed after Mr. Brown had "fixed it" and is chapter 568 general laws of 1913, and after it was clipped and fixed it was all in favor of the drainage companies, instead of the farmers, and will remain a dead letter on the statute books. Can Mr. O'Neill deny that he requested Mr. Brown to fix this law and get it in proper form. Free space Mr. O'Neill to deny it in THE SUNBEAM. When the original bill was introduced we wrote Mr. O'Neill to urge its passage, and he wrote me he would do so. After the substitute was introduced we promptly roasted Mr. O'Neill and attorney Brown, and Mr. Brown and I had some correspondence regarding the matter at the time, but as we said before we do not blame attorney Brown as he was working as an honorable attorney should for the interests of his employers. But O'Neill was the representative of the farmers, and asked them for their support, and got it two years ago, and now he is asking for their support again, but he is not entitled to it, and should not have it.

Congressman Steenerson sailed out of the primary election with an overwhelming majority, and he did just right in staying at Washington and looking after the interest of the people, and they certainly looked after his interest at home as the record shows.

Some of the Hammond newspaper supporters claim that he will publicly indorse county option. We do not know how Mr. Hammond stands on this issue, but the people can be sure that if the next legislature passes a county option bill, that he will not veto it, as he is a true and honorable representative of the people.

Post cards for sale at this office.

The mosquitoes are something fierce this year.

These warm days are rushing the corn forward at a rapid rate.

Some of the farmers commenced haying this week, and more will be busy laying in their winter's supply next week.

The early sown grain is beginning to head out, but it is at least two weeks behind what it should be at this season of the year.

There is a big crop of all kinds of wild fruit this year, but the mosquitoes will get their share of blood while you are getting your share of berries.

The town is taking hold of the matter to fix up the landings to the Highlanding ferry, and as soon as they can employ men and teams to do the work this crossing will be put in good condition.

It was so warm yesterday that people were compelled to take to the shade. The thermometer registered 100 degrees in the shade, but we only have a few of them warm days in Northern Minnesota.

There is one strip of highway between the grades of ditch 47 and 53 that needs fixing badly, but the road overseer Halverson finds it nearly impossible to get men and teams to do the work.

There was a fairly good crowd attended the 4th of July picnic at James O'Brien's. G. Halverson delivered the oration of the day, to an appreciative audience. There was a large ball at the John Quirk hall during the afternoon and night. The Ben Szmienski band furnishing the music, and the crowd kept them busy until broad daylight in the morning.

We are devoting considerable space this week to publishing some of the record of D. P. O'Neil in the last legislature, and we shall continue to publish some more of it. Keep and read these articles for they will not be published twice. Remember that they are actual records from the legislature and not what we say, except some short comments.

We shall devote some space later on, and not much later on explaining to the farmers of Pennington county why they should not support Stenvick for Representative. Some of the record that he made as county attorney of Clearwater county will be published, and it will not be any roorback sent out on the eve of election, but hard cold facts. If the people continue to elect men of this kind to office, they have no kick coming on unjust laws.

There is some talk of trying to make the vote of P. C. Wold in the town of Highlanding unanimous. This would perhaps be a little difficult but P. C. will find that his neighbors will stand by him, regardless of party, for if we had had a man like him in the place of D. P. O'Neill in that last legislature, we will bet that the attorney for the N.W. Drainage Company would not have fixed that drainage law so as to give the Drainage Companies the turkey and the farmer tax payers the buzzard.

Our sympathy goes out to the farmers and tax payers on ditch 42, who have employed one of the best attorneys in northern Minnesota to defend their rights. But he is powerless to do much for them, as he is met by that damnedable amended law, fixed up by attorney Brown and D. P. O'Neill, instead of having the just law, as published in another column to back him up. If Mr. Lorien had that law, as the bill was introced by Paul Marschalk behind him, those ditch contractors and bonding companies on ditch 42 would hear something drop.

The weather has cooled down to-day with a prospect of rain.

The Young People's Society will meet at Pete Gustafsons next Sunday, July 12th.

The teams on ditch 53 were compelled to stop work yesterday afternoon on account of the excessive heat.

M. G. Thoreson has got in a large stock of woven fence wire, which he is selling at reasonable prices.

We enjoy experimenting on the different crops in this locality, and we find that this is a first class country for beans, and no farmer should be paying six cents a pound for this staple article.

Mr. Blake is doing some good work on ditch 53, digging out the branches and grading the roads. It is dreadful warm to work horses and men in the timber through which he is working now, but he is crowding the work as fast as possible under the circumstances.

T. S. Jacobson is certainly having his share of bad luck by loosing young cattle, spring calves. He has had six of them die with some strange disease this summer. They were all in fine condition, when taken sick, and no remedy seemed to do them any good. The state veterinary will undoubtedly be called to investigate, if there are any further losses of cattle in the neighborhood.

NOTICE

Notice is hereby given that the firm of Halverson and Thoreson, of Highlanding, Minn., is this day dissolved by mutual consent. All accounts due said firm are payable to M. G. Thoreson, and all bills due from said firm are to be paid by M. G. Thoreson.

The Origin of Algebra.

If Diophantus of Alexandria, fourth century of the Christian era, was not the inventor of algebra, then it is not known to whom the honor belongs. To Diophantus the honor is generally given. The Arabians claim that the invention belongs to one of their countrymen, Mohammed Ben-Musa, who flourished about the middle of the ninth century. Certain it is that the Arabians introduced algebra to Europe by way of Italy through Leonardo, a merchant of Pisa, who had lived among the Arabs of Barbary. Leonardo's treatise was written in 1202.

SEIZE YOUR OPPORTUNITY.

Get Out and Hunt For It if It Doesn't Knock at Your Door.

Lots of fellows have overlooked an opportunity simply because they were too close to it.

Don't be like the sick man who heard of the curative properties of the waters of Carlsbad and went there to take them. After he arrived he consulted a physician who carefully diagnosed his case and then told him that his particular ailment would respond better to the waters of a certain spring in America. "Which spring?" asked the patient. "One of the springs in Saratoga," replied the doctor. "That's certainly tough!" said the sufferer. "I live in Albany."

If you're made of the right stuff you'll find plenty of room to create something for yourself in the job you've got. You can grow just as big there as you can in something of your own building.

They say that opportunity knocks once at every man's door. I don't know the name of the scientist who managed to get such a fine line on the habits of opportunity, but if opportunity does announce itself the chances are that it misses many a door, and in some cases when it does knock I presume "there's nobody at home."

My impression is that opportunity as a rule doesn't knock at all—or very rarely. Opportunity consists of thinking, doing, having plenty of patience and perseverence, possessing the ability to size up a situation and having the nerve and willingness to take advantage of it.—Maurice Switzer in Leslie's.

Not Used to Wholesale Business.

A small party of prospective investors were on a tour of inspection in the oil fields. Having smoked all the cigars previously provided by the agent who conducted the party, they all went into the one store of the village to get a fresh supply. An awkward clerk came up to wait on them. The cigar stock consisted of a limited assortment of stogies, "two-fers," and one box of a supposedly extra choice brand that sold for 5 cents each. The host of the party looked over the stock and said, "I suppose you sell six of of these nickel cigars for a quarter?"

The clerk took on a puzzled look, scratched his head and drawled: "Waal, I dunno. We never sold six to any one man."—Indianapolis News.

Ends of the Earth.

If you stand at the north pole you can look in only one direction—south. No matter how you may twist around on your heels, it is always toward the south that your eyes are directed. North as a terrestrial direction has vanished. You have arrived at the end of north. You are "where it lives." Or else we may say that north has suddenly sprung into the sky and is now at an unattainable distance directly over your head. A moment before your foot touched the pole north was straight ahead of you, and you had all the four cardinal points to choose from—east, west, north and south. Now three of them have vanished and south alone remains. The reverse is true at the south pole, where all directions on the earth's surface are alike north. In view of these facts we may speak of the north and south poles as the "ends of the earth." They are the two turning points, arrived at either one of which there is no choice left but to start toward the other.—New York Journal.

English Laws on Finding.

Judge Atherley Jones stopped a case against a man and his son charged with "stealing by finding" a rug which the younger defendant picked up after it had blown off a motorcar. The judge, in directing the jury to return a verdict of not guilty, said that the law with regard to finding property, although there was a popular superstition that finding was keeping, was very clear. If a person found an article it was his duty to preserve it, and, if he had any reason to suppose that it belonged to a certain person, it became his duty to go to that person to make inquiries in order to ascertain. But otherwise there was no actual duty upon him to take it to a police station. It was probably a prudent course, but the police had no greater right to the article than the person who found it.—London Times.

Pretty Bad.

The barber was very busy and the shop was full of men waiting for him to practice his tonsorial art upon their heads and faces.

One man, Mr. Blank, became tired of waiting for his turn to come and started to leave. Although his beard had come out pretty heavy, he thought no one could notice it and that he could come back the next morning when Hughes, the barber, was not so busy. The barber, not wishing a customer to go away unattended to, accosted him by saying, "You're not leavin' us, is you, Mr. Blank?"

"Why, I don't need a shave, do I, Hughes?"

Hughes thereupon looked his customer over critically and answered him assuredly: "No, youse don't need a shave; all youse need is a hair cut on de face."—National Monthly.

"Going to England."

The Isle of Wight inhabitants are not alone in speaking of "going to England" when they leave their own fragment of the kingdom. A patriotic Cornishman also "goes to England" when he crosses the Tamar. Similarly inhabitants of the Balkan peninsula talk of "going to Europe" when they leave their own corner of the continent—in curious contrast with the people of our own island. We regard ourselves as both of and in "Europe," and accordingly it is only "the continent" that we visit. The record in the splendid isolation line is probably held by that minister of the Cumbraes, in the Clyde, who prayed for a blessing upon "the inhabitants of Great and Little Cumbrae and the adjacent islands of Great Britain and Ireland."—London Mirror.

The Hollow of Her Hand

He did not once interrupt her. All the time she was speaking he was studying the profile of her face as if fascinated by its strange immobility. For the matter of a full half-hour he sat on the rail, his back against a post, his arms folded across the breast of the thick ulster he wore, staring at her, drinking in every word of the story she told. A look of surprise crept into his face when she came to the point where the thought of marrying Hetty to the brother of her victim first began to manifest itself in her designs. For a time the look of incredulity remained, to be succeeded by utter scorn as she went on with the recital. Her reasons, her excuses, her explanations for this master stroke in the way of compensation for all that she had endured at the hands of the scornful Wrandalls, all of whom were hateful to her without exception, stirred him deeply. He began to understand the forces that compelled her to resort to this Machiavellian plan for revenge on them. She admitted everything: her readiness to blight Hetty's life forever; her utter callousness in laying down these ugly plans; her surpassing vindictiveness; her reflections on the triumph she was to enjoy when her aims were fully attained. She confessed to a genuine pity for Hetty Castleton from the beginning, but it was outweighed by that thing she could only describe as an obsession! . . . How she hated the Wrandalls! . . . Then came the real awakening: when the truth came to her as a revelation from God. Hetty had not been to blame. The girl was innocent of the one sin that called for vengeance so far as she was concerned. The slaying of Challis Wrandall was justified! All these months she had been harboring a woman she believed to have been his mistress as well as his murderess. It was not so much the murderess that she would have foisted upon the Wrandalls as a daughter, but the mistress! . . . She loved the girl, she had loved her from that first night. Back of it all, therefore, lay the stern, unsuspected truth: from the very beginning she instinctively had known this girl to be innocent of guile. . . . Her house of cards fell down. There was nothing left of the plans on which it had been constructed. It had all been swept away, even as she strove to protect it against destruction, and the ground was strewn with the ashes of fires burnt out. . . . She was shocked to find that she had even built upon the evil spot! . . . Almost word for word she repeated Hetty's own story of her meeting with Challis Wrandall, and how she went, step by step and blindly, to the last scene in the tragedy, when his vileness, his true nature was revealed to her. The girl had told her everything. She had thought herself to be in love with Wrandall. She was carried away by his protestations. She was infatuated. (Sara smiled to herself as she spoke of this. She knew Challis Wrandall's charm!) The girl believed in him implicitly. When he took her to Burton's inn it was to make her his wife, as she supposed. He had arranged everything. Then came the truth. She defended herself. . . .

"I came upon her in the road on that wild night, Brandon, at the place I pointed out. Can you picture her as I have described her? Can you picture her despair, her hopelessness, her misery? I have told you everything, from beginning to end. You know how she came to me, how I prepared her for the sacrifice, how she left me. I have not written to her. I cannot. She must hate me with all her soul, just as I have hated the Wrandalls, but with greater reason, I confess. She would have given herself up to the law long ago, if it had not been for exposing me to the world as her defender, her protector. She knew she was not morally guilty of the crime of murder. In the beginning she was afraid. She did not know our land, our laws. In time she came to understand that she was in no real peril, but then it was too late. A confession would have placed me in an impossible position. You see, she thought of me all this time. She loved me as no woman ever loved another. Was not I the wife of the man she had killed, and was not I the noblest of all women in her eyes? God! And to think of what I had planned for her!"

This was the end of the story.

The words died away in a sort of whimpering wail, falling in with the wind to be lost to his straining ears. Her head drooped, her arms hung limply at her side.

For a long time he sat there in silence, looking out over the darkening water, unwilling, unable indeed, to speak. His heart was full of compassion for her, mingling strangely with what was left of scorn and horror. What could he say to her?

At last she turned to him. "Now you know all that I can tell you of Hetty Castleton—of Hetty Glynn. You could not have forced this from me, Brandon. She would not tell you. It was left for me to do in my own good time. Well, I have spoken. What have you to say?"

"I can only say, Sara, that I thank God for everything," he said slowly. "For everything!"

"I thank God for you, for her and for everything. I thank God that she found him out in time, that she killed him, that you shielded her, that you failed to carry out your devilish scheme, and that your heart is very sore today."

"You do not despise me?"

"No. I am sorry for you."

Her eyes narrowed. "I don't want you to feel sorry for me."

"You don't understand. I am sorry for you because you have found yourself out and must be despising yourself."

"You have guessed the truth. I despise myself. But what could be expected of me?" she asked ironically. "As the Wrandalls would say, 'blood will tell.'"

"Nonsense! Don't talk like that! It is quite unworthy of you. In spite of everything, Sara, you are wonderful. The very thing you tried to do, the way you went about it, the way you surrender, makes for greatness in you. If you had gone on with it and succeeded, that fact alone would have put you in the class with the great, strong, virile women of history. It—"

"With the Medicis, the Borgias and—" she began bitterly.

"Yes, with them. But they were great women, just the same. You are greater, for you have more than they possessed: a conscience. I wish I could tell you just what I feel. I haven't the words. I—"

"I only want you to tell me the truth. Do you despise me?"

"Again I say that I do not. I can only say that I regard you with—yes, with awe."

"As one might think of a deadly serpent."

"Hardly that," he said, smiling for the first time. He crossed over and laid his hand on her shoulder. "Don't think too meanly of yourself. I understand it all. You lived for months without a heart, that's all."

"You put it very gently."

"I think I am right. Now, you've got it back, and it's hungry for the sweet, good things of life. You want to be happy. You want to love again and to be loved. You don't want to pitied. I understand. It's the return of a heart that went away long months ago and left an empty place that you filled with gall. The bitterness is gone. There is something sweet in its place. Am I not right?"

She hesitated. "If you mean that I want to be loved by my enemies, Brandon, you are wrong," she said clearly. "I have not been chastened in that particular."

"You mean the Wrandalls?"

"It is not in my nature to love my enemies. We stand on the same footing as before, and always shall. They understand me, I understand them. I am glad that my project failed, not for their sake, but for my own."

He was silent. This woman was beyond him. He could not understand a nature like this.

"You say nothing. Well, I can't ask you to understand. We will not discuss my enemies, but my friends. What do you intend to do in respect to Hetty?"

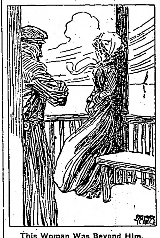
"I am going to make her my wife," he said levelly.

She turned away. It was now quite dark. He could not see the expression on her face.

"What you have heard does not weaken your love for her?"

"No. It strengthens it."

"You know what she has done. She has taken a life with her own hands. Can you take her to your bosom, can you make her the mother of your own children? Remember, there is blood on her hands."



This Woman Was Beyond Him.

"Ah, but her heart is clean!"

"True," she said moodily, "her heart is clean."

"No cleaner than yours is now, Sara."

She uttered a short, mocking laugh. "It isn't necessary to say a thing like that to me."

"I beg your pardon."

Her manner changed abruptly. She turned to him, intense and serious.

"She is so far away, Brandon. On the other side of the world, and she is full of loathing for me. How am I to regain what I have lost? How am I to make her understand? She went away with that last ugly thought of me, with the thought of me as I appeared to her on that last, enlightening day. All these months it has been growing more horrible to her. It has been beside her all the time. All these months she has known that I pretended to love her as—"

"I don't believe you know Hetty as well as you think you do," he broke in. "You forget that she loved you with all her soul. You can't kill love so easily as all that. It will be all right, Sara. You must write and ask her to come back. It—"

"Ah, but you don't know!" Then she related the story of the liberated canary bird. "Hetty understands. The cage door is open. She may return when she chooses, but—don't you see?—she must come of her own free will."

"You will not ask her to come?"

"No. It is the test. She will know that I have told you everything. You will go to her. Then she may understand. If she forgives she will come back. There is nothing else to say, nothing else to consider."

"I shall go to her at once," he said resolutely.

She gave him a quick, searching glance.

"She may refuse to marry you, even now, Brandon."

"She can't!" he cried. An instant later his face fell. "By Jove, I—I suppose the law will have to be considered now. She will at least have to go through the form of a trial."

She whirled on him angrily. "The law? What has the law to do with it? Don't be a fool!"

"She ought to be legally exonerated," he said.

Her fingers gripped his arm fiercely. "I want you to understand one thing, Brandon. The story I have told you was for your ears alone. The secret lives with us and dies with us."

He looked his relief. "Right! It must go no farther. It is not a matter for the law to decide. You may trust me."

"I am cold," she said. He heard her teeth chatter distinctly as she pulled her thick mantle closer about her throat and shoulders. "It is very raw and wet down here. Come!"

As she started off along the long, narrow pier, he sprang after her, grasping her arm. She leaned rather heavily against him for a few steps and then drew herself up. Her teeth still chattered, her arm trembled in his clasp.

"By Jove, Sara, this is bad," he cried, in distress. "You're chilled to the marrow."

"Nerves," she retorted, and he somehow felt that her lips were set and drawn.

"You must get to bed right away. Hot bath, mustard, and all that. I'll not stop for dinner. Thanks just the same. I will be over in the morning."

"When will you sail?" she asked, after a moment.

"I can't go for ten days, at least. My mother goes into the hospital next week for an operation, as I've told you. I can't leave until after that's over. Nothing serious, but—well, I can't go away. I shall write to Hetty tonight, and cable her tomorrow. By the way, I—I don't know just where to find her. You see, we were not to write to each other. It was in the bargain. I suppose you don't know how I can—"

"Yes, I can tell you precisely where she is. She is in Venice, but leaves there for Rome, by the Express."

"Then you have been hearing from her?" he cried sharply.
much: there has not been a day since she landed in England that I have not received news of her. I have not been out of touch with her, Brandon, not even for an hour."

"Good heaven, Sara! You don't mean to say you've had her shadowed by—by detectives," he exclaimed, aghast.

"Not directly. But I will say this "Her maid is a very faithful servant," was her ambiguous rejoinder.

CHAPTER XVIII.

Disturbing News.

He walked home swiftly through the early night, his brain seething with tumultuous thoughts. The revelations of the day were staggering; the whole universe seemed to have turned topsy-turvy since that devastating hour at Burton's inn. Somehow he was not able to confine his thoughts to Hetty Castleton alone. She seemed to sink into the background, despite the absolution he had been so ready, so eager to grant her on hearing the story from Sara's lips. Not that his resolve to search her out and claim her, in spite of everything was likely to weaken, but that the absorbing figure of Sara Wrandall stood out most clearly in his reflections.

What an amazing creature she was! He could not drive her out of his thoughts, even when he tried to concentrate them on the one person who was dearest to him of all in all the world, his warm-hearted, adorable Hetty. Strange contrasts suggested themselves to him as he strode along, head bent and shoulders hunched. He could not help contrasting the two women. He loved Hetty; he would always love her, [illegible]tive. She was Sara's superior in every respect, infinitely so, he argued. And yet there was something in Sara that could crowd this adored one, this perfect one out of his thoughts for the time being. He found it difficult to concentrate his thoughts on Hetty Castleton.

How white and ill Sara had looked when she said good night to him at the door! The memory of her dark, mysterious eyes haunted him; he could see them in the night about him. They had been full of pain; there were torrents of tears behind them. They had glistened as if burnished by the fires of fever.

Even as he wrote his long, triumphant letter to Hetty Castleton, the picture of Sara Wrandall encroached upon his mental vision. He could not drive it out. He thought of her as she had appeared to him early in the spring; through all the varying stages of their growing intimacy; through the interesting days when he vainly tried to translate her matchless beauty by means of wretched pigments; up to this present hour in which she was revealed, and yet not revealed, to him. Her vivid face was always before him, between his eyes and the thin, white paper on which he scribbled so eagerly. Her feverish eyes were looking into his; she was reading what he wrote before it appeared on the surface of the sheet!

His letter to Hetty was a triumph of skill and diplomacy, achieved after many attempts. He found it hard not to say too much, and quite as difficult not to say too little. He spent hours over this all-important missive. At last it was finished. He read and reread it, searching for the slightest flaw: a fatal word or suggestion that might create in her mind the slightest doubt as to his sincerity. She was sure to read this letter a great many times, and always with the view to finding something between the lines: such as pity, resignation, an enforced conception of loyalty, or even faith! He meant that she should find nothing there but love. It was full of tenderness, full of hope, full of promise. He was coming to her with a steadfast, enduring love in his heart, he wanted her now more than ever before.

There was no mention of Challis Wrandall, and but once was Sara's name used. There was nothing in the letter that could have betrayed their joint secret to the most acute outsider, and yet she would understand that he had wrung everything from Sara's lips. Her secret was his.

He decided that it would not be safe to anticipate the letter by a cablegram. It was not likely that any message he could send would have the desired effect. Instead of reassuring her, in all probability it would create fresh alarm.

Sleep did not come to him until after three o'clock. At two he got up and deliberately added a postscript to the letter he had written. It was in the nature of a poignant plea for Sara Wrandall. Even as he penned these lines, he shuddered at the thought of what she had planned to do to Hetty Castleton. Staring hard at the black window before him, the pen still in his hand, he allowed his thoughts to dwell so intimately on the subject of his well-meant postscript that her ashen face with its burning eyes seemed to take shape in the night beyond. It was a long time before he could get rid of the illusion. Afterwards he tried to conjure up Hetty's face and to drive out the likeness of the other woman, and found that he could not recall a single feature in the face of the girl he loved!

When he reached Southlook in the morning, he found that nearly all of the doors and windows were boarded up. Wagons were standing in the stable yard, laden with trunks and crates. Servants without livery were scurrying about the halls. There was an air of finality about their movements.

"Yes, sir," said Watson, in reply to his question, "we are in a rush. Mrs. Wrandall expects to close the 'ouse this evening, sir. We all go up this afternoon. I suppose you know, sir, we 'ave taken a new apartment in town."

"No!" exclaimed Booth.

"Yes, sir, we 'ave, sir. They've been decorating it for the pawst two weeks. Seems like she didn't care for the old one we 'ad. As a matter of fact, I didn't care much for it, either. She's taken one of them hexpensive ones looking out over the park, sir. You know we used to look out over Madison avenue, sir, and God knows it wasn't hinspirin'. Yes, sir, we go up this afternoon. Mrs. Wrandall will be down in a second, thank you, sir."

Booth actually was startled by her appearance when she entered the room a few minutes later. She looked positively ill.

"My dear Sara," he cried anxiously, "this is too bad. You are making yourself ill. Come, come, this won't do."

"I shall be all right in a day or two," she said, with a weary little gesture. "I have been nervous. The strain was too great, Brandon. This is the reaction you might say."

"Your hand is hot, your eyes look feverish. You'd better see your doctor as soon as you get to town. An ounce of prevention, you know."

"Well," she said, with a searching look into his eyes, "have you written to her?"

"Yes. Posted it at seven o'clock this morning."

"I trust you did not go so far as to—well, to volunteer a word in my behalf. You were not to do that, you know."

He looked uncomfortable. "I'm afraid I did take your name in vain," he equivocated. "You are a—a wonderful woman, Sara," he went on, moved to the remark by a curious influence that he could not have explained any more than he could have accounted for the sudden gush of emotion that took possession of him.

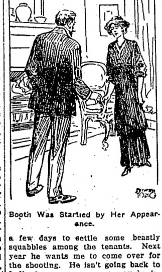
She ignored the tribute. "You will persuade her to come to New York with you?"

"For your sake, Sara, if she won't come for mine."

"She knows the cage is open," was her way of dismissing the subject. "I am glad you came over. I have a letter from Leslie. It came this morning. You may be interested in what he has to say of Hetty—and of yourself." She smiled faintly. "He is determined that you shall not be without a friend while he is alive."

"Les isn't such a rotter, Sara. He's spoiled, but he is hardly to be blamed for that."

"I will read his letter to you," she said, and there was no little significance in the way she put it. She held the letter in her hand, but he had failed to notice it before. Now he saw that it was a crumpled ball of paper. He was obliged to wait for a minute or two while she restored it to a readable condition. "He was in London when this was written," she explained, turning to the window for light. She glanced swiftly over the first page until she found the place where she meant to begin. "'I suppose Hetty Castleton has written that we met in Lucerne two weeks ago,'" she read. "'Curious coincidence in connection with it, too. I was with her father, Col. Braid Castleton, when we came upon her most unexpectedly. I ran across him in Paris just before the aviation meet, and got to know him rather well. He's a fine chap, don't you think? I confess I was somewhat surprised to learn that he didn't know she'd left America. He explained it quite naturally, however. He'd been ill in the north of Ireland and must have missed her letters. Hetty was on the point of leaving for Italy. We didn't see much of her. But, by Jove, Sara, I am more completely gone on her than ever. She is adorable. Now that I've met her father, who had the beastly misfortune to miss old Murgatroyd's funeral, I can readily see wherein the saying "blood will tell" applies to her. He is a prince. He came over to London with me the day after we left Hetty in Lucerne, and I had him in to meet mother and Vivian at Claridge's. They like him immensely. He set us straight on a good many points concerning the Glynn and Castleton families. Of course, I knew they were among the best over here, but I didn't know how fine they were until we prevailed on him to talk a little about himself. You will be glad to hear that he is coming over with us on the Mauretania. She sails the twenty-seventh. We'll be on the water by the time you get this letter. It had been our intention to sail last week, but the colonel had to go to Ireland for a few days to settle some beastly squabbles among the tenants. Next year he wants me to come over for the shooting. He isn't going back to India for two years, you may be interested to hear. Two years' leave. Lots of influence, believe me! We've been expecting him back in London since day before yesterday. I dare say he found matters worse than he suspected and has been delayed. He has been negotiating for the sale of some of his property in Belfast—factory sites, I believe. He is particularly anxious to close the deal before he leaves England. Had to lift a mortgage on the property, before he could think of making the sale. I staked him to four thousand pounds, to tide him over. Of course, he is eager to make the sale. 'Gad, I almost had to beg him to take the money. Terribly proud and haughty, as the butler would say. He said he wouldn't sleep well until he has returned the filthy lucre. We are looking for him back any hour now. But if he shouldn't get here by Friday, we will sail without him. He said he would follow by the next boat, in case anything happened that he didn't catch the Mauretania.'"



Booth Was Startled by Her Appearance.

Sara interrupted herself to offer an ironic observation: "If Hetty did not despise her father so heartily, I should advise you to look farther for a father-in-law, Brandon. The colonel is a bad lot. Estates in the north of Ireland! Poor Leslie!" She laughed softly.

"He'll not show up, eh?"

"Not a bit of it," she said. "He may be charged to profit and loss in Leslie's books. This part of the letter will interest you," she went on, as if all that had gone before was of no importance to him. "'I hear interesting news concerning you, my dear girl. My heartiest congratulations if it is all true. Brandy is one in a million. I have hoped all along to have him as a full-fledged brother-in-law, if that's the way you'd put it. Father writes that every one is talking about it, and saying what a fine thing it is. He has a feeling of delicacy about approaching you in the matter, and I fancy it's just as well until everything is settled. I wish you'd let me make a suggestion, however. Wouldn't it be wise to let us all get together and talk over the business end of the game? Brandy's a fine chap, a corker, in fact, but the question is: has he got it in him to take Challis' place in the firm? You've got to consider the future as well as the present, my dear. We all do. With his artistic temperament he might play hob with your interests, and ours too, for that matter. Wouldn't it be wise for me to sound him a bit before we take him into the firm? Forgive me for suggesting this, but, as you know, your interests are mine, and I'm terribly keen about seeing you get the best of everything. By the way, wasn't he a bit gone on Hetty? Passing fancy, of course, and not deep enough to hurt anybody. Good old Brandy!'"

"There is more, Brandon, but it's of no consequence," she said, tossing the letter upon the table. "You see how the land lays."

Booth was pale with annoyance. "By Jove, Sara, what an insufferable ass he is!"

"The shoe pinches?"

"Oh, it's such perfect rot! I'm sorry on your account. Have you ever heard of such gall?"

"Oh, he is merely acting as the family spokesman. I can see them now in solemn conclave. They think it their indisputable right to select a husband for me, to pass upon him, to accept or decline him as they see fit, to say whether he is a proper man to hang up his hat and coat in the offices of Wrandall & Co."

"Do you mean to say—"

"Let's not talk about it, Brandon. It is too silly."

They fell to discussing her plans for the immediate future, although the minds of both were at work with something else.

"Now that I have served my purpose, I suppose you will not care to see so much of me," she said, as he prepared to take leave of her.

"Served your purpose? What do you mean?"

"I should have put it differently. You have been most assiduous in your efforts to force the secret from me. It has been accomplished. Now do you understand?"

"That isn't fair, Sara," he protested. "If you'll let me come to see you, in spite of what the gossips and Mr. Redmond Wrandall predict, you may be sure I will be as much in evidence as ever. I suppose I have been a bit of a nuisance, hanging on as I have."

"I admire your perseverance. More than that, I admire your courage in accepting the situation as you have. I only hope you may win her over to your way of thinking, Brandon. Goodby."

"I shall go up to town tomorrow, kit and bag. When shall I see you? We have a great deal left to talk about before I sail."

"Come when you like."

"You really want me to come?"

"Certainly."

He studied her pale, tired face for a moment, and then shook his head. "You must take care of yourself," he said. "You are unstrung. Get a good rest and—and forget certains things if you can. Everything will come out all right in the end."

"It depends on what one is willing to accept as the end," he said.

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

Why She Mourned.

"Boo-hoo!" sobbed the lady.

"What are you crying about?" the man asked.

"You know the bread and the jelly I sent to the fair?"

"Yes. Didn't it take a prize? Well, cheer up—those judges—"

"But it did take a prize—they both took first prizes—boo-hoo!—"

"Well, what are you crying about?"

"The bread took first prize as the best specimen of concrete, and the jelly as the best china cement!"

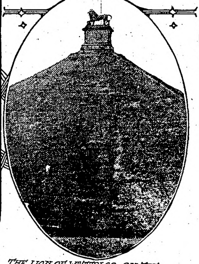
WHERE KING OF BOHEMIA FELL AT CRECY



THE LION OF WATERLOO—ON THE BATTLEFIELD

CRECY, a town of northern France, is famous in history for the great victory gained near by on August 26, 1346, by the English, under Edward III, over the French of King Philip of Valois. The first attack resulted in disaster for the French, who were driven back. The second attack was made by a large body of French knights who had arrived, and served only to increase the number of casualties of the French forces. A few of the more valorous charged up to the English line and fell near it. The blind king of Bohemia, with a party of devoted knights, succeeded in penetrating the English line, and the king was killed among the ranks of the prince of Wales' men-at-arms. The tablet in the illustration marks the spot where he fell, as near as can be told at the present time.

WHERE WALLACE GATHERED HIS HOSTS.

Wallace tower, Stirling, Scotland, marks a spot famous in Scottish history. It was here Wallace gathered the Scots for his greatest battle. Six centuries ago, when Robert Bruce was fighting for the throne of Scotland, the patriotic William Wallace led a royal army of Scots to the hill in preparation for a battle with the English under Surrey and Cressingham. Here they camped one September night in 1297 and the next day utterly defeated the English in an encounter at a bridge over the river. Up to that time the English forces of Edward I had had the advantage: Wallace's victory here turned the tide of fortune, and though he himself was afterward taken prisoner and put to death (1305), the splendid triumph of the Scots a few years later at Bannockburn (only three or four miles from here at the other side of Stirling) did secure the independence of the land. The memory of Wallace is dear to every lover of Scotland.

"While the great rock he watched from shall endure,
His monument is sure,
Build low—build high,
The great name cannot die."

GRAVE MOUND OF GREEK HEROES.

The Soros is the mound erected over the graves of 192 Athenians who fell in the battle of Marathon, August 12, B. C. 490. The mound is about forty feet high and 300 yards in circumference. Underneath the mound lie the heroes who died in this most decisive victory which prevented Persian influence from invading Europe.

The battle had hardly begun when the Persians, in immensely superior force, doubtless ten to one, pulled themselves together and by sheer mass broke through the Greek center. But this had been calculated upon beforehand. Miltiades employed strategy, making his line weak at the center, and allowed the Persians to break it. Then with his heavy masses at the ends he ground the Persian wings to pieces and fell upon the Persian center. The most stubborn fighting, apart from the battle at ships, was probably at this spot, half a mile from the shore. Six thousand four hundred Persian bodies lay on this plain and along the shore, while 192 men of Marathon lay wrapped in glory on this bloody field.

THE MASSACRE AT CAWNPORE.

A beautiful memorial was erected at Cawnpore, India, in memory of the women and children murdered by Nana Sahib in 1857. Perhaps the saddest, most pathetic incident in the entire history of the world is marked by this brooding angel. In the terrible Indian mutiny, half a century ago, 200 women and children who had escaped slaughter at the massacre of Cawnpore, were brought back by Nana Sahib, and were hacked to pieces here by professional butchers. The bodies were thrown into a well beneath that stone upon which the angel now stands. Her arms are folded, denoting resignation; she holds in her hands the martyr's palms. Around the well curb is inscribed, "Sacred to the perpetual memory of the great company of Christian people, chiefly women and children, who near this spot were massacred by the followers of the rebel Nana, and cast, the living with the dead, into the well below, on the 15th day of July, 1857."

THE LION OF CHAERONEA.

One of the illustrations shows the Lion of Chaeronea, which guards the graves of patriots who fell on Mt. Parnassus, Greece. 338 B. C.

A few years ago one traveled past this spot and saw only massive pieces of marble, evidently parts of a lion. The head lay with its muzzle upward; other fragments lay scattered about. There was never any doubt among intelligent Greeks that these were remains of a lion set up over the Thebans who fell in the battle on or near this spot, when the Thebans and Athenians made a last heroic struggle for the liberty of Greece, 338 B. C. All who honor a lost cause will bring their offerings to this sacred spot. The heroes who fought here did not propose to submit until they had done their utmost to save Greece from Macedonian Philip. The battle was fiercely contested, especially by the Thebans, who formed the right wing thrown out into the plain, resting on the Kephisos and facing west, while the Athenians at the other end of the line rested on the hills, one of which appears just behind the lion. The Macedonians were commanded by the veteran Antipater with the youthful Alexander by his side.

When after a stubborn fight, the Thebans were beaten, the Athenians were isolated and rolled up a loss of over a thousand slain. Demosthenes, the soul of the enterprise, fought in the ranks. In the enclosure where the lion now stands, 254 skeletons were found and carried to the Athenian museum. The lion is a funeral monument not only to the Theban dead, but to dead Greece. Greece remained a power by its art and literature, but the Macedonian and then the Roman were its rulers.

WHERE JOAN OF ARC WAS BURNED.

A slab in the sidewalk of the Place du Vieux Marche, Rouen, France, marks the spot where Joan of Arc was burned at the stake.

For a century and a half after the conquest (1066) this northern district belonged to England, by virtue of the sovereign's inheritance from William of Normandy. Rouen here was an English town. Then the French captured and held it until 1419, when it fell once more into French hands. While the inspired peasant girl, Jeanne d'Arc, was leading the French armies against the English, this was a stronghold of her enemies, and every victory she won made their hatred blacker. According to the old chronicles, she had premonitions that her mission for France was accomplished when she raised the siege of Orleans and secured the coronation of Charles VII at Rheims; but the king would not let her go back to private life.

In 1430 at Compiegne, she was taken prisoner by the Burgundian allies of the English, and by them sold to those against whom she had defended her country. It was in an old castle half a mile away behind us (the building itself is not now in existence), that she was tried for heresy and condemned to death as a witch; on the spot where the slab is set in the pavement (1431) she was burned at the stake.

THE LION OF WATERLOO.

The battle of Waterloo was one of the most important military engagements of all history. It was fought on June 18, 1815, between the allied forces of Great Britain, the Netherlands and Prussia, under General Wellington, and the army of France under Napoleon. This battle was the culmination of the campaign following the escape of Napoleon from his exile at Elba. Napoleon was defeated; he left the field in the center of a square "with a somber but calm countenance, his far-seeing glance probing futurity, and seeing that more than a battle had been lost that day."

On the 21st of June, three days after his defeat, Napoleon reached Paris, and the following day presented his abdication.

The huge statue shown in the illustration stands on a 200-foot mound in the center of the battlefield, about ten or twelve miles from the city of Brussels.

"How are things going with the football team?" the father asked, pretending to be seeking information. "The Cornell football team!" the young man exclaimed with all the disgust that he could put into his tones; "it has been beaten by everything except the Colonial Dames!"

HIT THE SPOT.
Postum Knocked Out Coffee Ails.

There's a good deal of satisfaction and comfort in hitting upon the right thing to rid one of the varied and constant ailments caused by coffee drinking.

"Ever since I can remember," writes an Ind. woman, "my father has been a lover of his coffee, but the continued use of it so affected his stomach that he could scarcely eat at times.

"Mother had coffee-headache and dizziness, and if I drank coffee for breakfast I would taste it all day and usually go to bed with a headache.

"One day father brought home a pkg. of Postum recommended by our grocer. Mother made it according to directions on the box and it just "hit the spot." It has a dark, seal-brown color, changing to golden brown when cream is added, and a snappy taste similar to mild, high-grade coffee, and we found that its continued use speedily put an end to all our coffee ills.

"That was at least ten years ago and Postum has, from that day to this, been a standing order of father's grocery bill.

"When I married, my husband was a great coffee drinker, although he admitted that it hurt him. When I mentioned Postum he said he did not like the taste of it. I told him I could make it taste all right. He smiled and said, try it. The result was a success, he won't have anything but Postum."

Postum now comes in two forms:

Regular Postum—must be well boiled—15c and 25c packages.

Instant Postum—is a soluble powder. Made in the cup with hot water—no boiling—30c and 50c tins.

The cost per cup of both kinds is about the same.

I Want Some of THE BLACK SHELLS

THE BLACK SHELLS are the modern, different ammunition that will give you a 5% better score at the traps and a 10% better bag in the field.

Why? First, our priming charge contains no fulminate of mercury mixed with ground glass. To get an even mixture in a pasty batch of heavy mercury and light glass is uncertain business. Also, glass absorbs heat (about one-sixth of the total), whereas our materials are combustible and so increase heat.

The Black Shells Primer is a strictly chemical composition, and our double size flash passage brings the whole fiercely hot primer flame directly into the main charge. Hence The Black Shells act with wonderful speed and deadly uniformity. The shot pattern is regular and bird proof. The penetration is phenomenal.

With no brass-eating mercury in the primer mixture, we escape the necessity of weak copper caps. Brass primers don't puncture and endanger your eyes.

The Black Shells are completely waterproof and crimped hard and even. They won't swell in foggy, rainy weather—always eject smoothly and "work" like a charm in a pump or automatic gun.

There are three Black Shells, Romax for black powder, Climax and Ajax for smokeless powder. All are loaded with the celebrated Tatham shot.

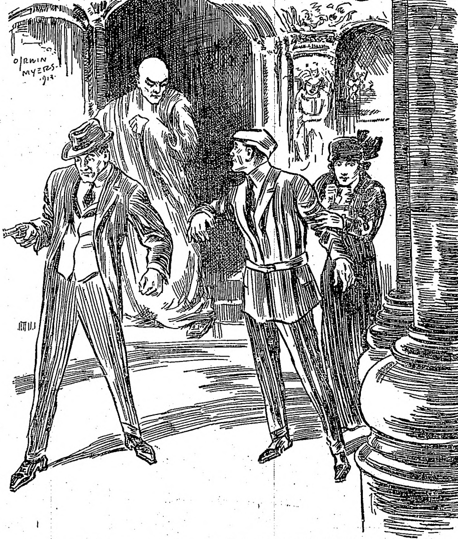
THE DEVIL CHAIR

A Chronicle of the Strange Adventures of John Haynes and His Gyroscope Vehicle

THE GOD FROM THE PAGODA

By H. M. EGBERT

(Copyright by W. G. Chapman)



THE TEMPLE DOORS OPENED AND A MONK, WITH SHAVEN HEAD AND KEEN, IMPASSIVE FEATURES, BECKONED TO THEM TO ENTER.

"At Chung Ling, twelve miles north of Wu Chang. She went there as a missionary after she thought you and her daughter dead!" This was all that John Haynes was able to learn concerning his wife, and those few words he had wrested from the last of his enemies only when he held him upon the brink of death. Now, his vengeance accomplished, there remained only the task of this discovery. And it seemed but a matter of a few weeks until he should find her; there could be little difficulty, once he set foot within the confines of the Flowery land, for Wu Chang is a mighty metropolis in central China, and there are few white women in its vicinity.

Five years before John Haynes had been torn from his wife and daughter and railroaded into the penitentiary at Nokomis Falls; on a false charge, by the conspirators who had leagued themselves together to steal his lands. In the prison he had invented a wonderful machine—a gyroscope, which he bound to his feet and, gaining access to the outer world, utilized to effect his escape. Propelled by this powerful top along road, railroad, or trolley line, at the speed of two hundred miles an hour, he was invincible. He set to work to execute justice upon his enemies, and, one by one, they had paid the penalty, according to the magnitude of their crimes. And now the last had suffered retribution and Haynes was free to find the woman who, he doubted not, had long since mourned him as dead.

He had already discovered his daughter, living in an obscure northern town, and sent her to Chicago to await his summons. He had enlisted her sympathies, but she was married now, and he had chosen not to blacken her life with the knowledge of all that he had done and hoped to do. But when the last of his enemies was disposed of he sought her out and told her that he was resolved to find her mother and bring her back to her.

And then he found that fate had played a strange prank on him. For, when he appeared, unexpectedly, in Eleanor's splendid home on the Lake front, he found the house in confusion. Mr. Beyers, his daughter's husband, and junior partner in his father's firm, had been commissioned to go to Shanghai to straighten out the accounts of a branch bank there, and, with his wife, he was to leave for San Francisco on the following day.

Beyers knew Haynes and all about his deeds, for his father had been one of those who had wronged him; the two men had been dramatically reconciled by the marriage of their children, and their mutual hatred had been replaced by mutual esteem. Between Haynes and his son-in-law had sprung up a warm friendship, which was cordially renewed on that last evening in Chicago, and before they separated it was agreed that the three should travel to Wu Chang together in order to find the missing wife and mother.

She had been told that her husband died in a steamship accident, together with her child—at least, so the searchers inferred, after comparing all that they knew concerning the tragic separation five years previously. Mary Haynes, left thus alone, as she believed, had been hurried to a remote corner of the United States by one of the conspirators, under the guise of protection, and, when she recovered from a protracted illness, there had revived in her a girlish ambition to become a missionary in the Orient. So she had sailed for China and disappeared in the interior of that enormous country.

Several weeks later the three arrived in Wu Chang under unexpected circumstances. Hardly had they landed in China before the revolution broke out, having its center in Wu Chang and Hankow, two of a trinity of towns upon the river bank in which millions of yellow men toil and labor. Even New York and its activities are dwarfed by the commercial industries of this densely populated region. The three proceeded up the river aboard a Chinese gunboat, on which Beyers, by the lavish expenditure of money, had secured passage. The knowledge that Mary Haynes was exposed to the fanaticism of the mob, always ready to be excited against foreigners, made them reckless of running into danger. They reached Wu Chang to learn that a furious battle had taken place there the week previously; that the Manchus had been worsted, and that the Republican army was in hot pursuit, leaving the city exposed, as was the surrounding country, to the raids of robbers and murderous bands.

Conditions could hardly have been worse, but they were worse, for it was learned that the telegraph lines leading out of Chung Ling had been cut and that the roads were blocked. Hiring a force of twenty soldiers, the three set forth, Eleanor Beyers refusing to leave her father and husband in spite of their protestations.

Constantly they passed straggling bodies of bandits, but these hesitated to attack a force so strongly armed and passed them peaceably enough. The news of the travelers' journey, however, had evidently preceded them for when they were already on the outskirts of Chung Ling, and actually in sight of the mission building in which, reports said, the missionaries were shut up under the guardianship of a few loyal soldiers, an armed mob came racing down the road in their direction, evidently with hostile intent. The three took shelter in the garden of a native temple, a pagoda dedicated to the local god of war; this proceeding evidently infuriated the townspeople, for suddenly a volley was discharged in their direction. The soldiers who accompanied the travelers broke and fled.

It was then three o'clock in the afternoon. Haynes, Beyers and Eleanor found themselves alone, surrounded by a constantly augmenting crowd, which evidently meant to capture them alive in order to torture them. From the group before the garden wall a spokesman detached himself and walked forward, smiling, and waving a cheap Japanese white paper handkerchief in token of truce.

Haynes, pushing his daughter back behind the shelter of a pillar immediately before the temple door, walked forward. The Chinaman smiled still more broadly.

"What for you come to Chung Ling?" he asked.

"To take away the missionaries," Haynes answered. "We mean no harm. Bring them to us or let us go to them, rather, and we will depart peaceably."

The yellow man drew in his breath with a hiss. "Unfortunately," he said suavely, "my people say you must stay here with the missionaries. They are afraid to let you leave Chung Ling for fear you tell the Republicans that the Manchus have left the town. All who come stay; it is the rule."

"Very well," said Haynes, after a moment's thought. "Take us to the missionaries, then. There is a woman there," he added, unable to restrain his desire to learn whether Mary was in that building whose strange, funnel-shaped roof was plainly visible five or six hundred yards distant, towering over the intervening houses.

"Yes, but wait a minute," said the yellow man. "Treaty must be made—" He hesitated. Haynes saw his eyes wander and, with a sudden instinct of treachery, looked back. At the same moment a cry broke from Eleanor's lips. Under cover of this friendly parley a murderous band were creeping up, with knives in their hands, toward the rear of the temple, with the evident intention of rushing Beyers and his wife and taking them captives.

Haynes drew his revolver and discharged it full into the other's face. The man staggered back, groaning; the multitude made a rush toward the visitors. The three turned back toward the temple doors and hammered on them with their fists. In vain; they could not hope to break those panels of solid, inlaid teakwood. They were like tiny islands in the yellow sea that swept on them from all sides, cruel-eyed men with yellow faces and hideous, shaven heads, from the backs of which hung the long pigtails, still worn in conservative Chung Ling as a sign of Manchu sympathies. But just as the three had formed back, determined to fight to the last rather than submit to the tortures which they knew awaited them, the temple doors opened and a monk, with shaven head and keen, impassive features, beckoned to them to enter. And at his appearance the mob outside stood still as though petrified.

The three followed the priest, whose robe of white wool was alone visible in the obscurity of the interior. He flitted in front of them, his felt slippers making no sound upon the thick pile of the carpet, until at length he stopped before an altar, behind which, in brazen armor, stood the life-size figure of the god of war. The grinning face and dripping sword seemed to be faintly illumined by the reflection of lights burning somewhere in the recesses of the building. The sudden aspect of this ferocious face under the steel headpiece, the crimson stains upon the sword, horrified the fugitives; they stood stock still, uncertain where to advance. And suddenly the priest disappeared and a door snapped shut.

They waited in silence until their eyes became accustomed to the gloom, and, little by little, they were able to distinguish objects around them; then they felt their way cautiously forward until farther progress was arrested by a steel barrier. Haynes struck a match, and by its light they perceived that a wall of wrought iron, extending from the stone floor to the high roof of the pagoda, barred their advance. On either side of them was a similar wall. Behind them was another, in which was set the temple gate, two feet behind the teakwood door. They were in a trap.

Then all at once the truth dawned on them. They were caged securely as any wild beasts in zoological gardens, caged before the altar of the god of war, to whom they were destined to be offered as a sacrifice. And the inscrutable Chinese mind had planned all this from the first, had lured them into the pagoda in the belief that they would find safety there. Escape was impossible. They looked into each other's faces, and each read his fate in his fellow's eyes.

Six feet behind the wrought iron barrier the god stood over his altar, one hand stretched out, brandishing that dreadful sword, still wet from the blood of victims. At some time, perhaps days later, after exhaustion had made resistance impossible, that secret gate in the iron wall would open again, and, one by one, they would be dragged off by the priests to the sacrifice.

If Haynes could reach the sword he calculated that he could hew his way through the soft iron, whose malleable properties made it more serviceable as a cage than any structure of steel, which might haply have been fractured or disjointed by repeated blows. But it was so closely wrought that he could pass only two fingers of one hand between the interstices. He looked at Beyers in despair. But the others had resigned themselves to the inevitable; husband and wife were taking last farewell of one another, oblivious of his presence. In that hour of peril he was forgotten, and for an instant, as he recalled all that he had endured for his wife and daughter, a little fire of jealousy smouldered in Haynes' heart. It was but momentary, but ere it died it sent back his thoughts with a rush to Mary. Perhaps she too stood in some such deadly danger. Perhaps—he shuddered and turned sick with horror at the unhallowed thought—perhaps that was her blood upon the sword!

He set his wits to work examining the iron structure. There seemed no way of assaulting it without the sword. But he perceived that there was a space of about four inches between the bottom of the steel and the ground, and that the point of the sword, held in the idol's hand, reached to within an inch of the flooring and was turned toward him. His eye could measure a straight line from where he stood to the point and thence to the sword hilt.

From the deep pocket of his coat he drew a flat, round object, resembling in size and shape nothing so much as one of those toy roulette wheels used by amateur gamblers. This was the gyroscope. From another pocket he took the little motor, unscrewed it from the tiny tank, and looked inside. The tank contained almost a quarter of a pint of gasoline—half its capacity. Haynes never traveled without this apparatus, which had often proved his salvation. Now, desperate as his design was, it seemed to open to them the only possible avenue of escape. The gyroscope was so well made and spun so easily that a quarter of a pint would serve to keep it running for perhaps an hour. And he could do so much in that period. He started the motor and its low buzzing startled the lovers from their rhapsody. Haynes went up to Beyers.

"Do you happen to have a piece of string about you?" he asked.

Beyers felt in his pockets doubtfully. "No," he answered. "What should I do with a piece of string?"

"You, Eleanor?"

She shook her head.

"Then tear off the hem of your petticoat," said Haynes impatiently.

Even in that peril she hesitated. No woman likes to wear a petticoat with a draggled hem, nor is the dislike lessened even when she stands in a Chinese pagoda, awaiting death at the hands of a blood-thirsty priest. She hesitated one moment; then, stooping, she rent off a long strip of filmy lace and gave it to her father. Haynes tore it into two strips, folded and joined them. One end he fastened to the body of the machine, the other to the stop which controlled its action, and he held the loop in his hand, in the manner of reins. Then, while the others watched with languid interest, he aimed the little gyroscope at the point of the sword and started it beneath the cage.

It flashed across the floor, missed the sword point, and pulled up with a jerk that threw Haynes against the ironwork. Pulling hard on the right rein, he shut off the mechanism; then with the left rein he pulled back the machine. Again and again he launched this strange missile, aiming in the half darkness at the edge of that blood-stained weapon, and always missing it. Twenty-eight times he did this.

At the twenty-ninth attempt the gyroscope struck the sword point fairly; it trembled, and then running straight as an arrow, it raced up the blade along the narrow edge, reached the hilt, dashed into the idol's porcelain hand that held the sword, and smashed it from the armored body. The sword fell crashing to the ground, its hilt toward the ironwork of the cage. Haynes thrust his hand under the structure, grasped the hilt, and drew back the sword. Then he drew back the gyroscope and shut off the motor.

Haynes held the heavy weapon aloft and looked at it. It was of the finest steel, such a weapon as is used by official executioners for beheading their victims. Motioning to Beyers and his daughter to stand as far back as possible, Haynes swung the weapon aloft and brought it down upon the malleable iron with all his force, denting and cutting into it. Again and again he swung the sword with the full force of his arm. And at each blow the structure trembled and bent and twisted, until at last he had hewn a space in it through which the three might creep.

He squeezed his body through the cage and, standing beside the altar, listened intently. Nobody came. If any priest heard him he was afraid to enter, but, more probably, all were away, engaged in pillaging. Haynes took the helmet from the head of the god and placed it upon his own, pulling down an inner covering of chain mail over his face. He donned the breast and back pieces, the greaves and shoulder pieces; finally he stood up, the very image of the idol, which now lay, a poor, shattered thing of porcelain, fallen beside its terrible altar. When he was fully attired Haynes placed the gyroscope upon one foot in such a way that he could at will, by a motion of the other, start the motor in action. Then, hobbling as a boy who goes on one roller skate, he beckoned to Beyers and Eleanor to follow him and crept round behind the altar.

A door barred them from without. There was a peephole half way down through which Haynes could perceive the outlines of a garden, concealed by hedges of box. Without hesitation he unlocked it and went out; then turned back, and called in a low voice to the others. When they emerged they found themselves in a tiny close, shut in by high box hedges, and quite deserted. In the midst of it was a well.

There was no water in the well. But six feet down, clinging with clenched fingers to a shelf in the broken brickwork of the wall, was a white man in tattered Chinese garb, the body strained in agony and the face blanched with pain. As Haynes stood on the edge, wielding the sword, a fearful figure in his armor, the man's eyes were opened and were turned upon him, and from his mouth came a few Chinese words.

Haynes understood nothing of it, but he surmised that the fugitive imagined him to be the executioner. He called in English.

"Come out! You are safe! We are friends!"

The man stared up at him incredulously and clung still more tightly to the wall. Haynes saw that his sufferings had paralyzed his understanding.

"There's a man down here—a white man," he called back to Beyers. "We've got to pull him out. Lie flat and catch me round the waist. Let Eleanor catch you. Now—pull!"

Two minutes later the man emerged from the well.

He was one of the missionaries, he said, when he recovered his wits. There had been five men and three women in the mission, one of the latter his wife, married to him only two weeks previously. He had gone out as an envoy to parley with the mob, had been lured into the temple, and had somehow contrived to secret himself near the altar when he suspected the priests' designs. While they pursued him through another door, by which they thought he had escaped, he had discovered the exit into the little garden and, seeing the well, had flung himself into it and had clung there for several hours. So far as he was aware, the mission was safe. Only a few of the mob had firearms, and they were too cowardly to attack, since the defenders were well supplied with rifles and ammunition. Furthermore, they had contrived to send a messenger through the mob to seek aid from a body of English marines, who were supposed to have landed at Wu Chang to protect the consulate. Rescue might arrive at any moment. When he had left, all were unharmed.

Haynes did not dare to ask if Mary were there.

At the end of the garden was a small door, of a height level with the top of the hedge. Motioning to the others to remain where they were, Haynes opened it cautiously and looked out, his body still concealed from view by the flowering branches. In front of him was a large open space, surrounded by small, mean houses, and immediately across this square, facing him, was the mission itself. Half way between the mission and the pagoda were encamped a number of irregular levies. They had raised a low parapet of sandbags, from behind which they kept up an intermittent fire upon the building. Evidently, failing to capture it by storm, of which attempt evidence was aplenty in the shape of bodies of their dead, lying where they had fallen upon the street in front of the mission, they had resorted to siege tactics. The main force of the rioters seemed to have withdrawn to another part of the city, for their cries came faintly to Haynes' ears, and here and there the smoke of burning houses was swept up on the breeze.

Yet, even as he looked, he saw a body of them sweep round the far angle of the plaza-like space and run wildly toward the mission, uttering savage, guttural cries. They seemed like devils—and they were devils, athirst for murder. Some carried pikes, some swords, some blazing torches; and at the sight of them the besiegers leaped to their feet from behind their defenses and, joining them, swept up to the mission doors once more. Now from within resounded the crack of repeating rifles. Here and there a man fell, but the mob were too insatiate for blood to heed their dead. They broke like a storm against the heavy, barricaded doors, hammering on them, firing into the shuttered windows, battering at them with axes and billets of wood. Haynes saw that this onslaught must prove decisive. No doors could survive so tremendous an impetus. Even while he watched the place would be stormed, then men slaughtered, and the women . . .

That thought set the blood whirling through his brain. He touched the stop that set the gyroscope in motion. An instant later he was darting across the square with the speed of a missile shot from a catapult. He saw houses whiz past him, he shot by the heaps of dead, wielding that dripping sword and shouting exultantly. They heard him, turned, and saw a terrific apparition—their own god of war and destruction, fully armed and wielding his dreadful sword, issuing forth against them! A moment, and Haynes was in their midst and cutting them down.

None could withstand him. He ran through their ranks like a war chariot, leaving a broad trail of death behind him. He clicked the stop of the gyroscope, swung round, and went through them again. Their missiles glanced like hail off his brazen flanks and shoulders. They turned and fled along the narrow streets, and he pursued them; packed tightly as they were between the houses, there was nowhere for them to seek safety. He passed them, hewing them down, swung round, and repeated his journey of destruction. Three times he traversed their ranks, like some angel of destruction, and each time the dead were heaped up on either side of him like chaff on a threshing floor. When at last he paused, through sheer physical weakness, the streets were redder than a shambles and the last of the mob were flying in the distance. Then he came to his senses out of a delirious dream; he wiped the sword and went back to the pagoda garden, where he found the others still waiting.

"Come," he said. "The streets are clear."

He did not know that he was spattered from head to foot, nor that at that moment he seemed to them as inhuman as he had appeared to the Chinese. They followed in abject fear; they dared not answer him.

Haynes led them across the square toward the mission, but, before they reached it they heard the shouting of another mob and, at his command stood still. Haynes drew himself up before them, waiting, one foot against the stop of the gyroscope.

But it was white men who were advancing—white men, in khaki tunics and wearing white helmets. In column of fours they swept up the streets and into the square; and all at once came answering cries from the mission windows, and the defenders poured forth, men and women, unscathed, and ran to meet their rescuers. Half way between the cowering bodies stood Haynes and his little band. Then the man whom he had rescued broke from his side with a glad cry and caught his wife by the arms and drew her to him and kissed her joyously.

For the first time the figure in armor drooped a little and the drawn sword bent to the ground. Haynes bowed his head upon his breast. He knew that he had come too late. For in this woman he recognized his wife, unchanged after all those years, but seen again at what a price of suffering!

He turned to Eleanor, who stood at his side in fear, trembling, not daring to claim kinship with her whom she had come so far to see. He drew her aside, and Beyers too, and spoke to them softly, raising his chain faceguard ever so little.

"You understand?" he asked.

He saw that they understood.

"I am going away," said Haynes. "You will not tell her?"

They could not answer him.

"You will tell her that you learned she was here and came after her. Of me you will never speak. If you must do so, when occasion makes this necessary, you will speak of me as though I died in that steamship accident five years ago. You must blot me out of your memory."

Eleanor's arms were round him, round the spattered and stained armor which contained all that, next to her husband, was most dear to her.

"You promise?" he asked.

"I promise," he heard her whisper.

He kissed her; he grasped Beyers by the hand; an instant later, and he had touched the stop of the gyroscope again and was speeding southward toward Wu Chang. He knew that he had acted rightly, and that fate had been wiser than he. For the blood on his armor was but a symbol of that upon his soul, and between himself and Mary there was a barrier which he might not lift.

Improving Her Muscles.

"I understand that Mrs. Bloomeroons has employed a boxing instructor for her daughters."

"Yes. She says that every girl ought to learn something about the womanly art of self-defense."

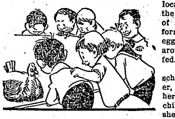
Chicks Hatch While Kindergarten Class Watch

CHICAGO.—The kindergarten class of the Walsh school has proved itself to be one of the most interested and observing audiences that ever watched the hatching of events. The object of their attentions is known locally as Mrs. Chick A. Biddy, and the children regard her as something of a wizard, having seen her transform a number of common every day eggs into little live creatures that run around and peep and insist on being fed.



Mrs. Biddy came to the Walsh school a few weeks ago, and the teacher, Miss E. Cassandria Truby, placed her in a corner of the room, and the children fed her all during the time she was acquiring a family.

And now, besides Mrs. Biddy there are Brownie, Wink, Blink, Tinkle, Hob, Mob, Cob, Bob, Sucky, Hittabob, Tiny and Tot Biddy to keep them interested.

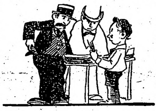
This is how it came about. Miss Truby believed that a setting hen would furnish her class amusement as well as knowledge. So she borrowed Mrs. Biddy and installed her in a box filled with excelsior and fifteen eggs.

Every other morning papers were laid on the floor around the box and an improvised fence was made of tables stood on edge. Mrs. Biddy left her nest only at meal time. When she returned to her nest she would duck her head and move her body so that the eggs in the center were rolled to the outside, and those on the outer edge were rolled to the center. In this way all the eggs got their fair share of warmth.

"It was beautiful," said Miss Truby, "to notice how the children watched the hen taking care of her brood, how she fed them, tended them, took them under her wings, and how proud she was of them."

Bold Bandit, Thirteen, Robs and Sells His Plunder

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.—Clarence Hoe, thirteen years old, was arrested on suspicion of having committed twenty acts of burglary in a couple of hours in one night recently, and all in the same place. According to the police he admitted the charge. Young Hoe's loot, which included quantities of railroad tickets, pencils, blotting paper, ink and rubber stamps, came from the Ocean Shore railroad depot at Mission and Twelfth streets.



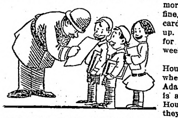
Risking discovery by the night watchman the young bandit expertly jimmied the back door of the depot and entered. Within all was dark and the reckless youth had neglected to provide himself with the electric flash which every up-to-date burglar is supposed to carry. "I didn't know what I would want," young Hoe is reported as saying, "so I took everything."

Twenty laborious trips were made by the young malefactor between the depot and a "cache" on an empty lot at Market and Tenth streets which frequently had been used by Clarence Hoe as a place of concealment for his school books on the days when he decided to acquire information in nickelodeons instead of at school.

Next day one of the most peculiar small business establishments ever seen in San Francisco appeared on the lot not far from the "cache," with Hoe presiding over it. Pencils, penholders and various other articles were exposed for sale.

"Kiddies" Bring Officer Their School Reports

CLEVELAND, O.—The blue-coated patrolman on traffic duty lifted his cap and looked seriously at the freckle-faced lad who had beaten his companions out of Hough school. "Not so good, Johnnie; better study a little more next week," said he. "That's fine, Mary," as he examined the grade card of a little girl who came dashing up. Other children excitedly clamored for the patrolman to examine their weekly averages.



This is a regular weekly scene at Hough avenue and Crawford road, where Patrolman Daniel P. Tafe, 11212 Ada avenue, is on traffic duty. Tafe is a friend of every child attending Hough school, and it is to him that they exhibit their grade cards each week, for praise or criticism, before taking them home. The children's attachment to the patrolman has come to the attention of Director of Public Safety Benesch, and he has written Tafe a letter complimenting him on his work.

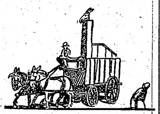
"The patrolman is a servant of the public school and should never aspire to be its master."

In this sentence Tafe summarizes the secret of being a good patrolman and it is a motto which Director Benesch will endeavor to impress on the minds of every member of the police force. "Tafe has the right idea," Benesch said.

Tafe ascribes his interest in the work of school children to the fact that he was unable to attend school after he was ten years old, and was forced to educate himself by study at night.

Bored Blotched Giraffe Sighs in Its Park Home

NEW YORK.—It was some day at the New York Zoological park recently. For which Raymond L. Ditmars, the curator, is authority. And no wonder. A blotched giraffe was received, as was the highest-priced baboon ever brought to the park; also a crate of African tortoises and a number of rare birds of the hornbill variety.



The giraffe has been on the way from Africa via Germany, then Baltimore and finally New York. The curator had received giraffes before, so, when he sent out two men to measure the height from the ground of the Bronx trolley wires it was not out of the ordinary. The bill of lading showed an eight-foot giraffe in a ten-foot crate, and as the crate was to go on a wagon of some height the curator got out his pencil.

"There's just two inches to spare," he exclaimed, "but we can't take any chances of having the giraffe electrocuted."

As a precaution he sent the two men along with the expressmen, each wearing a pair of rubber gloves, so wires could be lifted if necessary. But the curator's figuring was accurate, and the two men saw the crate slide neatly under the trolley wires as the park was neared with the giraffe.

Even the animal sighed when it got out of the crate and went into quarantine for two weeks in the park. It was the third time it had been in quarantine since it left Africa. The German officials would not let it land for fear of hoof and mouth disease, so it remained on a scow in German waters for many days. It was later quarantined in Baltimore.

MADE A GOOD GUIDE

Representative J. Hampton Moore, who succeeded John Dalzell on the ways and means committee, while hailing from Philadelphia, knows his Washington like a native. During the visit of a party of home friends to the capital, Mr. Moore was showing them the sights of the city and, while coming from the northeast entrance of the White House grounds their attention was attracted by the group of heroic figures that make up the Lafayette statue at the southeast corner of Lafayette square.

This presents, with other things, a woman with a garment about her loins—which she is frantically grasping—holding up a naked sword to Lafayette, who is standing above. Her attitude is one of eager, nay, anxious and insistent supplication.

As the party approached the statuary group, Representative Moore struck the posture of a guide, and, in the professional twang of the craft, droned out in sing-song: "And now, ladies and gentlemen, we come to the far-famed statue of the great soldier and statesman, Marquis de Lafayette. Below him is a woman in suppliant attitude, holding a sword. Apparently she is speaking earnestly to him and—"

"But, Mr. Moore," interrupted one of the ladies of the party, "what is the woman saying to Lafayette?"

"That's very plain, if you observe the condition of her attire, madam," he replied. "She's begging him: 'Here, general, take this, quick, while I catch my clothes!'"

"BREAD UPON THE WATERS"

Representative Heflin of Alabama is a great believer in the return of bread "cast upon the waters," and in proof thereof relates a story of the time when he had first entered politics.

It seems that about five miles from the Heflin home a negro jubilee of some sort was in progress and was attracting hundreds of negroes from all parts of the surrounding country. One of those who wished to attend the function and had driven many weary miles was unfortunate when he reached the vicinity of the Heflin residence. One of the wheels on his buggy broke.

The old darky had been told where Representative Heflin's father lived, and probably also that the elder Mr. Heflin had a sympathetic heart. Therefore, he went to the door and asked the elder Mr. Heflin, who had a blacksmith shop, to let him borrow a wheel for his broken buggy.

The wheel was loaned and the negro went on his way rejoicing.

Some years later, however, when the present representative had been persuaded to enter the race for the state legislature, he saw the old darky. Mr. Heflin had just come to the end of a pause in a campaign speech when the wheel borrower arose in the back of the assemblage.

"Ah'd just lak to ask yo' one question, suh. Are yo' the son of Dr. Heflin?"

And when he had received an affirmative response from the speaker of the day, the old darky continued:

"Well, den, Ah just wants to tell yo' one thing. Ah never took dat wheel back to yo' father. Ah just kept postponin' it and postponin' it and Ah guess Ah'll never see yo' father again in dis world an' he'll never see dat wheel. But Ah'm going to tell yo' now, dis old man and his three sons is a-goin' to cast their votes for yo'."

WRITING FOR A LIVING

© HARRIS & EWING

Ambassador Walter H. Page, speaking lately to the British authors, dwelt upon the folly of writing for a living. From the standpoint of mere barnyard gumption, he said, it is absurd for anybody to start out to spend his life trying to support himself or herself with the pen. As the ambassador has been an extensive dealer in literature as a magazine editor, he ought to be able to speak with some degree of authority on the subject. His testimony is in practical accord with the great majority of those who can speak from the experience of an author, an editor or a publisher. One of the most successful women authors, pecuniarily considered, at least, was Elizabeth Stuart Phelps. In her autobiography she dwells on the subject of authorship, speaking from a wide experience, and her advice to persons who are attempting a career of authorship is to the same effect and very much more pungent than that of Ambassador Page. She says: "Write if you must, not otherwise."

TURKISH ENVOY ADOPTS MOSLEM FAITH

© HARRIS & EWING

Alfred Rustem Bey des Bilinski, who has just succeeded to the post of Turkish ambassador to the United States is not a Turk. His father was a Pole and his mother was a Miss Sandison, of an aristocratic British family. The ambassador has recently received widespread commendation in many Turkish newspapers because he, a short time ago, embraced the Moslem faith.

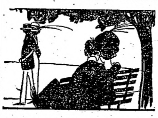
"It is like coming back home," said the ambassador in Washington the other day. "I have so many good friends here that it is a great delight to serve my government in Washington.

"No, I do not apprehend another war in the Balkans. I am one who earnestly hopes for peace and believes there will be peace. Turkey, it is true, lost some territory in the recent war, and while it is always bad for a nation to lose territory, it will probably prove a blessing for us in the end. The Turkish army is in far better condition than ever. It is smaller, but more efficient, better disciplined, and better trained."

NATIONAL CAPITAL AFFAIRS

Dark Parks and Bashful Moon, Lovers Spoon

WASHINGTON.—At times Harry will be found with his head in Minnie's lap, with Minnie smoothing his damp brow and fanning him. Again, Frank and Florence may be more ardent, or the night may be cooler, and he will have his strong arm pressed protectingly around her shoulders. In this arrangement Flo always rests her slightly tinted cheek on Frank's clean shirt just below the collar. Frank then has a blush coming to him when the boys ask him what happened to his shirt. Positions without number may be assumed by these spooning couples, some even preferring to walk along the shaded paths with their hands tightly clasped or their arms twined like ivy across each other's shoulders. A fortunate investigator has reported that he has discovered a couple, Sally, weighing nearly 210 and Archer, size, two and six-eighths, which invariably assumes the position of Sally-on-the-lap-of-Archer.



Taken as a whole this class of spooners is an interesting one for the curiously inclined. We have them, and the police have not rid us of them, so why not study them from a zoological or anthropological point of view? Specimens might even be secured and mounted. A new fad! Let's start it.

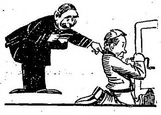
Oh yes, stranger, those wide, cool, open green squares and triangles known as the parks of Washington are inhabited. In broad daylight we see nurses and tiny children enjoying the protecting shade, but at night—ah at night—we do not see the denizens of the park, who are enjoying the protecting darkness. How do we know there is any one there? We fall over them.

Can any one venture into Lafayette square or Franklin park or Lincoln park or any dark place provided with benches these summer evenings without feeling the presence of these amorous mortals?

Says Capital Policemen Always Have Manners

"OF COURSE, Pittsburgh may need a school of manners for her policemen as she does for some of her millionaires. Washington policemen have their manners before they get on the force."

Maj. Richard Sylvester smiled grimly as he read the dispatch from the Smoky city reciting the frantic attempts being made to civilize the police. Director of Public Safety C. S. Hubbard, the report said, is going to have classes where young cops will learn to be kind to dumb drinkers and ardent automobilists.



"How about a course like that here?" was suggested to the major. "Teach policemen to cut out the rough work with burglars and thugs and always speak gently to second-story workers."

The major pondered the idea for a moment. Then he branched off.

"If we Washington policemen," said he, "were in the habit of maltreating citizens, this town would be in a furore inside of twenty-four hours. About every third person in Washington is a diplomatic attache or a public official.

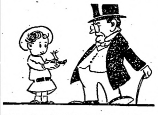
"Can you imagine what would happen in this city if the police force developed the habit of clubbing military attaches and chiefs of government bureaus?"

The interviewer passed the buck.

"You see," continued the major, "policemen in Washington have civility preached them before they get on the force. I believe that Washington policemen have more tact than the police of any other city in the country. If they use too much force—get too free with their clubs—they quickly appear before the trial board."

When Little Boy Met the "Man of Importance"

A MAN of importance—you can always spot him by his "air"—was favoring the White House neighborhood with his stately tread when a small boy stopped him. He was such a tiny boy as to still be wearing white kilts and a shiny red belt, and he talked with a baby lisp. In his outstretched hand lay a dead sparrow.



"Make him go—." The child said it as imperatively as if the important man were his very own daddy—"I picked him up and he won't go—Make him fly—far."

To be requested to make an exceedingly dead bird fly is too much to ask of any man of importance.

"Throw that thing back in the street. How do you suppose I can make it fly?" said the "Man of Importance."

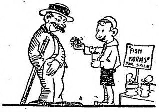
"Wine him up. Wif a key—"

Perhaps he was an unfortunate man whose overimportance had hindered him from an acquaintance with little children and wound-up toys, for he merely flung the proposition aside and resumed his stately treading.

And perhaps—again—he would have been ashamed of himself if he had turned back and seen the tiny kid with the bird in his outstretched palm, and on his face the bewildered hurt at doubtless the first rebuff he had ever received in all the four years of his life.

Fishing for Pastime and an Incidental Income

FISHING is a pastime and an incidental income, or rather, outgo, with a large number of the people of Washington. Every traveler along the sides of the rocky reaches of the river above Washington has probably noted the signs "Bait for Sale," "Boats for Hire" and other signs put up for the benefit (perhaps) of prospective fishermen.



There is a little industry, though, at Georgetown to which the writer means to call attention. As the city cars outbound reach the intersection of Thirty-sixth and Prospect streets, or Thirty-sixth street and Prospect avenue, or, at any rate, the point where soft drink signs are posted all over the old Southworth cottage, many small boys tempt passengers with masses of wriggling worms. These boys in piping tones are saying, "Fish worms," or "Feesh werms." They have their merchandise in a battered tin can and they hold it so that the mass of squirming worms wriggles partly in the can and partly in one of the hands of the boy. He is displaying his wares, and he wants to prove to you that the worms have plenty of wriggle in them. He has a tangled knot of them in one hand and he pleads with you to buy them. For five or ten cents he will let you have enough of them to feed all the fish that dally with your hooks. It may be that the fish esteem these worms; that they look on them as delicate morsels, and that their appetite is piqued and tempted by them; but there is no accounting for tastes.

Many fishermen pause at this transfer point to buy bait from the boys.

BRYAN DEFENDS PROPOSED TREATY

SECRETARY OF STATE ISSUES STATEMENT DISCUSSING COLOMBIA.

SAYS $25,000,000 IS JUST

Declares Southern Neighbor Is Out Several Millions in Excess of This Sum by Our Act. Replies to Critics.

Washington, July 14. — Secretary Bryan issued a statement defending the proposed treaty to settle the differences between the United States and Colombia over the separation of Panama. The treaty has met vigorous opposition in the senate, and former President Roosevelt has attacked it as a vehicle for the payment of "blackmail."

Says Loss Exceeds $25,000,000.

Mr. Bryan declared that it was necessary to discuss only the fact that an estrangement exists, and not the events which gave rise to the differences; and that regardless of whether Colombia has a just grievance against her more powerful neighbor, no one would deny that the former country sustained great financial loss, considerably more than the $25,000,000 which the United States would pay under the treaty, through the separation of Panama.

As to the expression of regret on the part of American government, to which opponents of the pending convention offer their bitterest objection, the secretary said this was almost identical with a similar expression in the Du Bois memorandum on the basis of which the Taft administration unsuccessfully sought to placate Colombia.

The Statement, in Part.

The statement, in part, follows:

"The present administration found an estrangement existing between the United States and Colombia, an estrangement that has continued for nearly 13 years. As the normal relation between nations is one for friendship, it is desirable that differences shall be adjusted and cordial relations resumed. It is not necessary to discuss the events which gave rise to this estrangement, because it does not matter which party was at fault. The estrangement exists, and this is the fact that must be dealt with.

"Colombia has all along insisted upon arbitration. If this nation were willing to arbitrate it would not be necessary to discuss terms of settlement because in the case of arbitration the parties accept the finding of the arbitrators and settle their differences according to the terms prescribed. It is not the policy of nations, however, to settle by arbitration questions like those arising between the United States and Colombia, and as arbitration is not resorted to, the settlement must be made by direct negotiations. Our nation, being much the larger nation, and having refused to arbitrate, takes upon itself the responsibility of doing justice to Colombia.

Has Sustained Loss.

"Colombia feels that she has been aggrieved, and whatever may be said as to whether or not this feeling is justified, no one will deny that she has sustained financial loss in the separation of Panama from her. Before the separation took place this government offered Colombia $10,000,000 for canal route and $250,000 a year for 100 years. This annuity might be capitalized at about $7,500,000, so that this government's estimate of the loss suffered by Colombia could not be less than about $17,500,000. But that estimate was made upon the supposition that Colombia would retain the state or department of Panama. The retention of Panama would have given to Colombia not only the value of Panama, but the incidental benefits to be derived from proximity to the canal. We cannot deny, therefore, that the actual loss to Colombia was considerably more than $25,000,000.

Negotiations of Du Bois.

"There is no doubt that Mr. Du Bois was authorized to make known to Colombia that the United States would offer as the basis of a treaty if assured of acceptance by Colombia, $10,000,000 for the Atrate river canal route and arbitration of the reversionary interest of Colombia in the railroad. This reversionary interest was valued at about $16,000,000, which would have been the sum awarded to Colombia if the arbitration was decided in her favor. The $10,000,000 for the Atrate route, and the $10,000,000 was evidently intended more as liquidated damages than as the price of the canal route, together with the value of the reversionary interest in the railroad would amount to $26,000,000.

"If cordial relations are to be restored with Colombia they must be restored on a basis that is satisfactory to Colombia. Friendships cannot rest upon force; neither can they rest upon acquiescence in the power of might, even if Colombia, under protest and against the judgment of her people, accepted a less sum than that we offer, it would not restore the relations that ought to exist. We must satisfy their sense of justice, although a less sum might satisfy our sense of justice. In every settlement there must be concessions.

READY FOR THEIR FLIGHT ACROSS THE ATLANTIC

FOUNDATIONS GET TWO HARD KNOCKS

N. E. A. TAKES FLING AT ROCKEFELLER AND CARNEGIE DONATIONS.

OAKLAND, CAL., FOR '15 MEET

Officers Elected and Women Gain Recognition With Five of Eleven Vice Presidents—Jordan President.

St. Paul, July 10.—Two hard knocks at the Rockefeller and Carnegie foundations were delivered by the National Education Association and its auxiliary body, the department of normal schools.

The association resolved that all official investigations of public education should be made through the United Sttaes bureau of education.

The normal school department "viewed with alarm the activities of the Carnegie and Rockefeller foundations in their effort to control the policies of the state educational institutions."

Jordan Unanimously Elected.

As was predicted David Starr Jordan, chancellor of Leland Stanford university, California, was unanimously elected president of the association for 1915 at the business session.

Dr. Jordan will therefore preside at the convention held in connection with the Panama-Pacific exposition. Oakland, Cal., was chosen as the place of meeting. The time is in August.

The threatened revolt of the women delegates against male domination in the convention did not materialize in the matter of nominations. A purpose to placate the women is indicated in the election of five women to vice presidencies, of which there are 11 in all.

List of Vice Presidents.

The list of vice presidents follow: Joseph Swain, Swathmore, Pa.; Miss Grace Strachan, of Brooklyn; Mrs. Helen Hefferman, Illinois; Miss Isabelle Williams, St. Paul; Mrs. Josephine Preston, Washington; Mrs. Cora G. Lewis, Kansas; Walter R. Seivers, Idaho; J. W. Brister, Tennessee; R. C. Stearns, Virginia; J. G. Collicott, Indiana; F. S. Cook, South Dakota.

The following Northwest directors were named: Minnesota, Agnes C. Doherty, of St. Paul(re-elected); North Dakota, C. C. Root; South Dakota, Oliver O. Young; Wisconsin, Milton C. Potter; Iowa, E. C. Bishop; Montana, J. N. Williams; Michigan, E. E. Scribner.

In the resolution the convention body unanimously reindorsed equal suffrage, its first indorsement having been given two years ago; and indorsed the moral self-respect and conduct of President Wilson in handling the Mexican situation. This was cheered vehemently.

The equal suffrage subject was embodied in the report of the committee on teachers' salaries, tenure and pensions. When it was presented, W. N. Sheats, superintendent of schools, Tallahassee, Fla., arose to say, sarcastically, that he didn't understand what the term political equality meant.

First Woman Commissioner.

San Francisco, July 13. — The first woman commissioner from a state to the Panama Pacific exposition, Mrs. Fred E. Sutton, of Oklahoma, has arrived here. She will attend a meeting of the Oklahoma Society of California, when plans for the ground breaking on the site of the Oklahoma pavilion will be arranged.

New Locomotives to Move Crops.

Milwaukee, July 13.—The Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul railroad has placed an order with the American Locomotive company for five of the giant super-heater mikado type of locomotives designed for heavy work, both in the mountains and also on the plains. The locomotives will be used in an effort to handle the bumper wheat crops of the northwest. The contract for the new machines specifies early delivery so that the railroad will do its part to help the farmers get their grain to market.

BATTLE ROYAL IS PROMISED

SENATE FACTIONS READY FOR RESERVE BOARD FIGHT.

Democrats Supporting Wilson for Jones' Confirmation—Warburg Refuses to Be Questioned.

Washington, July 13.—Democratic senators who propose to stand by President Wilson in his fight for confirmation of the nomination of Thomas D. Jones of Chicago as a member of the federal reserve board are engaged in preparation for the contest when it reaches the senate through the unfavorable recommendation voted by the banking and currency committee. It is conceded that a battle royal is ahead, in which the president will be forced to clash with some members of his own party.

As to the action of the committee in deciding to postpone further consideration of the nomination of Paul M. Warburg of New York, unless he changes his mind and decides to accept the committee's invitation to appear before it and submit to questioning, there were few actual developments. At the White House it was evident that the president had determined to champion Mr. Warburg's nomination to the end, the New York banker having agreed to let his name stand should the committee not insist on his appearance. The action last week, however, is taken as an indication that the committee proposes to insist upon his appearance and to do nothing further with regard to his nomination until he is heard from. There was a suggestion current about the capitol that an understanding might be reached as to what the committee wants to know from Mr. Warburg, and that the banker was informed that there is no desire to pry into personal affairs to an extent that might be embarrassing to his clients, but the committee merely wished to satisfy itself that there were no present obstructions to his qualification. Upon such a basis some senators thought Mr. Warburg might consent to appear.

The committee will meet again, after which Senator Hitchcock, the acting chairman, expects to submit to the senate the adverse report on the nomination of Mr. Jones. A favorable minority report will be made by Senators Lee of Maryland, Hollis, Pomerene and Shafroth. In connection with the majority report an effort may be made to introduce the testimony of Mr. Jones relating to his connection with the so-called harvester and zinc trusts, which formed the basis for opposition to his confirmation. The first test of strength may come over such an effort.

FREEPORT CASE IS POSTPONED

Mrs. Carman's Examination Not to Be Held Until July 21—Prosecutor Wants More Evidence.

Mineola, N. Y., July 13.—It will be 11 days at least before Mrs. Florence Conklin Carman, accused of the murder of Mrs. Louise Bailey, can hope to leave the Naseau county jail here, according to an agreement reached between her counsel, George M. Levy, and District Attorney Louis J. Smith.

Mrs. Carman's examination before a justice of the peace, set for Monday, when she would go free, she had hoped, because of lack of evidence against her, has been deferred until July 21. This change was asked for by the prosecutor with two ends in view—that he might present the case before a grand jury and also have more time to seek corroborative and stronger evidence. Mr. Smith said he would go before the grand jury Tuesday.

Fashion Decree for Men.

Atlantic City, N. J., July 13.—American men who profess to follow fashion's decree will wear suits of the English or form-fitting models this fall and winter, according to the standards approved at the opening session of the National Association of Manufacturing Clothing Designers convention. The decision of the delegates was unanimous and their decrees are accepted without question. Overcoats will have the "French" back and will be of the double-breasted, button through variety.

STORSTAD BLAMED FOR SHIP DISASTER

INVESTIGATORS FIX RESPONSIBILITY FOR WRECKING OF EMPRESS OF IRELAND.

DECLARE OFFICER NEGLIGENT

Inquiry Board Ends Probe of Disaster of May 29 in Which 1,032 Perished in St. Lawrence River.

Quebec, July 13.—The collier Storstad was held to blame in the findings reported following the investigation into the sinking of the steamship Empress of Ireland on the morning of May 29 when 1,032 lost their lives.

The Empress of Ireland was rammed by the Storstad and sank almost immediately. The report found responsibility divided on some points.

The Findings.

The board of inquiry in its report submitted by Lord Mersey found that the Storstad ported her helm and thus brought about the collision. The opinion is expressed that Captain Kendall's action in stopping his ship was good seamanship, but the suggestion is made that his failure to give a wider berth formed a contributory cause of the accident.

The inquiry into the disaster was begun in Quebec, June 16, by a commission composed of Lord Mersey, formerly presiding justice of the British admirality court; Sir Adolphe Routhier, of Quebec, and Chief Justice McLeod, of New Brunswick. The commissioners were assisted in their work by Commander F. W. Caborne of the British Royal Naval reserve. Professor John Welsh, of Newcastle, ng., Captain Demers, of the dominion wreck commission and Engineer Commander Howe, of the Canadian naval service.

Third Officer Held Responsible.

The colliers' third officer found responsible is Alfred Tuftenes. He was on the bridge when the crash occurred.

"We regret," says the finding, "to have to impute the blame to anyone in connection with this lamentable distaster. We can, however, come to no other conclusion than that Mr Tuftenes was wrong and negligent in altering his course in the fog as he undoubtedly did and that he was wrong and negligent in keeping the navigation of the vessel in his own hands and failing to call the captain when he saw the fog."

REBEL GENERALS NOT BARRED

Efforts Made to Do So Failed, It Is Now Learned.

Torreon, Mexico, July 13.—At the Carranza-Villa conciliation conference at Torreon an effort to prevent General Carranza or any of the military leaders of the revolution from becoming candidates for the presidency or vice presidency failed of adoption, according to a lengthy official statement just issued.

The motion was made by the Villa delegates. A motion passed, however demanding that the first chief, as president ad interim at the triumph of the revolution, should call a convention composed of delegates representing the rebel army, every 1,000 soldiers to be represented by one delegate, selected by a committee of military chiefs to be approved by the general of the division which would fix the date and arrange for the election

Ulsterites Recapture Arms.

London, July 13.—The Londonderry correspondent of the Daily Express sends a sensational story of how 100 Ulster volunteers recaptured at the Enniskillen station a consignment of arms and ammunition which had been seized at Londonderry by the customs authorities. The consignment was being conveyed from Londonderry to Dublin under an armed guard of 10 policemen. The volunteers surrounded the guard with drawn revolvers swiftly removed the cases and placed them in motor boats.

CARBAJAL TO TAKE HUERTA'S PLACE

DICTATOR TO QUIT THIS WEEK, SAYS MEXICAN FOREIGN AFFAIRS AGENT.

TO EMULATE PORFIRIO DIAZ

Would Save the Country From Further Bloodshed—Esteva-Ruiz Gives Out Story When Leaving Country Like Other Officials.

Vera Cruz, July 14.—To save his country from the horrors of further civil war and his capital from capture and perhaps sack by a victorious army, General Huerta intends to resign the presidency and leave Mexico.

Statement by Sub-Secretary.

This statement is made by Roberto Esteva-Ruiz, Mexican sub-secretary of foreign affairs, who reached Vera Cruz from Mexico City on his way to Europe. Huerta, he said, will surrender the government to Francisco Carbajal, the new minister of foreign affairs, who in turn will step aside when the time comes, for some provisional president acceptable to the Constitutionalists.

Just when the change will come, Esteva-Ruiz said he did not know.

"The president did not make me his confidant," he declared, "nor did I have much time to talk with him after it was determined that I should leave the cabinet."

Expects Resignation Immediately.

He was convinced, however, that Huerta would lay down his power during the coming week and it would not surprise him, he said, if his resignation were announced immediately.

Carbajal, he added, was suggested as provisional president by the American delegation at the Niagara Falls mediation conference and agreed to by Huerta's delegates and the South American mediators, while the Constitutionalists indirectly had conveyed the idea that he would be acceptable to Carranza.

"That is," explained the Mexican sub-secretary, "Carbajal would be a more provisional president than the real provisional president to be named later."

Explains Situation.

When the suggestion was first made Villa had not indicated his willingness to accept Carbajal, Esteva-Ruiz went on, and he doubted Villa's willingness to accept him now. As for Zapata he had no idea that the southern leader would recognize any provisional presidency until demands for the redistribution of lands had been complied with, and he intimated that objections to such a solution of Mexico's problem might come from certain parts of the northern states.

Unless something occurs to disarrange the present plan, Esteva-Ruiz is convinced that fighting between Federals and Constitutionalists is over. This, he said, was indicated by the evacuation of Guadalajara.

Like Porfirio Diaz, who fled from his country in the hope that his going might avert a long and costly civil war, Huerta, according to Esteva-Ruiz, has decided to yield to superior numbers. Both Huerta and General Blanquet, his minister of war, know that longer resistence is futile and would mean nothing more than the slaughter of thousands and perhaps the sacking of the capital itself, with horrors perpetrated by a victorious army joined by mad mobs from the slums of the city.

Blanquet to Leave, Also.

He expected Blanquet would leave Mexico City when Huerta fled, but not before, Enrique Gorostieta, minister of justice, had offered his resignation, so he had heard, but he was not sure the report was true. He assumed, however, that Gorostieta would resign and all the old cabinet as well.

Like Adolfo De La Gama, the Mexican minister of finance, who arrived here Saturday, also in flight to Europe, the sub-secretary of foreign affairs professed still to maintain his connection with the government. With his family he will sail from Vera Cruz on the steamer Alfonso XIII for Spain.

Carranza May Balk.

Laredo.—Reports from sources usually reliable were current in Nuevo Laredo that General Venustiano Carranza, interrogated by Huerta agents regarding acceptability of Francisco Carbajal as provisional president of Mexico, replied he would not recognize Huerta or any one chosen in this way to succeed him.

ZULUS AS TRAINED NURSES

Practical Work for Humanity Being Carried on by Missionaries in Africa.

The American board maintains in connection with its hospital in Durban, South Africa, a training department for nurses. A class of four has just graduated. Each girl received a newly designed pin, and in connection with her diploma Dr. James B. McCord, in charge of the hospital, gives to each a check for a sum amounting to five dollars a month for the time she was in training.

The girls are to serve among their own people, one being already employed at Inanda seminary, where her chance teaching will be carried far and wide.

We quote a few sentences from the graduating essay of one of these Zulu nurses. It shows how little she knew to start with, and also how thoroughly the essentials have been drilled into her mind. Miss Nomhlatuze Bhengu said:

"Our training as nurses has been a great help to us in many ways. We knew nothing about treatment of children in our own homes. Children are given solid food when very young, and they are not kept clean and warm, and they are fed irregularly, and many of our children die because they are not well treated and given strong medicine while still young. But here I have been taught that children should not be given solid food during the first ten months of their life. I have been taught that babies should nurse regularly at appointed intervals, should have a cleansing bath every day and clean clothes put on each day. . . .

"Here we have been taught to give patients baths every day, it does not matter how ill they may be. . . . We have also been taught how to keep the patients so other people will not get the same disease. We keep the patient by herself (in tuberculosis), her rishes and everything which we use about her near her bed and disinfect our hands whenever we touch her.

"We have learned to keep our bodies as they should be kept: such as taking baths every day, brushing our teeth and other necessary habits which are necessary to keep us well."

And so the little composition runs on, naively describing its writer's surprise at the surgery of the hospital, and naming some of the troubles which seemed to her most common or most wonderful in their cure. "When we leave here," she says, "we hope to teach others of our race to care for themselves and to help their friends in sickness and in health." And that missionary spirit is strong in all the Zulus who have come in touch with the Durban hospital.

A Fish Story.

"The inns of dear old England are picturesque," said Richard Le Gallienne, on his return from abroad, "but the food they serve is something terrible.

"After a visit to Blenheim palace I entered an inn in the quaint village of Woodstock. As I lunched—or tried to lunch—my landlord said to me:

"'The great dook off Marlborough once sat in that chair you're a settin' in, sir.'

"'Is that so?' said I.

"'And the dook once drunk 'is beer out o' that same mug you're a-drinkin' out of.'

"'And I bet,' said I, 'I bet he refused to eat this fish, too. Well, take it away, my man. I don't want it, either.'"

His Wish.

She (during the quarrel)—I only married you to spite Fred Johnson.

He (ruefully)—I wish to heaven you'd married Fred Johnson to spite me.

WRONG BREAKFAST.
Change Gave Rugged Health.

Many persons think that for strength, they must begin the day with a breakfast of meat and other heavy foods. This is a mistake as anyone can easily discover for himself.

A W. Va. carpenter's experience may benefit others. He writes:

"I used to be a very heavy breakfast eater but finally indigestion caused me such distress, I became afraid to eat anything.

"My wife suggested a trial of Grape-Nuts and as I had to eat something or starve, I concluded to take her advice. She fixed me up a dish and I remarked at the time that the quality was all right, but the quantity was too small—I wanted a saucerful.

"But she said a small amount of Grape-Nuts went a long way and that I must eat it according to directions. So I started in with Grape-Nuts and cream, two soft boiled eggs and some crisp toast for breakfast.

"I cut out meats and a lot of other stuff I had been used to eating all my life and was gratified to see that I was getting better right along. I concluded I had struck the right thing and stuck to it. I had not only been eating improper food, but too much.

"I was working at the carpenter's trade at that time and thought that unless I had a hearty breakfast with plenty of meat, I would play out before dinner. But after a few days of my "new breakfast" I found I could do more work, felt better in every way, and now I am not bothered with indigestion."

"LANGLEY'S FOLLY" VINDICATED

GETTING READY FOR THE TRIAL

GLEN CURTIS AT WHEEL OF "LANGLEY'S FOLLY"

PROF. SAMUEL P. LANGLEY'S memory has been vindicated. Glenn H. Curtiss has proved that the man who died of a broken heart because of the failure of his aeroplane was the first to construct a really practical heavier-than-air machine. Mr. Curtiss secured permission to take the Langley machine from the Smithsonian institute in Washington for the purpose of making tests. He made no changes whatever in the machine, merely restoring such parts as were broken. He made a short flight, demonstrating that Langley's principles were right and that the sole fault lay in the method of launching the machine.

Scientists long ago accorded to Professor Langley the full measure of credit due to him. The Wright brothers, who made a practical success where he had seemed to fail, have acknowledged the debt they owe to this unassuming man who drew his inspiration from the clouds and gave to man the eagle's secret. He had worked out for them the problems in aerodynamics, and left for them in algebraic formulae the data upon which all mechanical flight is based.

But in the mind of the public Langley was a failure, and Langley's aeroplane, tried and wrecked at historic Widewater, Va., on October 7, 1903, is "Langley's folly" now, as it was then, when the secretary of the Smithsonian institution returned North, stung by unjust and unthinking criticisms, but undaunted, and confident that he was on the "right track," determined to go ahead, a determination that was thwarted by his untimely death in 1906.

The history of invention has no record more pathetic than that of Samuel P. Langley. At the very moment when success was in his grasp, when the dreams of a lifetime were about to come true and the labors of years of toil to be rewarded, the cup was dashed from his lips through the failure, not of the invention itself, but of a purely mechanical contrivance of minor importance. Derided in congress and held up by the newspaper wits of the world as a target for their jests, Langley must have died a thoroughly discouraged man.

The experiments of 1903 were the culmination of years of patient effort. As far back as 1891 Professor Langley announced that as the result of experiments carried on by him during previous years it was "possible to construct machines which would give such a velocity to inclined surfaces that bodies indefinitely heavier than the air could be sustained upon it, and moved through it with great velocity."

President McKinley had become impressed with the possibilities of the airship as an engine of war, and in 1898, at the request of the board of ordnance and fortification of the war department, Professor Langley undertook the construction of a man-carrying flying machine, and an allotment of $50,000 was made for the purpose. The services of Charles M. Manly were secured as an assistant.

In his earlier tests with models Professor Langley had employed a small houseboat, from the roof of which he had launched them. He determined to follow the same procedure with the larger man-carrying airship, and, although advised not to do so, he persisted until the end in this determination. And it was the launching apparatus which caused the final failure!

An enormous houseboat, therefore, was built. Atop the house was the superstructure carrying a turntable, weighing about fifteen tons, supported on a circular track, an arrangement which was designed to make it possible for the aeroplane to be launched from the "roof," headed into the wind, without the necessity of turning the entire houseboat.

Finally on August 8 a quarter-size steam-driven model was launched from the top of the houseboat. It was in the air 27 seconds and covered about one thousand feet. The experiment was regarded as a success and gave the inventors great hopes for the success of the man-carrying machine. Numerous delays occurred to prevent the launching of this, and it was not until October 7 that the real Langley aeroplane was sent forth into the air, the first heavier-than-air machine carrying a man ever to attempt a flight.

A few days before this date the reporters at Widewater received from their home offices queries reading about as follows:

"Two brothers named Wright are said to be experimenting with an airship at Kitty Hawk, N. C. Ask Langley what he knows about it."

It was the first time any man in the reporters' camp had ever heard of those famous brothers from Dayton, Orville and Wilbur Wright. Not a man among them realized that they had received telegrams that were epoch-making.

Everybody in the United States was quite prepared to learn that the Langley airship, when the attempt to fly her on October 7 was made, was wrecked and the bold navigator of the air almost killed in his foolhardy attempt to emulate a real bird.

As a spectacle it was dramatic, impressive. The aeroplane was taken from the houseboat early in the morning, weather conditions being ideal for the first time in weeks, and under the direction of Mr. Manly was assembled with the greatest care.

The aeroplane was poised on the turntable atop the superstructure, fifty or sixty feet above the Potomac, with open water on all sides, and a vast stretch of unobstructed sailing area in three directions, so that in the event of success the aerodrome might have flown for miles. Had the aeroplane been tested on a level stretch of ground, which would have been possible had it been equipped with light bicycle wheels, that day might very well have witnessed man's triumph over gravity.

The aeroplane was a beautiful thing, like some great white bird poised there on the houseboat, and waiting only the signal to spring into the air. Its long, white Penaud tail added to its birdlike appearance.

It was about sixty feet in length, exclusive of the tail, with a main body elliptical in shape, to which were attached the four spreading white silken wings.

Mr. Manly weighed but 150 pounds. He was the lightest man in the party. Moreover, he was coinventor, and for these reasons he claimed the privilege and the honor of making the first flight as pilot.

As Mr. Manly climbed into his dizzy perch and took his seat he looked down at the handful of newspaper reporters who were gathered around the houseboat and who, in addition to the members of the Smithsonian staff and representatives of the army and navy, were the only witnesses, and smiled at them. The reporters gave him a cheer.

Manly started the motor and braced himself for the start.

The aeroplane, ready for its voyage, was held in leash on the turntable by a powerful spring, which, when released, would give it an initial velocity of about thirty-five feet per second, and enable it to clear the superstructure. As Mr. Manly put his hand to the lever and set his jaws the spring was released.

There was a whirring noise increasing to a roar, as if a thousand eagles were passing overhead. It was 12:20 o'clock p. m. when she started. The great birdlike thing flew swiftly over the 60-foot track of the launching apparatus, passed over the edge of the houseboat, and then something happened.

Instead of soaring off into the air like the thing of life she looked her beak dipped, and she shot downward, plunging head first into the river only 50 yards from the houseboat. The propellers worked perfectly until the very last, and one of them broke as it struck the water a powerful blow.

Then the whole airship, every vestige of it, even to the tip of its beautiful white tail, disappeared beneath the surface of the river.

Suddenly the soldier on the houseboat came to life and shouted a command. A boat was tied at the stern, and into this a squad of workmen threw themselves, and pulled off for the scene of the disaster. Then the airship floated to the surface, and Mr. Manly's head bobbed up.

There was half a smile on his face, but no sign of fear, although he was not yet saved. Entangled in the wreckage, his lifebelt did him but little service. However, he managed to hold himself up until the first boat to reach the spot came up, when he was hauled aboard, none the worse for his ducking.

The official explanation of the failure was that the front guypost caught in its support on the launching apparatus and was not released in time to give free flight, as intended, but caused the front of the machine to be dragged downward, bending the guypost and causing the aeroplane to plunge into the water.

Discouraged, but not disheartened, Mr. Manly took the wrecked machine back to Washington. It was growing late in the year. The available fund of money was about exhausted, and it was realized that unless a better showing could be made there would be no more funds forthcoming from congress. Workmen were set to the task of getting the aeroplane ready for another flight before winter set in.

Although the main frame and the engine were not damaged, other delicate portions were so badly injured that two months were required for the repairs to be made, and it was not until December 8 that everything was in readiness for another flight. Despite the lateness of the season, Mr. Manly determined to make one more effort to prove that the Langley aeroplane would fly.

It was bitterly cold, and there was ice on the river when, on the afternoon of December 8, between four and five o'clock, the houseboat was towed from her berth at one of the wharves at Washington to Arsenal point, where the eastern branch enters the Potomac. Here was a space barely sufficient for the requirements of the aviator in his extremity.

The engine worked perfectly as the propellers were set in motion. But again the launching apparatus was at fault. This time the rear guy post seemed to catch, bringing the rudder, or tail, down on the superstructure. As the aeroplane, looking ghostly in the deepening night, shot over the edge of the houseboat, her nose pointed toward the arsenal, there was a grinding noise. The rear wings collapsed, the whole machine plunged downward, and Mr. Manly for the second time was carried beneath the waves.

This time his escape was narrower than it had been at Widewater in October. In the darkness and confusion his location was lost sight of, and while men looked for him in small boats he remained beneath the water tangled in the wreckage, stunned, and with his head cut open. He was found just in the nick of time, taken aboard the houseboat and resuscitated.

The workmen toiled until midnight in the icy waters recovering the wrecked airship, twice saved from the waters of the Potomac. The aerodrome was finally taken to the Smithsonian shops, where it was partially repaired. It has been stored there until its recent removal to Hammondsport for its third attempt at flying.

STATE BREVITIES

Hastings.—The barn of John Cunnine in Marshan was struck by lightning and burned.

Rushmore.—Humiston & St. John of Worthington have purchased the Pacific elevator at Rushmore.

Hastings.—John Krupt of South St. Paul has been granted a divorce from his wife, Mrs. Leny Krupa, for desertion.

Nashwauk.—While his sister held a blistering cap in her hand, Carl Rapinatz attempted to ignite it, with the sult that both were seriously injured.

Duluth.—James J. Ryia, who sued his wife's parents, Charles and Sarah Atol, for alienation of the affections of his wife, has been awarded a verdict of $450.

Winona.—With the Mississippi river falling rapidly, after having reached a high stage, thousands of new lakes in which fish will be trapped, will be created.

Little Falls.—Little Falls lodge, No. 770, B. P. O. E., formed an automobile party to go to the Elks' circus at St. Cloud Thursday. The St. Cloud Elks bought out the entire seating capacity of the Sells-Floto circus and put the seats on sale at 25 cents each.

Mankato.—As it lay in a crib beside its sleeping parents, the 2-months-old child of Mr. and Mrs. A. B. Van Reiner, farmers, was bitten on the foot by a rat. The babe was hastily taken to a doctor, who cauterized the wound, but the child developed such a high temperature that its recovery is doubtful.

Bemidji.—Beltrami, Koochiching and Hubbard counties will build a sanatorium jointly. The site of it may be north of Lavina, on Bass lake, according to the decision made at a joint meeting of commissioners of the three counties at International Falls. Beltrami county owns the land in question.

Mankato.—The entrance of the Dan Patch Electric line into this city, which was accomplished when the electric line began to operate over the Great Western tracks between here and Faribault and between Randolph and Northfield, has been the subject of much favorable comment at this point and at others along the road.

Moorhead.—While the 7-year-old daughter of Mr. and Mrs. C. W. Simmons was carrying a package of fireworks under her arm, a man stepped up behind her and touched a match to the fuse. The explosion set the girl's clothing afire and burned her severely. The stranger laughed and escaped with angry citizens on his trail.

Crosby.—Crazed by jealousy, John Valliancourt, proprietor of a restaurant here, killed his wife and escaped to the woods north of here. The murdered woman took poison a few days ago, following a quarrel with her husband, and was being attended by a nurse. Early this morning Vallaincourt entered her room and cut her throat. She died instantly.

Moose Lake.—Hilda and Marie Fiske, 17 and 11 years, respectively, and Irene Fox, 17 years old, drowned in a small lake on the farm of Morris Obon, near here. The girls were bathing and Marie got beyond her depth. Her sister went to her aid and when she sank Irene Fox attempted in vain to save both her companions. The bodies have been recovered.

St. Paul.—Fire losses in Minnesota decreased $167,000 from the losses of June, 1914, the figures being $217,339, as compared with $384,648 for the previous June. The greatest decrease is shown in the rural sections, in which the losses fell from $222,000 to $95,000. Minneapolis losses show a decrease from $117,000 to $65,000, but Duluth comes in with a small increase and St. Paul with practically an even showing.

Austin.—Routine business concerning the 1914 state fair occupied the attention of the state fair board in session here. The work of preparing the grand stand and exhibit buildings for the fair was discussed. The next meeting will be held about Aug. 1, probably in St. Paul. All members of the board attended yesterday except C. P. Craig, Duluth; E. J. Stillwell, Minneapolis, and W. W. Slyright, Minneapolis. The members were entertained at a smoker at the Commercial club.

Canby.—John Swenson, founder of Canby, is dead after an illness of several months. The funeral was held at his late home. Mr. Swenson was born in Ness, Telemarken, Norway, Nov. 5, 1842, and was graduated from the Aske seminary as a parochial school teacher, which vocation he followed until his departure for the United States. He was married in Wisconsin in 1870 and two years later took a homestead in this county. On the death of General Canby, in April, 1873, Mr. Swenson and others sent a petition to the postoffice department asking for the establishment of a postoffice with John Swenson as postmaster, which was immediately granted. This was about the time of the coming of the Northwestern railroad, which added impetus to the situation and the name of Canby became a part of the state map.

Luverne.—The rye harvest in Rock county is just beginning. The yield is up to the average, but the acreage is small. Other small grain is in good condition and the cutting will begin earlier than usual. The corn, except in the lowlands, which were frequently flooded, is in good condition and is several weeks ahead of time. The crop will be fully as large as that of last year. The yield of hay will be the largest known here in years.

Bemidji.—Mrs. Flora M. Cox of Ten Strike stepped from a sandbar into a deep hole in Gull lake while bathing and was drowned.

SMOKE BARS VISIT

Tourist's Contemplated Trip to Vesuvius Is Postponed.

Writer Tells of the Difficulties Encountered in "Doing" Naples and Its Surrounding Attractions and Points of Interest.

Naples.—The difficulty of "doing" Naples and its surrounding attractions and points of interest within a positively limited time was demonstrated, writes a correspondent, when with a trip to the crater of Vesuvius in mind, I surveyed the cone from my window balcony. Thick clouds enveloped the truncated cone, and there was no sign of a change of wind to clear away the mist and smoke sufficiently to permit a view of the boiling depths. So, inasmuch as there were other things that must be done to prepare for the morrow's sailing for home, I regretfully postponed my visit to the volcano until some other time in the uncertain future. Perhaps the bronze pledges given at Rome will prove effective in insuring a return, and then Vesuvius surely will be seen.

But fortune was not altogether unfavorable, for by a good chance during the day I met, at the office of the American consul, Mr. Jay White, two scientists from Washington, who have come over for the purpose of studying the volcanic activities in Italy. Prof. Arthur L. Day of the Carnegie institution and Prof. Henry Stephens Washington of the geophysical laboratory. They will spend several months here and in Sicily, observing conditions and endeavoring to obtain specimens of the gases emitted from Vesuvius, Etna and Stromboli, in their research into the nature of the forces which cause eruptions. It is to be hoped that they will have the good fortune to gain information to aid in the evolution of a substantial working hypothesis explanatory of the most baffling phenomenon now confronting natural science.

Later in the day Vesuvius cleared off finely, a tantalizing trick that made the postponement of the trip to the top hard to endure philosophically. But it is quite well assured that the big chimney will continue to smoke for a long time to come, and perhaps when I come again it will be performing more spectacularly than at present. As I write, in the evening's rosy glow that makes the bay of Naples indescribably beautiful, it is smoking away grandly, rolling its white steam high aloft before the wind carries it in a streamer off to the southeast.

Neapolitan Peasant.

I have been devoting part of this last full day in Italy to a study of street conditions in this lively, noisy Naples. It is a continuous torment of temptations. Every corner presents an inviting prospect of interesting scenes, but it is hard to know whether to turn or go straight ahead. One street is much like another, in general aspect, save that some are practicable for vehicles and others are not. The latter ascend the precipitous hillsides in series of stone steps, which swarm with humanity. At the end of one of these "gradoni," or steep streets, where it meets a thoroughfare, will often be a group of flower stalls, giving a vivid dash of color to the scene. Far above stretches the steep stone staircase, with the buildings so close together that the clothing hung out of windows on sticks and on wires drying, almost obscure the view of the sky.

Slaps at Wedding Service.

Philadelphia.—Declaring that the marriage service is a "poll parrot" affair, Dr. Anna Howard Shaw, the noted suffragette, urged that the ceremony be remodeled. Dr. Shaw said that she would not officiate at the wedding of a bride who promised to obey.

THE SUNBEAM.

BY W. G. HUNT.

Published every Friday, at Sunbeam, Pennington County. Minnesota.

Entered as Second-class matter August 30 1905, at the post office at Sunbeam Minn. under the Act of Congress of March 3,1879

Attorney Fred L Farley is a candidate for county attorney of Red Lake county and if the people down there want a good man in that position they will not make any mistake by voting for Farley.

There is some talk of a court house "gang," by some people who are looking for the other fellows job, but this kind of talk never did appeal to us for we are not in favor of turning a good man out of office to give the position to a new man on the principal of passing favors around.

The natural tendency is to let things political slide until a few days before election, and then make one's mind, largely along lines of political prejudice. That is a splendid way to get "machine" rule. The politicians have it all figured out on that basis, and as long as the people vote, not their business judgment, but their political prejudices, the "machine" will exist, no matter how loudly reform may be talked, and no matter what party may be in power.

There is especial need this fall for the selection of men who will upset the plans of politicians. Such men need not be "agin" everything and everybody. If so they will accomplish nothing. What the state today needs is a legislature made up of men who are not merely personally but collectively honest—who will treat the affairs of the state as they would the affairs of a great private business.

It is now time to study the candidates. Have they shown business capacity as well as moral uprightness? If not, do you want to send them to help spend your tax money? And remember that it is the legislature and not the governor that is responsible for the growth in taxation, and the direction that that growth takes.

Governor Eberhart is stil traveling outside the state on lecturing tours, but he will have to travel as plain Adolphus Olson Eberhart, after January 1st. However he expects to become a candidate for U.S. Senator in opposition to Senator Clapp, but he will be defeated worse than he was for Governor, as he has established a record of not staying on the job that the people give him to do. What Minnesota wants is a Senator that will remain at Washington.

The Thief River Falls Times says rumors are afloat that Hon D.P. O'Neill will bring action against THE SUNBEAM. Sail in Dan we live on section 29 town of Highlanding! We have not said much yet but we propose to publish some of your record before November. When a lawyer tells you that you have any action against us tell him he is mistaken, as we publish facts, just cold facts from your record Daniel, that's all.

The Green Sailor.

Mark Twain was once talking about a play that had failed.

"No wonder it failed," he said. "It's author was a greenhorn. He knew no more of stagecraft that young Tom Bowling knew of sailoring when he shipped before the mast.

"Greenhorn Tom, you know, being told to go aloft one dark, wet night, started up the rigging with a lantern and an umbrella."

Most Important.

"The customs inspector evidently realized that we were important people."

"So?"

"Yes; he passed some baggage with hardly a glance, but when he came to us he was careful to go through everything."—Louisville Courier-Journal.

WHY WE WILL NOT SUPPORT O'NEIL.

Last week we showed up some of Mr. O'Neill's drainage record, which we shall again take up later, but as some of our subscribers are not much interested on that subject we will take up some of his record on other matters of vital importance to the people of this district, to show you how he voted. Read carefully and you can readily see where he voted in favor of the corporations, mine owners and twin cities.

Aside from County Option, there were several other measures that gave more power to the people. On these measures Mr. O'Neil's record is considerably mixed. He was one of the 80 house members to vote for equal suffrage for women — House Journal, Feb. 11, P. 11.

He also voted for the Initiative and Referendum Bill and for the Recall Bill on final passage; but he fell down badly on one amendment offered to the Initiative and Referendum Bill. G. W. Brown of McLeod county, a recognized leader of those opposed to advanced progressive measures, attempted to amend the Initiative and Referendum Bill so as to prohibit the circulation of petitions. Now the right to circulate petitions is a natural, inherent right—a most sacred right—that ought never to be taken away from the citizen. But Mr. O'Neil voted for Brown's amendment.—House Journal, Feb. 6, P. 9,

His vote was cast against the Bjorge Bill to impose a tonnage tax on producing mines instead of the present advalorem tax for state purposes.

This was one of the most just tax laws that was ever introduced in the legislature but O'Neil thought that as the mine owners had stolen the iron mines from the state, they might as well steal the taxes. Let the farmers pay the taxes. O'Neil was representing the farmers you know.

One of the most vital questions before the legislature hinged around the subject of the control of public utility corporations.

The U. S. Courts have held that Minneapolis has no power to control the charges of the General Electric Co., of that city. The people must use electricity and are at the mercy of that company. Early in the session Mr. Nolan introduced a bill conferring this power on Minneapolis and a similiar power on all other cities of the state to control the charges of their own public utility corporations. The bill passed the house without a dissenting vote. Then the corporations—especially the General Electric Company—got very busy; but in spite of all they could do, the bill passed the senate with only five votes against it.

About the same time both houses had passed the so-called Minnette-Holmberg Bill compelling the telephone companies to make physical connections so that the patrons of one rural company could talk with the subscribers of other rural or city lines.

Now the N. W. Telephone Co., also got very busy. The Governor vetoed both bills, and in his veto message made a threat to call the legislature in special session to pass a general Utility Commission bill, and here another vital point comes in. If there is any one thing that is a fundamental principal of our system of government—a sacred principle of democracy in the broadest and best sense of the word—it is the principle that the people of each village and city shall control their own local affairs. The public service corporations don't like this. They prefer a state commission, which they can more easily control.

Accordingly early in the session there appeared in the Senate two bills, each aimed toward creating just such a commission as the corporations wanted. Later there appeared in the house an almost exact copy of the worst of these bills, but masquerading as a good bill, claiming that all the bad features of the Senate bill had been cut out. There was very scant time to examine this bill; but its bad features were pretty thoroughly shown up in the debate. Still it received thirty votes to eighty-one against it—One of the thirty was Mr. O'Neil's. Nearly all the others were well known special interest men.—House Journal, Feb. 11, P. 7.

Now the fight in the house centered around two vetoes. Every influence was brought to bear to induce members to sustain the vetoes; but in spite of all that could be done the telephone bill was passed over the veto 95 to 13 and the Nolan bill, 83 to 27. The telephone bill was of vital interest to the rural districts; the Nolan bill was of vital interest to the cities. Both bills involved the same fundamental principle—the control of a public utility, Mr. O'Neil voted against the veto of the rural telephone bill, but to sustain the veto of the city—Nolan bill. One or the other of these votes will be hard to explain.—House Journal, Apr. 19, P. 54-25.

Hay is a very good crop this season.

Post cards for sale at this office.

Wild raspberries are very plentiful this year.

At this season of the year the farmer editor is busy haying.

Some of the farmers are of the opinion that the blasting on ditch 53 is what is causing the rain.

Even J. Sund is making some substantial improvements on his farm this summer.

The weather has been very unfavorable for haying the past week, and very little hay will be put up that has not at least had one good soaking by rain.

Work on the branches of ditch 53 is progressing steadily and there is a good prospect that it will be finished this summer. The N. W. Drainage Company now have charge of the work.

This is a very busy time of year for us, as we are doing more farming than lots of farmers who have no business to attend to, and we are doing more business than lots of business firms who have no farm to attend to.

Ditching on ditch 42 is again reported as stopped. This is one of the ditches that is badly needed, and it is too bad that some arrangement could not have been made to have had that walking dredge that completed 47, finish that ditch.

Buttermaker Lindahl informs us that the receipts of cream at the Highlanding Creamery have fallen off the past two weeks, and it is no wonder as the poor cows have been chased all day by those big horse flies and at night by the mosquitoes, which are very vicious this year.

As O'Neil has given out that he is going to commence action against the Thief River Falls News-Press and The Sunbeam, we would suggest that he wait until November so as to bunch the cases and try them all at the same time, as there is no use to be trying a case for every weekly issue as our articles are all marked "To be continued."

Now that plans for flying across the Atlantic Ocean in a hydroaeroplane are practically completed it is interesting to look to the earliest attempts at flying through space. We publish in THE SUNBEAM this week an illustrated article on "Langley's Folly" which shows that the man who died of a broken heart because of the failure of his aeroplane was the first to construct a really practical heavier-than-air machine.

We understand that the picnic at James O'Brien's July 4th was severely criticized by a speaker at the Young People's Society last Sunday, but he should remember that the 4th only comes once a year, and he should not object to every American citizens celebrating after his own ideas. Some people would prefer celebrating at a temperance lecture, while others might want a a glass or two of beer. Give them all a chance to celebrate as they want to on this day as as there is no harm done.

There is one bad weed that is rapidly increasing in this locality, call the sow thistle. This is the worst weed that we have to contend with for where it grows nothing else will grow. Grain will grow amongst Canada thistles or mustard, but where this thistle grows all other vegetation is choked out. It has a yellow flower on top and is now in full blossom and the farmers should take especial pains to not let this pest go to seed; for if it gets a good start on one corner of your farm it will drive you off the opposit corner in a few years.

The early sown grain is now well headed out.

Frank LaCount has been delivering hay to the ditch diggers this week.

Ye editor is busy stacking hay to-day, instead of writing local news.

Andrew Feland has built him quite an extensive horse barn on his farm this spring.

The hot weather seems to have broken, and yesterday and today are quite a relief from the warm weather that we have been having.

Abel Bost is driving one of C.L. Clarks teams on ditch 53. Mr. Clark is getting $9.00 a day for himself and teams.

ADHESIVE POSTAGE STAMPS.

The First Crude Ones That Were Issued by Great Britain.

The adhesive postage stamp had its origin in England as a direct outcome of the postal reforms introduced by Sir Rowland Hill, whose master mind created not only the inestimable boon of penny postage, but the means by which it was carried into effect—the adhesive postage stamps.

At the time of the passing of the uniform penny postage act in 1839 all postal charges were paid in cash (usually on delivery), involving an enormous amount of bookkeeping on the part of the postoffice, which would have been increased a hundredfold when the reduced rates of postage came into force but for the suggestion of the great postal reformer for "a bit of paper just large enough to bear the stamp and coated at the back with a glutinous wash," being subsequently embodied in the famous one penny black postage label and its consort, the twopence blue, which made their debut in May, 1840, and were the progenitors of all adhesive postage stamps.

For three short years Great Britain enjoyed a monopoly of this novel and handy method of collecting postage, until in July, 1843, the enlightened empire of Brazil followed suit with a series of unprepossessing adhesive labels of native manufacture, adorned with large numerals of value in place of a design.

In 1847 the United States entered the field with two beautifully engraved portraits of Franklin and Washington, while the head of Ceres, the goddess of agriculture, found place on the first stamps of the French republic, engraved by the elder Barre, which made their debut on Jan. 1, 1849.—Strand Magazine.

The Duelist's Disease.

Dr. Pean, a Paris physician, was called as a physician to attend a duel. One of the adversaries was so cowardly that he ran away after the first shot unhurt. The four seconds, the remaining combatant and the doctor stood looking at each other with embarrassment and discomfiture when Dr. Pean broke the silence by saying gravely, "I know the disease that has suddenly attacked this gentleman." And, taking out his pencil and paper, he drew up a report as follows: "At the first shot Mr. X. was taken with a sudden attack of tachypodia that would not yield to treatment. The seconds therefore, on consultation with the physician, stopped the duel." Thus "honor" was saved.

EVER SEE A PINK MONKEY?

This South American Brand Is Worse Than the Other Kind.

If you should ever happen to be wandering about the Choco section of Colombia it would be well to have an eye out for the sobbing monkey. If this animal gets on your trail you might as well ring down the curtain and put a period after yourself.

When it gets after the Colombian Indians, according to H. G. Spurrell, naturalist and member of the London School of Tropical Medicine, the Indian listens to the beast's soul withering sobs for three days and three nights and then commits suicide.

Mr. Spurrell says that the sobbing monkey is pink and is one of the most rare animals in South America. For reasons that have never been made clear the sobbing monkey will at certain times in the year leave its home in the most impenetrable wilderness and go to the nearest Indian encampment, where it will select its victim and follow him day and night, keeping up a continual weeping and wailing.

According to tribal traditions this is a sure sign that the victim will shortly be taken with the sleeping sickness or some other fatal disease. It has been customary for the natives to listen to the monkey's sobbing for three days and three nights and then commit suicide, thus avoiding death by the dreaded sickness.—New York Mail.

MIND AND HEALTH.

Physical Conditions Often at the Mercy of Mental Attitudes.

A scientist writes: "A woman fancied she had swallowed a frog and was rapidly sinking. The efforts of physicians failed to afford her relief. It occurred to some one that she might be deluded into health. A tiny frog was caught and put into a tube with which they were attempting to wash out her stomach. When the frog was thrown out of the tube the girl expressed relief and said she hoped they were satisfied her complaints had a real foundation. In a short time she was restored to health. This is only one of the instances in which the mind has affected the physical condition.

"No one doubts that persons have been frightened to death, and ridicule in statements of this kind should end The influence of the mind is a subject which calls for investigation and study. There is no question that mental agitation aggravates, if it does not cause, disease. Many a child droops and dies because it feels it is unappreciated and neglected. Many who survive drag out a miserable existence instead of being full of hope and joy and energy, promise and pleasure and making themselves useful in the world."—New York Press.

A Lonesome Donkey.

One summer Mr. Oakes, an eminent lawyer, sent his wife and young daughter to a farmhouse in the White mountains for a vacation. Shortly after he received an urgent request from the little girl to send her a pet donkey to use while there. She had read about donkeys and heard about them, but was not at all familiar with their peculiar vocalism.

The donkey arrived, and the child had many rides around the vicinity. She enjoyed it all hugely, except the animal's strange noises, which inspired her with the profoundest pity for his evident distress.

One day after vainly trying to subdue his vocalism she wrote a letter to her father, in which she said:

"Dear Father—I do wish you would come up here soon, my donkey is so very lonesome."—National Monthly.

The Hollow ◆ ◆ ◆ ◆ of Her Hand

by George Barr McCutcheon

COPYRIGHT, 1912, BY GEORGE BARR McCUTCHEON: COPYRIGHT, 1912 BY DODD, MEAD & COMPANY

CHAPTER XIX.

The Hollow of Her Hand.

When Booth called in the afternoon at Sara's apartment, he was met by the news that she was quite ill and could see no one—not even him. The doctor had been summoned during the night and had returned in the morning, to find that she had a very high temperature. The butler could not enlighten Booth further than this, except to add that a nurse was coming in to take charge of Mrs. Wrandall, more for the purpose of watching her symptoms than for anything else, he believed. At least, so the doctor had said.

Two days passed before the distressed young man could get any definite news concerning her condition. He unconsciously began to think of it as a malady, not a mere illness, due of course to a remark Carroll had dropped when Sara had told him the whole truth of the tragedy and of her own vindictive plans. It was Carroll himself who gave a definite report of Sara. He met the lawyer coming away from the apartment when he called to inquire.

"She isn't out of her head, or anything like that," said Carroll uneasily, "but she's in a bad way, Booth. I'll tell you what I think is troubling her more than anything else. Down in her heart she realizes that Hetty Castleton has got to be brought face to face with the Wrandalls."

"The deuce you say!"

"Today I saw her for the first time. Almost immediately she asked me if I thought the Wrandalls would treat Hetty fairly if they ever found out the truth about her. I said I thought they would. I didn't have the heart to tell her that their grievance undoubtedly would be shifted from Hetty to her, and that they wouldn't be likely to forgive her for the stand she'd taken. She doesn't seem to care, however, what the Wrandalls think of her. By the way, have you any influence over Hetty Castleton?"

"I wish I were sure that I had," said Booth.

"Do you think she would come if you sent her a cablegram?"

"I am going over—"

"She will have your letter in a couple of days, according to Sara, who seems to have a very faithful correspondent in the person of that maid. I shudder to think of the cable tolls in the past few months! I sometimes wonder if the maid suspects anything more than a loving interest in Miss Castleton. What I was about to suggest is this: Couldn't you cable her on Friday saying that Sara is very ill? This is Tuesday."

"I will cable, of course, but Sara must not know that I've done it."

"Can you come to my office tomorrow afternoon?"

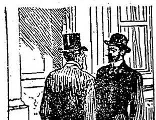
"Yes. Tomorrow night I shall go over to Philadelphia, to be gone till Friday. I hope it will not be necessary for me to stay longer. You never can tell about these operations."

"I trust everything will go well, Brandon."

Several things of note transpired before noon on Friday.

The Wrandalls arrived from Europe, without the recalcitrant colonel. Mr Redmond Wrandall, who met them at the dock, heaved a sigh of relief.

"He will be over on the Lusitania, next sailing," said Leslie, who for some reason best known to himself wore a troubled look.



He Met the Lawyer Coming Away From the Apartment.

Mr. Wrandall's face fell. "I hope not," he said, much to the indignation of his wife and the secret uneasiness of his son. "These predatory connections of the British nobility—"

"Predatory!" gasped Mrs. Wrandall.

"—are a blood-sucking lot," went on the old gentleman firmly. "If he comes to New York, Leslie, I'll stake my head he won't be long in borrowing a few thousand dollars from each of us. And he'll not seek to humiliate us by attempting to pay it back. Oh, I know them."

Leslie swallowed rather hard. "What's the news here, dad?" he asked briskly. "Anybody dead?"

"Sara is quite ill, I hear. Slow fever or some sort, Carroll tells me."

"Is she going to marry Brandy Booth?" asked his son.

Mr. Wrandall's face stiffened. "I fear I was a little hasty in my conclusions. Brandon came to the office a few days ago and informed me in rather plain words that there is absolutely nothing in the report."

"The deuce you say! 'Gad, I wrote her a rather intimate letter—" Leslie got no farther than this. He was somewhat stunned and bewildered by his private reflections.

Mr. Wrandall was lost in study for some minutes, paying no attention to the remarks of the other occupants of the motor that whirled them across town.

"By the way, my dear," he said to his wife, a trifle irrelevantly, "don't you think it would be right for you and Vivian to drop in this afternoon and see Sara? Just to let her know that she isn't without—"

"It's out of the question, Redmond," said his wife, a shocked expression in her face as much as to say that he must be quite out of his head to suggest such a thing. "We shall be dreadfully busy for several days, unpacking and—well, doing all sorts of necessary things."

"She is pretty sick, I hear," mumbled he.

"Hasn't she got a nurse?" demanded his wife.

"I merely offered the suggestion in order—"

"Well, we'll see her next week. Any other news?"

"Mrs. Booth, Brandon's mother, was operated on for something or other day before yesterday."

"Oh, dear! The poor thing! Where?"

"Philadelphia, of course."

"I wonder if—let me see, Leslie, isn't there a good train to Philadelphia at four o'clock? I could go—"

"Really, my dear," said her husband sharply.

"You forget how busy we are, mother," said Vivian, without a smile.

"Nonsense!" said Mrs. Wrandall, in considerable confusion. "Was it a serious operation, Redmond?"

"They cut a bone out of her nose, that's all. Brandon says her heart is weak. They were afraid of the ether. She's all right, Carroll says."

"Goodness!" cried Mrs. Wrandall. One might have suspected a note of disappointment in her voice.

"I shall go up to see Sara this afternoon," said Vivian calmly. "What's the number of her new apartment?"

"You have been up to see her, of course," said Mrs. Wrandall acidly.

He fidgetted. "I didn't hear of her illness until yesterday."

"I'll go up with you, Viv," said Leslie.

"No, you won't," said his sister flatly. "I'm going to apologize to her for something I said to Brandon Booth. You needn't tag along, Les."

At half-past five in the afternoon, the Wrandall limousine stopped in front of the tall apartment building near the park, a footman jerked open the door, and Miss Wrandall stepped out. At the same moment a telegraph messenger boy paused on the sidewalk to compute the artistic but puzzling numerals on the imposing grilled doors of the building.

Miss Wrandall had herself announced by the obsequious doorman, and stood by in patience to wait for the absurd rule of the house to be carried out: "No one could get in without being announced from below," said the doorman.

"I c'n get in all right, all right," said the messenger boy, "I got a tellygram for de loidy."

"Go to the rear!" exclaimed the doorman, with some energy.

While Miss Wrandall waited in Sara's reception hall on the tenth floor, the messenger, having traversed a more devious route, arrived with his message.

Watson took the envelope and told him to wait. Five minutes passed. Miss Wrandall grew very uncomfortable under the persistent though complimentary gaze of the street urchin. He stared at her, wide-eyed and admiring, his tribute to the glorious. She stared back occasionally, narrow-eyed and reproving, her tribute to the grotesque.

"Will you please step into the drawing-room, Miss Wrandall," said Watson, returning. He led her across the small foyer and threw open a door. She passed into the room beyond.

Then he turned to the boy who stood beside the hall seat, making change for a quarter as he approached. "Here," he said, handing him the receipt book and a dime, "that's for you." He dropped the quarter into his own pocket, where it mingled with coins that were strangers to it up to that instant, and imperiously closed the door behind the boy who failed to say "thank you." Every man to his trade!

There was a woman in the drawing-room when Vivian entered, standing well over against the windows with her back to the light. The visitor stopped short in surprise. She had expected to find her sister-in-law in bed, attended by a politely superior person in pure white.

"Why, Sara," she began, "I am so glad to see you are up and—"

The other woman came forward. "But I am not Sara, Miss Wrandall," she said, in a well-remembered voice. "How do you do?"

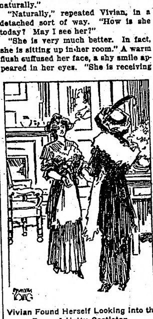
Vivian found herself looking into the face of Hetty Castleton. Instantly she extended her hand.

"This is a surprise!" she exclaimed. "When did you return? Leslie told me your plans were quite settled when he saw you in Lucerne. Oh, I see! Of course! How stupid of me. Sara sent for you."

"She has been quite ill," said Hetty, non-committally. "We got in yesterday. I thought my place was here, naturally."

"Naturally," repeated Vivian, in a detached sort of way. "How is she today? May I see her?"

"She is very much better. In fact, she is sitting up in her room." A warm flush suffused her face, a shy smile appeared in her eyes. "She is receiving two gentlemen visitors, to be perfectly honest, Miss Wrandall, her lawyer, Mr. Carroll, and—Mr. Booth."



Vivian Found Herself Looking Into the Face of Hetty Castleton.

They were seated side by side on the uncomfortable Louis Seize divan in the middle of the room.

"Perhaps she won't care to see me after an audience so fatiguing," said Miss Wrandall sweetly. "And so exasperating," she added, with a smile.

Hetty looked her perplexity.

"But she will see you, Miss Wrandall—if you don't mind waiting. It is a business conference they're having."

An ironic gleam appeared in the corner of Vivian's eye. "Oh," she said, and waited. Hetty smiled uncertainly. All at once the tall American girl was impressed by the wistful, almost humble look in the Englishwoman's eyes, an appealing look that caused her to wonder not a little. Like a flash she jumped at an obvious conclusion, and almost caught her breath. This girl loved Booth and was losing him! Vivian exulted for a moment and then, with an impulse she could not quite catalogue, laid her hand on the other's slim fingers, and murmured somewhat hazily: "Never mind, never mind!"

"Oh, you must wait," cried Hetty, not at all in touch with the other's mood. "Sara expects to see you. The men will be out in a few minutes."

"I think I will run in tomorrow morning," said Vivian hastily. She arose almost immediately and again extended her hand. "So glad to see you back again, Miss Castleton. Come and see me. Give my love to Sara."

She took her departure in some haste, and in her heart she was rejoicing that she had not succeeded in making a fool of herself by confessing to Sara that she had said unkind things about her to Brandon Booth.

Hetty resumed her seat in the broad French window and stared out over the barren treetops in the park. A frightened, pathetic droop returned to her lips. It had been there most of the day.

In Sara's boudoir, the doors of which were carefully closed, three persons were in close, even repressed conference. The young mistress of the house sat propped up in a luxurious chaise-lounge, wan but intense. Confronting here were the two men, leaning forward in their chairs. Mr. Carroll held in his hand a number of papers, prominent among them being three or four telegrams. Booth's face was radiant despite the serious matter that occupied his mind. He had reached town early in the morning in response to a telephone message from Carroll announcing the sudden, unannounced appearance of Hetty Castleton at his offices on the previous afternoon. The girl's arrival had been most unexpected. She walked in on Mr. Carroll, accompanied by her maid, who had a distinctly sheepish look in her eyes and seemed eager to explain something but could not find the opportunity.

With some firmness, Miss Castleton had asked Mr. Carroll to explain why the woman had been set to spy upon her every moment, a demand the worthy lawyer could not well meet for the good and sufficient reason that he wasn't very clear about it himself. Then Hetty broke down and cried, confessing that she was eager to go to Mrs. Wrandall, at the same time sobbing out something about a symbolic dicky-bird, much to Mr. Carroll's wonder and perplexity. He sent the maid from the room, and retired with Miss Castleton to the innermost of his private offices, where without much preamble he informed her that he knew everything. Moreover, Mr. Booth was in possession of all the facts and was even then on the point of starting for Europe to see her. Of course, his letter had failed to reach her in time. There was quite a tragic scene in the seclusion of that remote little office, during which Mr. Carroll wiped his eyes and blew his nose more than once, after which he took it upon himself to dispatch a messenger to Sara with the word that he and Miss Castleton would present themselves within half an hour after his note had been delivered.

The meeting between Sara and Hetty was affecting. . . . Almost immediately the former began to show the most singular signs of improvement. She laughed and cried and joyously announced to the protesting nurse that she was feeling quite well again! And, in truth, she got up from the couch on which she reclined and insisted on being dressed for dinner. In another room the amazed nurse was frantically appealing to Mr. Carroll to let her send for the doctor, only to be confounded by his urbane announcement that Mrs. Wrandall was as "right as a string" and, please God, she wouldn't need the services of doctor or nurse again for years to come. Then he asked the nurse if she had ever heard of a disease called "nostalgia."

She said she had heard of "homesickness."

"Well, that's what ailed Mrs. Wrandall," he said. "Miss Castleton is the cure."

Booth came the next morning. . . . Even as she lay passive in his arms, Hetty denied him. Her arms were around his neck as she miserably whispered that she could not, would not be his wife, notwithstanding her love for him and his readiness to accept her as she was. She was obdurate, lovingly, tenderly obdurate. He would have despaired but for Sara, to whom he afterwards appealed.

"Wait," was all that Sara had said, but he took heart. He was beginning to look upon her as a sorceress. A week ago he had felt sorry for her; his heart had been touched by her transparent misery. Today he saw her in another light altogether; as the determined, resourceful, calculating woman who, having failed to attain a certain end, was now intensely, keenly interested in the development of another of a totally different nature. He could not feel sorry for her today.

Hetty deliberately had placed herself in their hands, withdrawing from the conference shortly before Vivian's arrival to give herself over to gloomy conjectures as to the future, not only for herself, but for the man she loved and the woman she worshiped with something of the fidelity of a beaten dog.

• • • • • • • •

At a later conference participated in by Sara, Booth and Mr. Carroll, the old lawyer spoke plainly.

"Now are you both willing to give serious consideration to the plan I propose? Take time to think it over. No harm will come to Miss Castleton, I am confident. There will be a nine days' sensation, but, after all, it is the best thing for everybody. You propose living abroad, Booth, so what are the odds if—"

"I shan't live abroad unless Hetty reconsiders her decision to not marry me," said the young man dismally. "'Gad, Sara, you must convince her that I love her better than—"

"I think she knows all that, Brandon. As I said before, wait! And now, Mr. Carroll, I have this to say to your suggestion: I for one am relentlessly opposed to the plan you advocate. There is no occasion for this matter to go to the public. A trial, you say, would be a mere formality. I am not so sure of that. Why put poor Hetty's head in the lion's mouth at this late stage, after I have protected her so carefully all these months? Why, take the risk? We know she is innocent. Isn't it enough that we acquit her in our hearts? No, I cannot consent, and I hold both of you to your promises."

"There is nothing more I can say, my dear Sara," said Carroll, shaking his head gloomily, "except to urge you to think it over very seriously. Remember, it may mean a great deal to her—and to our eager young friend here. Years from now, like a bolt from the sky, the truth may come out in some way. Think of what it would mean then."

Sara regarded him steadily. "There are but four people who know the truth," she said slowly. "It isn't likely that Hetty or Brandon will tell the story. Professional honor forbids your doing so. That leaves me as the sole peril. Is that what you would imply, my dear friend?"

"Not at all," he cried hastily, "not at all. I—"

"That's all tommy-rot, Sara," cried Booth earnestly. "We just couldn't have anything to fear from you."

With curious inconsistency, she shook her head and remarked: "Of course, you never could be quite easy in your minds. There would always be the feeling of unrest. Am I to be trusted, after all? I have proved myself to be a vindictive schemer. What assurance can you and Hetty have that I will not turn against one or the other of you some time and crush you to satisfy a personal grievance? How do you know, Brandon, that I am not in love with you at this very—"

"Good heavens, Sara!" he cried, agape.

"— at this very moment?" she continued. "It would not be so very strange, would it? I am very human. The power to love is not denied me. Oh, I am merely philosophizing. Don't look so serious. We will suppose that I continued along my career as the woman scorned. You have seen how I smart under the lash. Well?"

"But all that is impossible," said Booth, his face clearing. "You're not in love with me, and never can be. That! for your philosophy!"

At the same instant he became aware of the singular gleam in her eyes; a liquid, oriental glow that seemed to reflect light on her lower lids as she sat there with her face in the shadow. Once or twice before he had been conscious of the mysterious, seductive appeal. He stared back at her, almost defensively, but her gaze did not waver. It was he who first looked away, curiously uncomfortable.

"Still," she said slowly, "I think you would be wise to consider all possible contingencies."

"I'll take chances, Sara," he said, with an odd buoyancy in his voice that, for the life of him, he could not explain, even to himself.

"Even admitting that such should turn out to be the case," said Mr. Carroll judicially, "I don't believe you'd go so far as to put your loyal friends in jeopardy, Sara. So we will dismiss the thought. Don't forget, however, that you hold them in the hollow of your hand. My original contention was based on the time-honored saying, 'murder will out.' We never can tell what may turn up. The best laid plans of men and mice oft—"

Sara settled back among the cushions with a peremptory wave of her hand. The loose, flowing sleeve fell away, revealing her white, exquisitely modeled arm almost to the shoulder. For some strange, unaccountable reason Booth's eyes fell.

"I am tired, wretchedly tired. It has been a most exhausting day," she said, with a sudden note of weariness in her voice. Both men started up apologetically. "I will think seriously of your plan, Mr. Carroll. There is no hurry, I'm sure. Please send Miss Wrandall in to me, will you? Perhaps you would better tell Hetty to come in as soon as Vivian leaves. Come back tomorrow afternoon, Brandon. I shall be much more cheerful. By the way, have you noticed that Dicky, out in the library, has been singing all afternoon as if his little throat would split? It is very curious, but today is the first time he has uttered a note in nearly five months. Just listen to him! He is fairly riotous with song."

Booth leaned over and kissed the hand she lifted to him. "He is like the rest of us, Sara, inordinately happy." A slight shiver ran through her arm. He felt it.

"I am so afraid his exuberance of spirit may annoy Vivian," said she, with a rare smile. "She detests vulgarity."

The men departed. She lay back in the chaise-lounge, her eyes fixed on the hand he had touched with his lips.

Watson tapped twice on the door.

"Miss Wrandall could not wait, ma'am," he said, opening the door softly. "She will call again tomorrow."

"Thank you, Watson. Will you hand me the cigarettes?"

Watson hesitated. "The cigarettes, ma'am?"

"Yes."

"But the doctor's orders, ma'am, begging your pardon for—"

"I have a new doctor, Watson."

"I beg pardon, ma'am!"

"The celebrated Doctor Folly," she said lightly.

CHAPTER XX.

Sara Wrandall's Decision.

"Now, you see what I mean, Brandon, when I insist that it would be a mistake for you to marry me," said Hetty in a troubled voice. "I feel that Sara will not let me go."

"That's pure nonsense, Hetty," he said. "She wants you to marry me, I am positive." He may have thought his tone convincing, but something caused her to regard him rather fixedly, as if she were trying to solve an elusive puzzle.

He took her by the arm and raised her to her feet. Holding her quite close, he looked down into her questioning eyes and said very seriously:

"You are suspicious, even of me, dearest. I want you. There is but one way for you to be at peace with yourself; shift your cares over to my shoulders. I will stand between you and everything that may come up to trouble you. We love one another. Why should we sacrifice our love for the sake of a shadow? For a week, dearest, I've been pleading with you; won't you end the suspense today—end it now—and say you will be my wife?"

The appeal was so gentle, so sincere, so full of longing that she wavered. Her tender blue eyes, lately so full of dread, grew moist with the ineffable sweetness of love, and capitulation was in them. Her warm, red lips parted in a dear little smile of surrender.

"You know I love you," she said tremulously.

He kissed the lovely, appealing lips, not once but many times.

"God, how I worship you," he whispered passionately. "I can't go on without you, darling. You are life to me. I love you! I love you!"

She drew back in his arms, the shadow chasing the light out of her eyes.

"We are both living in the present, we are both thinking only of it, Brandon. What of the future? Can we foresee the future? Dear heart, I am always thinking of your future, not my own. Is it right for me to bring you—"

"And I am thinking only of your future," he said gravely. "The future that shall be mine to shape and to make glad with the fulfilment of every promise that love has in store for both of us. Put away the doubts, drive out the shadows, dearest. Live in the light for ever. Love is light."

"If I were only sure that my shadows would not descend upon you, I—"

He drew her close and kissed her again.

"I am not afraid of your shadows. God be my witness, Hetty, I glory in them. They do not reflect weakness, but strength and nobility. They make you all the more worth having. I thank God that you are what you are, dear heart."

"Give me a few days longer, Brandon," she pleaded. "Let me conquer this strange thing that lies here in my brain. My heart is yours, my soul is yours. But the brain is a rebel. I must triumph over it, or it will always lie in wait for a chance to overthrow this little kingdom of ours. Today I have been terrified. I am disturbed. Give me a few days longer."

"I would not grant you the respite, were I not so sure of the outcome," he said gently, but there was a thrill of triumph in the tones. Her eyes grew very dark and soft and her lips trembled with the tide of love that surged through her body. "Oh, how adorable you are!" he cried, straining her close in a sudden ecstasy of passion.

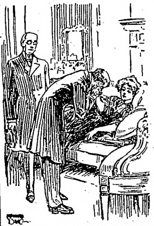
The doorbell rang. They drew apart, breathing rapidly, their blood leaping with the contact of opposing passions, their flesh quivering. With a shy, sweet glance at him, she turned toward the door to await the appearance of Watson. He could still feel her in his arms.

A drawling voice came to them from the vestibule, and a moment later Leslie Wrandall entered the library, pulling off his gloves as he came.

"Hello," he said glibly. "I told that fellow downstairs it wasn't necessary to announce me by telephone. Silly arrangement, I say. Why the devil should they think everybody's a thief or a book agent or a constable with a subpoena? He knows I'm one of the family. I'm likely to run in any time, I told him, and— Oh, I say, I'm not butting in, am I, Miss Castleton?"

He shook hands with both of them, and then offered his cigarette case to Booth, first selecting one for himself. Hetty assured him that he was not de trop, sheer profligacy on her part in view of his readiness to concede the point without a word from her.

"Nipping wind," he said, taking his stand before the fireplace. "Where is Sara? Never mind, don't bother her. I've got all the time in the world. By the way, Miss Castleton, what is the latest news from your father?"



Booth Kissed the Hand She Lifted to Him.

"I dare say you have later news than I," she said, a trace of annoyance in her manner.

Are Spices Injurious?

According to Dr. Gigon of Baesl, spices are a much abused constituent of the diet. He claims that instead of being injurious they are, as a rule, beneficial to the human system inasmuch as they stimulate the flow of saliva and of the gastric juices, thereby furthering digestion. Besides the aromatic spices—ginger, cinnamon, cloves, pepper, etc.—he adds and recommends salt. This last item is taboo by many dietitians. One of the leading sanatoriums of the country that for years condemned it is now commending it.

FURNISHED BOND OF AMITY

Discomfited "Good Samaritan" the Unwilling Means of Bringing Rival Humorists Together.

Once upon a time two humorists dwelt in the same small town and both contributed to the Sunday Star. As was but natural, they became wildly jealous of each other, and when one would win a little more prominence than his fellow the other would have seven kinds of fits. "Your Pleasant Valley Items give me a pain!" quoth one. "Your prose rhymes make me ill!" retorted the other. As they were about to come to blows there appeared on the scene a Good Samaritan, and to him they appealed. "Which of us is the funnier?" they asked. "Neither!" was the prompt reply. "You are both as unfunny as wart hogs, and as tiresome as a trip across the Sahara!" Thereat they both set upon the gentleman from Samaria and beat him full sore, and dwelt together in amity forever after.

Moral: From this we should learn that while humorists delight in quarreling among themselves, they frequently resent criticism from outsiders.—Kansas City Star.

Marriage Causes False Fire Alarm.

Seven minutes of blasts from the whistle of the Passaic Metalware company, in honor of the marriage of the daughter of the superintendent, recently turned out five volunteer fire departments. The fog made the whistle audible in Rutherford, Nutley, Belleville, Garfield and Clifton and the firemen rushed to headquarters at the alarm.

It took half an hour to determine where the whistling came from. The wedding which caused the commotion united Miss Sallie Karp, 217 Brook avenue, Passaic, to Michael F. Bernan.—New York Mail.

Ambrose Bierce, the brilliant satirist, gave, at a dinner in Washington, a few political definitions.

"A conservative," said Mr. Bierce, "is a statesman who is enamored of existing evils, while a radical would replace them with others."

"The Memory Lingers"

Modern Greek.

A stranger came into our office and graciously offered us some fruit which he said he purchased downstairs in the Greek grocery store. We asked him what Greek grocery, and he said the one right under us, in Holpos' place. We have been here some time and knew nobody of that name, and to satisfy our curiosity we went downstairs to have a look.

Sure enough, there was what did look like "Holpos" on the end of the awning, at least there were the letters "H Q L P O S" standing out in bold relief. We have learned since that it is an abbreviation used by the store which, when translated, means "Highest quality, lowest prices, our standard." To the average reader it's all Greek and would easily pass for a Hellenic name.—Quincy Ledger.

ECZEMA ON HANDS AND ARMS

1321 Douglas St., Omaha, Neb.—"My trouble began from a bad form of eczema all over my hands, neck and arms. I could get no sleep for the itching and burning. The small pimples looked red and watery and my skin and scalp became dry and itching. The pimples irritated me so that I would scratch until they bled. I could not put my hands in water and if I once tried it they burned so that I could not stand it. I had to have my hands tied up and gloves on all the time for nearly two months. Sometimes I would scratch the skin off it irritated so and I could do no work at all.

"I tried all kinds of remedies but nothing did any good. Then I saw in the newspaper about Cuticura Soap and Ointment and got some. I was completely healed in five or six weeks. They have not troubled me since." (Signed) Joe Uhl, Jan. 31, '14.

Suspicious.

"Too bad Jinx and his wife don't get along well together."

"Why, I always understood that they were an ideal couple."

"So did I, but they must have had a dreadful scrap before he started for work this mornin."

"Did he have a black eye?"

"No, but he stopped in when we were on our way home and bought her a five-pound box of candy."

Going Him One Better.

An English bishop, offering an orange to a little child, remarked, sweetly:

"Now, my little man, I shall give you this orange if you tell me where God is."

"My lord," answered the child, son of a clergyman, "I'll give you two oranges if you'll tell me where he is not."

Not So Much to Blame.

"I didn't know you were so accomplished a linguist," he remarked as he glanced at the paper she was reading.

"I don't make any pretensions in that direction," she answered.

"But that is a Russian newspaper you have picked up."

"Why, so it is," she answered in surprise. "I thought it was a dialect story."

Oh, That Way!

"It's such a silly superstition to be always picking up pins!"

"You may call it a superstition if you wish, but I know a chap who makes about $6 a week by doing it."

"How can a fellow gather that many?"

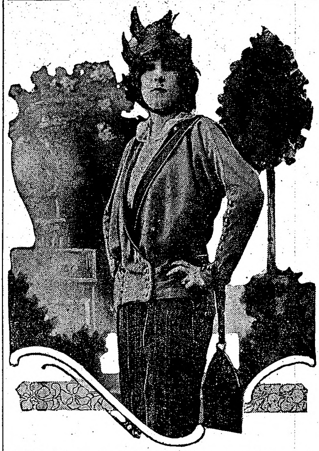
"He works in a bowling alley."—Judge.

A Rough Road.

"My dear sir," said the philosopher "when we look about us and see the troubles that afflict other people, we ought to rejoice that our own paths through life are made smooth."

"Your path may be smooth," sighed the pessimist, "but a thundering big steam roller would have to make a great many trips over mine before the bumps in it were pressed out."

Separate Jacket in Original Design



If YOU need a separate jacket for wear with summer toilettes, on any occasion where a little extra warmth must be provided, consider the wonderfully chic model pictured here. The ordinary coat or jacket which is called into requisition merely for warmth is apt to be commonplace and to take away from the costume something of style. Here is one that adds distinction. It is entirely original in line and has an amount of snap and vigor which is refreshing in these days of modes that are generally described as "sloppy."

Already the tide has set toward styles of a different character, and by fall we are likely to be quite military looking in our bearing and our trappings. This jacket is a premonition. It is from the establishment of one of the younger Paris costumers and belongs to a suit, in fact. This suit has a striped skirt of a material different from the jacket. Such suits have been made in cloth and in silk, and besides their charming effect they have been extraordinarily successful because the jackets are available for wear with other skirts and costumes.

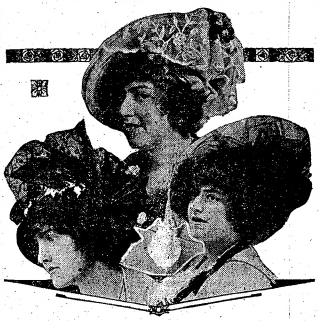
Light tans, modes and grays are a safe choice in color, and black is really the safest of all. Deep and quiet shades of green have been used with good effect and will harmonize with any other of the fashionable colors.

Buttons are featured on the jackets for midsummer. On silk and crepe suits flat pearl buttons in white, sewed down with black silk heavy thread make a decorative feature that is remarkably elegant. Black taffeta jackets, or others made of bengaline, have pearl buttons and the buttonholes are worked in white silk thread. Silver buttons are good on black and white combinations, and covered buttons, especially those made in the "acorn" style, are having just now a great vogue. The material of the suit, or its trimming, is used for covering the molds.

The jacket, or coat, shown here is a modified Russian blouse. Instead of a basque it is finished with a wide band of the material, extending about the hips. It is long waisted and becoming to figures somewhat stout, as well as to slender ones.

Other models in these separate jackets have the same advantages as this one. That is, they embody originality in design and the new style features in decoration which give them so much tone. If one looks for these characteristics the useful little separate jacket is sure to be a success.

Larger Hats for Midseason



SMALL hats still set the pace in millinery, and all our headwear is measured by small standards. But midsummer demands brimmed hats, and some of those of the midseason, compared with the hats to which we are daily accustomed, seem to deserve to be classed as large. They are very moderately so; the most daring ones have considerable width of brim at the left side, while the right side measures from four to five inches. And as they are on the order of the Gainsborough, with the brim turning upward and away from the face at the left, one looks for the width of brim that characterizes picturesque millinery.

Two attractive models of this kind are shown in the picture. One of them is a hemp in a light color and the other is a black straw. The hemp hat has a wide border on the under brim and is supported by a wide bandeau at the left. The bandeau is trimmed with velvet ribbon and a single rosebud with foliage and stem. The same velvet ribbon, with small compact bouquets, trims the upper brim, and the hat is finished with that last airy touch that belongs to the apex of summertime, a white lace veil.

A very similar shape is portrayed made up in black hair braid and black maline. The hat itself is small, with the brim much wider at left than at the right side. But the overlay of black maline in wide ruffles gives the effect of additional size. No color is introduced into this design. The big satin rose is of black set in black rose foliage.

Just now black and white, all black and all white hats are in highest favor. In the third figure a black shape of lustrous straw is trimmed with a wired ruffle of lace and a fan of black moire ribbon. White satin daisies, centered with black, are applied to the body of the hat, mounted flat against it. They are set in black satin rose foliage.

This shape is medium in size but by comparison with the majority of similar shapes it may be called large.

JULIA BOTTOMLEY.

HOW HE TURNED THE TRICK

After This, Mr. Mordical Hammerfest Must Be Credited With Knowing a Thing or Two.

Mrs. Mordecai Hammerfest turned pale as her husband entered the dining-room for breakfast.

"Mordy!" she gasped. "Do you—don't you feel well?"

"Perfectly," he replied in seeming surprise.

"But—but, are you in your—your underduds!"

"Tell me something I don't know. Pass the butter, please," said Mr. Hammerfest.

She passed the butter, remarking nervously: "But, Mordy, dear, as you came in I saw you didn't have any shoes on."

"Well, what of it. Your hair is in curl papers, isn't it?"

"Why—y-yes."

"And you have on a wrapper, haven't you?"

"Yes."

"Very well, then."

And he went on eating his breakfast in silence except when he asked her to pass the butter. Then he went upstairs and finished dressing, and the next morning and on succeeding mornings she reported for breakfast in regular clothes.

AWOKE THE HUNTER INSTINCT

Alert Traveler Evidently Imagined Providence Had Thrown "Game" Within His Reach.

Gilbert Parker, the English author, tells of an English gentleman, who recently came to this country to visit some friends in California. "In common with most travelers he supposed game was plentiful everywhere in that state, so he carried with him the necessary guns and ammunition.

"As his train neared San Bernardino—just before making the mountain climb—there was a delay. Several hours passed, and still the train remained stationary; and our traveler friend grew restive, and sought the porter of the Pullman car to ascertain the cause of thet delay.

"It seems that in mounting the grade a freight train had broken apart, the rear portion having descended the grade and blocked the track. The porter informed him of the accident to the freight train, and said, 'There is a caboose on the track.'

"Immediately the 'hunter' instinct was awakened; hastening to his berth, he procured his gun and started for the door saying:

"'Show it to me! Show it to me!'"

Real Tragedy of the Stage.

A beautiful actress, Fraulein Darmer, was killed by accident recently, while playing at the Theater of Varieties at Berne, Switzerland. The last act of the comedy, "The Pride of the Third Company," was coming to an end when Fraulein Darmer fell through a defective stage trap to a distance of six feet and fractured her skull. The actress was carried unconscious to her room and a doctor was in prompt attendance, but the case was beyond his help, and as the curtain fell on the comedy on the stage the girl died. Neither the members of the company who took the final "call" nor the public, who wondered why the actress did not appear, had the slightest idea of the tragedy that had occurred behind the scenes.

An Apposite Choice.

Bishop Evans Tyree at a dinner in Nashville was asked if he had any idea of preaching on the new fashions —the backless evening gown, slashed skirt and so forth.

"No," said the bishop; "such an idea has not occurred to me. If, however, I should preach on the new fashions I would assuredly choose my text from Revelation."

Bless the Ladies.

"Our congressional committee heard 30 ladies in two hours. That many men could have kept us listening for several days."

"That shows that women can transact public business. But how did they manage to crowd 30 speeches into two hours?"

"Oh, they spoke three and four at a time."—Kansas City Journal.

COULD NOT STAND ON FEET

Mrs. Baker So Weak—Could Not Do Her Work—Found Relief In Novel Way.

Adrian, Mich.—"I suffered terribly with female weakness and backache and got so weak that I could hardly do my work. When I washed my dishes I had to sit down and when I would sweep the floor I would get so weak that I would have to get a drink every few minutes, and before I did my dusting I would have to lie down. I got so poorly that my folks thought I was going into consumption. One day I found a piece of paper blowing around the yard and I picked it up and read it. It said 'Saved from the Grave,' and told what Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has done for women. I showed it to my husband and he said, 'Why don't you try it?' So I did, and after I had taken two bottles I felt better and I said to my husband, 'I don't need any more,' and he said 'You had better take it a little longer anyway.' So I took it for three months and got well and strong."—Mrs. ALONZO E. BAKER, 9 Tecumseh St., Adrian, Mich.

Sporting Instinct Aroused.

The street-corner orator had gathered around him a group of urchins. Why they listened so attentively he didn't understand; nor probably did they know themselves. Simply nothing doing. But the orator took full advantage of his opportunity and delivered an improving lecture on the value of kindness to dumb animals. At the end he sought for some illustration to point the moral and adorn the tale. It was there at hand. Across the way walked a lady, leading two little dogs in leash. The one was black and the other white. "Now," exclaimed the tub-thumper, "after what I have said, supposing those two dear little dogs were to start fighting, what would be the first thing you would do?" No answer came at first; but one little arab turned to look at the dogs critically and thoughtfully. "Well guv'nor," he answered, at last, "I fink I'd 'ave tuppence on the little black 'un!".

White House Rose Garden.

The rose garden that Mrs. Woodrow Wilson had planted at the White House is said to be quite equal to others that she planned at Princeton and other places where she has lived. She and her daughters have spent much time, not only in superintending the work of the rose garden, but in actually working in it.

It requires considerable tact to remember a woman's birthday and to forget her age.

Save the Babies.

INFANT MORTALITY is something frightful. We can hardly realize that of all the children born in civilized countries, twenty-two per cent., or nearly one-quarter, die before they reach one year; thirty-seven per cent., or more than one-third, before they are five, and one-half before they are fifteen!

We do not hesitate to say that a timely use of Castoria would save a majority of these precious lives. Neither do we hesitate to say that many of these infantile deaths are occasioned by the use of narcotic preparations. Drops, tinctures and soothing syrups sold for children's complaints contain more or less opium or morphine. They are, in considerable quantities, deadly poisons. In any quantity, they stupefy, retard circulation and lead to congestions, sickness, death. Castoria operates exactly the reverse, but you must see that it bears the signature of Chas. H. Fletcher. Castoria causes the blood to circulate properly, opens the pores of the skin and allays fever.

Genuine Castoria always bears the signature of Chas. H. Fletcher.

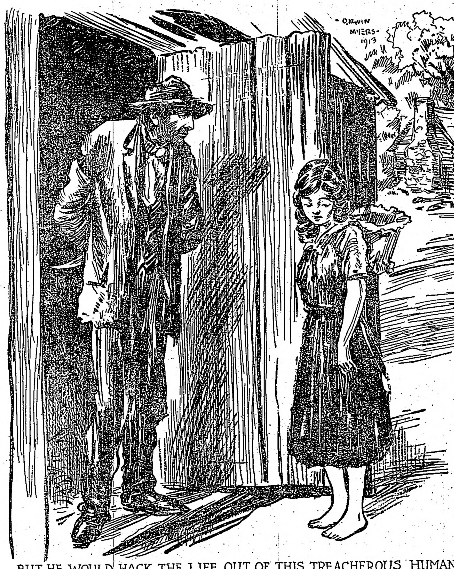
THE DEVIL CHAIR

A Chronicle of the Strange Adventures of John Haynes and His Gyroscope Vehicle

BY THE DEEP SEA TRANSIT

By H. M. EGBERT

(Copyright by W. G. Chapman)



BUT HE WOULD HACK THE LIFE OUT OF THIS TREACHEROUS HUMAN THING THAT SOUGHT HIS OWN.

John Haynes had fulfilled all the purposes which had inspired him when he made his escape from the state penitentiary at Nokomis Falls. By means of the powerful gyroscope which he had invented, he hunted down those enemies who had flung him into prison upon a trumped-up charge; he had discovered the wife and daughter who had been torn from him, and he had placed them in each other's arms. Then, since his wife, believing him dead, had married again, and because the stains of blood which he had shed in the accomplishment of his revenge lay on his soul, he did not dare reveal himself to the woman to whom he was still legally bound, but made his way to a remote corner of the United States and hid there, under an assumed name.

How many thousands of miles he had traversed upon that wonderful machine of his! Traveling at the speed of two hundred miles an hour, whether it were bound to the feet or attached to an automobile or any other medium of locomotion, none could successfully pursue him, had he but a moment's warning. But now he wanted only to rest, to be alone, to think. It seemed to him that, having accomplished that revenge to which he had dedicated his life, he had no more to live for. His heart was bound irrevocably to the woman whom he had left in far-off China; Eleanor, his daughter, was happy in her reunion with her mother and in her marriage to the son of one of his old enemies. Haynes would have welcomed death. But he was still comparatively a young man; death seemed intolerably remote. He did not know what he would do. He rested, waiting till the plan came to him.

His rest was not destined to be a long one. The stories of his deeds had become common property throughout the length and breadth of the land. The government had taken up the pursuit which his enemies had abandoned perforce when their fate met them. Haynes was a public enemy. Craftily, silently, proclaiming nothing of its intentions, the federal government set to work to hunt him down. What isolated men could never hope to do, the power of the nation might accomplish. Each state secretly pledged itself to assist in the work; the railroad companies, the telegraph companies, scores of detective agencies, all united against him. Haynes never knew where the blow was likely to fall.

Once, when he had broken free from the cordon of men that had gathered round the village in which he rested, while rushing at furious speed on his machine along the single rail of a long stretch of line in a desolate district, some instinct prompted him to cut off the power of the gyroscope and stop. He did so; then, looking ahead, he saw that a section of the line had been removed and cunningly replaced with painted clay. To have struck that at his tremendous speed would have meant instant death.

Once again, rushing through a long defile in the Rockies, he encountered a new stone wall, built straight across the metals at a bend in the track. The mortar was still damp on it. Had he run into that he would have been smashed into nothingness. But his enemies did not know how swiftly the gyroscope could be halted and Haynes escaped with nothing worse than a few bruises.

They barred the roads and railway lines, they herded him, forewarned by all the subtle agencies in the possession of a government, into a barren, rocky region among the Cumberlands. All round the hills, at every mountain pass, armed guards were stationed. He had a territory of twelve square miles in which to rove, but he could not cross those boundaries that daily drew closer round him. At first he laughed at the futility of this pursuit. How could they stop him, when, at a rate of speed incredibly swifter than that of the fastest train, he could dash through them on the roads?

Then, all at once, he understood the government's design. He needed gasoline to replenish his engine. Geared though the gyroscope was to run on a minute consumption, still, the motor needed fuel. And there was no gasoline within this region; no automobile came there; it was a land of barren pines and inhospitable mountains and valleys in which a few poor mountaineers eked out a wretched existence on their little hillside farms.

Haynes strode one day into one of the most wretched of these cabins. Under his coat he had strapped his gyroscope. He impersonated a tramp—and he was little more. He asked for food and shelter.

With the hospitable instincts of their kind, they set before him cornmeal and milk. When he had eaten, the mother and her two daughters offered him the shelter of the almost roofless barn in which they stocked the scant cuttings from their fields. Worn out from weariness, Haynes crept into the hay.

He dared not sleep, however, for he knew that the cordon round him daily grew closer. Five miles away, at Hendricksville, the government men were posted. Perhaps they might capture him unawares, and, though he had a pistol, his stock of cartridges had long since gone. He crept out of the hay and slunk up to the house. Inside the kitchen the woman spelled out the large print on a placard, while the girls leaned over her shoulder, listening eagerly. Haynes, crouching near, peered through the open window near which the woman sat and saw his photograph and several black, heavy lines of type.

He was wanted for murder and there was a reward of two thousand dollars posted in all the mountain villages. The government had not told of the gyroscope on this placard; they had confined their statements to the fewest words possible: "WANTED, JOHN HAYNES, FOR MURDER," read the text under the photograph. Then followed his personal description. He had read the poster long before the mother had spelled it out, word by word to the listening girls. Then he crept into the shadows of the barn and waited, in his hand a rusty scythe which he had picked up from some spot in which it had been thrown, discarded.

Ten minutes later the elder girl came tripping out. She was about eighteen, pretty, simple-looking. Her bare feet made no noise over the grass-grown ground between the house and the barn. She came to the door and looked in cautiously.

Haynes feigned to sleep, and after a moment's watching, the girl withdrew. She did not go back to the house, however, but toward the wagon road which led through the pass toward Hendricksville.

The bitterness of it gripped the man's heart and for the first time since he had accomplished his revenge he felt that old insane anger grip him again. What had he done that he should be tricked on every side? Was there no honesty, no honor anywhere, that even these simple people should attempt to trap him for the sake of the few dollars that had been placed on his head? He clutched the scythe furiously, sprang to the door and called to her.

She started as he called and looked back fearfully. Haynes stood upon the sill of the barn, the scythe hidden behind him. There was no menace in his voice, for he meant to use cunning and not alarm the rest—but he would hack the life out of this treacherous human thing that sought his own. It was only an instant till the insane mood passed. When she stood near him and he looked into her childish face, the eyes downcast in shame at the part that she had been assigned to play, the anger faded out of the man's heart and he let his scythe drop noiselessly into the straw.

"Can you give me a drink?" he asked hoarsely, pulling a bill from his pocket. "See, I'll pay you well for it. Give me a pitcher of whisky—a full pitcher."

He knew that there was moonshine whisky in all the houses of the Cumberlands.

Murmuring that she would see, the girl went back to the house. Nothing could have pleased the mother more than Haynes' request. She loathed the deed that she had been forced to plan; her sympathies were with every fugitive, as every hill woman's must be; but that two thousand dollars meant incredible wealth to them. Haynes understood the extremity of their temptation, too; that was why he had let the scythe fall.

Now, if they could make him drunk, he would be captured without danger and without making any resistance. She bade the girl fill the pitcher to the brim and carry it out to the man in the barn.

The girl set down the pitcher at Haynes' hand and with a murmured "good night" went back to the house. Afterward, from where he lay in the straw, Haynes saw her slink away, a shadow in the night, along the road to Hendricksville. He did not plan to drink the whisky. Instead, when he became assured that no stealthy watcher was near, he poured the contents of the pitcher into his little gasoline tank. A quick test showed him that the motor would run on alcohol—not so well as with gasoline, of course, but the top, once set in motion, would run of its own energy for so appreciable a period that even a partial or spasmodic action of the motor was sufficient for his purposes. When he was ready to depart he pinned two fifty-dollar bills to the wall of the barn; he knew that they would find them and understand. Then he crept out into the pass, fastened the gyroscope to his feet and waited.

An hour later he saw shadows moving along the road, and, crouching low among the undergrowth, perceived two armed guards and the girl pass by within three feet of him and make their way toward the barn. He let them pass. When they were out of sight he stood upon his feet and started the mechanism. Then, with a whirl and a rush he was away, flying down the dark pass under the fleeting clouds and brilliant moon. He found the road at Hendricksville unguarded, crossed it, entered upon the main state highway, and, three hours later, removed the gyroscope in a far distant region.

But this adventure made Haynes realize that henceforth there would be no peace for him in the United States. And he craved peace, longed for it as only the hunted man can long for it. He wanted rest. Somehow, before he died, he must become reconciled with his soul. He wanted to be alone, without companions, in some wild region where, toiling next to the bosom of the re-creating earth, he might refresh his spirit. And there, in such a place, he knew that he would find peace at last.

He must leave the new world. He would go to Norway. Once before, traveling to the northern part of the great Scandinavian peninsula, in search of one of those who had wronged him, he had been almost turned from his revenge in the majestic and solemn presence of those mighty mountains. He would go to Norway and dwell for a year in some remote hamlet. He still had five thousand dollars left; that would amply suffice for his needs. After that year he would know what to do.

But how was he to leave America when every port would be guarded, every ship inspected? True, he might turn north and west and strive to cross the frozen straits at the extremity of Alaska, but even with the wonderful gyroscope he doubted his ability to do this; moreover, he was tired of traveling. He could not endure the desolation of that icy wilderness. He reached New York and took up his abode in a cheap rooming house; he spent days walking the streets, pondering, starting at every word addressed to him by every stranger.

His nerves were giving way at last. He must decide speedily. Should he risk taking passage aboard some liner? Or should he ship before the mast? But either course seemed equally hazardous—and at sea the gyroscope would be useless.

Then it was that the idea came to him for his last adventure. He would travel by the electric cable underseas.

Preposterous as the plan seemed, he had accomplished things almost equally extravagant. The cable lay along the bed of the sea. Even under the tremendous pressure of the salt water the spinning gyroscope was not likely to suffer injury, and if he could attain a speed of one hundred and fifty miles an hour he could cross to Ireland in twenty hours. The gyroscope would run true and straight as an arrow along that slender rope beneath the waters. The thought fired his imagination. He rented a tiny shack on the Long Island shore and set to work on his contrivance.

He needed, first, to place the gyroscope beneath some oval-bodied or torpedo-shaped vessel such as would be capable of darting through the depths without encountering more than the minimum of resistance. This vehicle must be enclosed and strongly roofed with steel in order to resist pressure. He must take a supply of oxygen—that was not difficult, since one could obtain a diver's helmet attached to a storage tank in the dress, supplying oxygen sufficient to maintain the process of respiration for four and twenty hours. And that would be all! The scheme was amazing in its simplicity. He would hire a fishing boat, place the machine aboard, sail for Sandy Hook, and there, just out of sight of the official watchers, he would grapple for the cable on its shallow bed, pull it up, affix the gyroscope, and enter the machine. Then would come four and twenty hours of darkness and solitude, until he reached the Irish coast, when he would shut off the motor, fling off his diver's dress and, abandoning the gyroscope forever, swim to the land.

Nothing could stop the accomplishment of this his plan. His confidence revived, and in his pleasure in it, he felt the joy of life once more grow strong within his breast.

He bought his boat, a leaky fishing smack whose owner, a Long Island Yankee, evidently believed that he had done a smart stroke of work in disposing of his antiquated tub. Haynes loaded her with his machine. He had placed a torpedo-shaped iron cage over the gyroscope, hammering it out from parts of an old boiler which he had purchased as scrap iron, and making it absolutely watertight with a cork lining. The roof, which, in spite of its rounded edges, would have to bear enormous pressure, he reinforced with layers of brass. Over this he placed armorplate, bought at a scrap sale at the Navy Yard, and over this another layer of brass plates, the whole so deftly hammered together and interspaced with cork and asphalted refuse from the sawmills that he felt confident no drop of water could penetrate. There was an entrance which, when closed, formed an integral part of the machine, and a tiny window at the rear, protected by the overlapping roof, afforded an outlook. He set up the ragged sail and moved slowly, under a little wind, down Long Island sound, and so into the Atlantic.

Several times squalls of wind threatened to overturn the crazy tub of a boat, and swamping seas drenched him, but in spite of these he kept his craft afloat, though, heavily weighted as she was, this necessitated continual bailing. So he passed out of the sound and, rounding Long Island, entered the lower bay and aimed his course toward that spit of sand which is the ultimate point seen by eastward-bound vessels that leave New York. When at last he nerved himself to look back he saw the massive towers and buildings of Manhattan, hazy in the misty afternoon. He bade farewell to them forever and, with them, to that new world and all it had meant to him. At that moment all the experiences which he had undergone since that day when, five years before, he had landed in America to recover his stolen lands, dropped from his mind. He felt the dawning of that peace which he had craved, at last. He set his face resolutely toward the old world and freedom—freedom both from that incessant pursuit which had been hounding him by night and by day and from the passions in his own heart.

Although the maps had taught him the approximate site of the cable, it was no slight task to discover it beneath that wilderness of waters on whose breast his water-logged craft tossed like a cork on a pool. His grappling iron hung from the center of the boat, through an aperture resembling that made for a centerboard. Once he had caught the cable, a turn of the disconnected gyroscope would drag it up and catch the loop of it against the steel guard which was to hold it in place until Haynes was ready to dive down into the depths below. At nightfall he began his search, but it was bright morning before his iron fastened upon the stout coil, and only the pull of the gyroscope sufficed to drag that monstrous serpent, green with marine growths, from its resting place through fathoms of waters. When at last he had secured it to the wheel he crept into his cage, fastening it from the inside. He donned his diver's dress and oxygen helmet, touched the stop of the gyroscope and, with a whirl, the waters rose and covered him. The boat dragged down at first, rose when her plunging freight parted from her, and floated, bottom up, and empty, upon the bay.

The gyroscope had caught the cable true. The submarine car rolled, struck her nose into the mud, and tried to stay there, but the wheel held—it could not choose but hold when the top drove onward—and he was away under the sea, traveling upon the line stretched out upon that slimy bed formed by the slow death of millions of marine organisms. Haynes breathed comfortably enough, although his eardrums rang. He looked out through the tiny window. Slowly the light faded, the green translucency of the water surrounded him; then that too disappeared and black, impenetrable night enshrouded him, as black as that primeval night before the red globe of the sun rose like a monstrous furnace for the first time over the rim of the world. He could hear nothing; but, even if the vessel had not been sound-proof, he could have heard nothing, for there was no sound in those depths. Soon he was approaching the region where the continental shelf of land slopes into the incalculably deep abyss. Now luminous patches flashed and flitted past him. Huge globes of fire followed and watched him through the window. These were the great, luminous eyes of deep-sea monsters, carrying their own lamps, with which to hunt their prey, chasing them in a world of perpetual darkness. The pressure on his ears increased. He felt the oxygen bag. It was still full and the flow was not interrupted. Yet an uncontrollable desire for sleep crept over him, and the chill of the surrounding waters communicated itself to his tired limbs and deprived them of sensation. He would sleep till the journey was ended; he settled himself for rest; his eyes closed. . . .

The cable officer whose cottage, built on a rock at the edge of the land, adjoined the cable station, felt a shock which threw him from his chair. The walls quivered, a cloud of plaster fell from the roof. Picking himself up, he rushed outside to learn what had happened. His first thought was that there had been a landslide; his second that this was an earthquake.

When he looked into the machine house from which the cable issued he saw that everything was wrecked. In the twisted tangle of machinery were the still whirring fragments of a wheel. And over all was a singular plate of metal, seventeen feet long and some two inches in thickness, smooth as though it had been made to form the top of a billiard table. It was impossible to say of what it was composed. From the fact that iron entered largely into its composition the theory was subsequently advanced that this was a meteor, which, mysteriously flattened, had fallen into the engine house.

Yet, since the roof was intact, it must have come through the small aperture in the floor by which the cable descended. Scientists then propounded the theory that the meteor, falling at a tangent to the earth, and skimming its circumference for many thousand miles, until flattened by atmospheric friction, had plunged into the machine house at that angle of half a degree. The pieces of the wheel did not fit into this theory, so they ignored them.

This exhibit, which was a nine days' wonder at that time, was soon forgotten. It rests now in the Technical Museum in Dublin, and is chiefly of interest as being the hardest substance known. The compression to which it was subjected during its passage through space must have been incalculably strong, the catalogue says. Nobody knows that this metallic slab forms the sarcophagus of a man, whose mortal remains lie imprisoned in those two inches.

John Haynes had underestimated the pressure of five miles of Atlantic water.

SAD ENDING OF EXPERIMENT

Theater Manager Meant Well, but He Had Not Counted on Weakness of Human Nature.

This is the story of a great experiment that failed. It also puts George W. Honesty down for the count, though it proves that the usual male moving picture fiend—but that's where the story begins.

In the movie district around Ninth street there is a certain theater whose manager is a humanitarian idealist. He smokes himself, and it is like iron in his soul to see scores of his male patrons regretfully toss their half-smoked cigars into the street before going inside his theater. Recently he went to the trouble of arranging a wire basket in front of his place, and above it was this genial sign:

"LEAVE YOUR CIGARS HERE."

On the first afternoon five men planked down their nickels and went inside when the theater opened. Five cigars, all strangers to each other, lay side by side in various stages of decline. One was a Pittsburgh stogie, well chewed; one was a half-finished five-center, and the next two were of the ten-cent type. Last of all there was a magnificent, plethoric product with a fine gold and red band about its stomach. It was a cigar that fairly exuded aristocracy.

The show was not yet over when a square, bony man came out and viewed the array speculatively. Then he picked up the aristocrat, smelled it and walked off. The next man drifted out and helped himself to a ten-cent specimen. Two more men came out. The Pittsburgh stogie remained alone.

Then there emerged from the theater a magnificently clad person who lightly waved a gold-headed cane. Instinct showed that he was the owner of the good cigar. He walked to the wire basket and an expression of hurt surprise showed on his face. He poked at the pitiful stogie resentfully.

"Well," he said aloud, "I gotta have something."

And when the guard wasn't looking he picked up the wire basket and disappeared. The humanitarian experiment ended right there.

No wire baskets have been seen since.—Washington Star.

One With a Moral.

Once upon a time Somebody happened to mention to a Genius that if Everybody in the World said "Ugh!" together it would be heard in the Moon.

Now the Genius was an Organizing Genius, so he organized Everybody in the World. At a given moment Everybody agreed to say "Ugh!" and the Genius told them it would certainly make a Roar that would be heard in the Moon.

When the Day came a Simple Man said to another, "I am not going to miss anything. One voice less won't make any difference. I am going to Listen."

Somebody must have Repeated this. When the Moment came Everybody was Listening except two old deaf Ladies, who said "Ugh!"

Moral: Make it Unanimous.—Kansas City Star.

Science of "Putting Up."

The other day a Bath (Me.) man had a present of a jar of raspberries which had been put up by his grandmother more than twenty years ago. Her son had picked the berries and he has been dead for 20 years. The berries had almost as fresh a flavor as when they were picked and preserved.

Trading Stamp Will Gets on a Judge's Nerves

Man wants but little here below,
But trading stamps are all the go.

DETROIT, MICH.—Probate Judge Hanley absently scribbled the above sentiment on his blotter pad as he listened to the contest of the will of Hattie C. Koszesha. Hattie, by her last testament, left her entire earthly treasures, consisting of about $1,300 in trading stamps, to be divided equally between her husband. Julius, and her mother, Mrs. Matilda Brock. By dint of questioning, Judge Hanley learned that the trading stamps were worth a parlor rocker, a soup tureen and a shaving mug, or, by different combining, would get for the lucky holder a penwiper, a set of false teeth and a shoehorn.

"Your honor," said Julius, "my mother-in-law must have used undue influence on my wife to get her to bequeath half of these trading stamps to anybody but me. I want the will declared void on that ground."

Judge Hanley scribbled another couplet as he listened to the oration of Julius. It read:

It's fun to spite a mother-in-law,
Especially when it's by the law.

"My wife spent the best years of her life collecting those trading stamps," continued Julius. "Many is the happy evening she and I spent counting them over."

Bucolic pleasures clashed with art,
But never loosened Cupid's dart.

That was what Judge Hanley scribbled at this juncture. But the mother-in-law now had her inning. She said they were soap trading stamps and that she had helped her daughter to get them.

The soap was soon used up in lather,
That's what got the stamps, I gather.

So the judge scribbled, but the testimony was by that time all in and he rendered judgment.

"This is the cheapest will contest that has ever been brought in Wayne county," he said. "I admit the will to probate, and, further, if the will be knocked out, the husband and mother of the woman would divide the trading stamps under the statute."

Ancient Game of "Snipe" Hunting Is Revived

NEW YORK.—The ancient and honorable game of "snipe hunting" has been revived and in this enlightened vicinity, too. The revivee is Jack Ehrler, a bookkeeper at the Guardian Savings and Trust company. Lest there be some folk who are not acquainted with the delights and joys of "snipe hunting" we will elucidate. For hunting the wary snipe, a dark night is selected. The hunters repair to a dense woods. They circle through the woods and drive the snipe toward the center where one man stands ready to catch them in a bag. The sport comes when every one beats it for home, leaving the one man to hold the bag until he comes to.

Jack was visiting on a farm near Hudson recently and some one proposed that the bunch go snipe hunting. Jack grew quite enthusiastic over its possibilities and quite selfishly declared that he would hold the bag. He just would not allow any one else to do it. And the more unselfish members of the party let him have his way. The bag was placed in the depth of the woods with logs placed alongside to form a runway, so the snipe could not miss the bag in the dark. You know snipe cannot see well at night. He was armed with a lantern to attract the snipe. About 2 a. m. Mr. Ehrler arrived home, after having become lost in the woods, chased by dogs and irate farmers whom he awoke to find out where he was. He would not have this story become known at the bank for anything, so please help us to keep it quiet.

Old Chippewa Indian Chief Views Wonders of City

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.—John Smith, or Wa-be-ne-gew-wes, for more than a hundred years chief of the once powerful tribe of Chippewa Indians, who is one hundred and twenty-eight years old, as he reckons it, and whose existence as a boy 116 years ago is vouched for by government records, has left for his tepee.

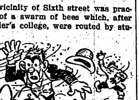
He came here to see before death the great city that has risen in his lifetime where once the wilderness was unbroken. The last of the great Indian chieftains of the country, bent and shrunken by age, still is able to walk about, and all his faculties have been retained.

Two small bright eyes in the depths of a face so seamed and wrinkled and withered that no words can visualize it looked out on the city.

"Too many wagons," said the old chief.

Bees Own a Street; Stop Business and Traffic

CINCINNATI, O.—Sycamore street in the vicinity of Sixth street was practically deserted the other day, because of a swarm of bees which, after attempting to establish a colony at St. Xavier's college, were routed by students there and made things miserable for pedestrians, school children and factory employes in the vicinity. Business was practically at a standstill until the bees could be gathered into a box and taken away.



Conductors and motormen on the pay-as-you-enter cars which operate on Sycamore street had the laugh on their comrades who man open summer conveyances, although some of them got stung before the lesson was learned. Teamsters made but one attempt to reach the intersection of Seventh street and Sycamore, long detours being the order of the day after the first tryout. Pedestrians got wise on the way home and business men along Sycamore street used the back entrances in going to and fro.

The bees under the leadership of their queen took the liberty of swarming on one of the windows of the third floor of St. Xavier college. Some one discovered them and proceeded to rout them with water. The bees attacked a car and forced the passengers and crew to take flight.

Fred Dueker, with his son Irwin, with a common old shoe box as a trap, gathered in all the bees without any trouble, the youngster handling the bigger part of the job. With the departure of the bees, peace again reigned on Sycamore.

MANUEL NEAR A DIVORCE?

A Paris dispatch says that although the repeated rumors of a divorce between the deposed King Manuel of Portugal and his German princess lack confirmation, friends of the family in Paris say that their affairs have reached an acute stage. Manuel and his wife have never understood each other, and in spite of praiseworthy efforts on the part of both to arrive at an honorable arrangement of their life, they never have succeeded in bridging the gulf which opened between them immediately after their marriage.

The marriage was an idyll. Queen Amelia looked upon the daughter of her old friend, the prince of Hohenlohe Sigmaringen, as the ideal wife for her son, possessing all those qualities which were lacking in his character. The little princess had a will of her own, and was not devoid of ambition. Might she not be the means of bringing Manuel back to the throne? Such a role, however, demanded, first of all, experience, and in this the princess was totally lacking.

She found that Manuel was a careless, easy-going, almost irresponsible youth, irresolute, but yet capable of sudden and unforeseen obstinacy. He on his side saw in her a narrow-minded authoritative young person, with ideas which appeared to him out-of-date and provincial—a passion for housekeeping and other domestic virtues which fell in neither with his tastes nor his requirements. Under these circumstances a quarrel was inevitable.

Queen Amelia and the intimates of the two families are doing their best to smooth away the differences between the young couple, but they are not optimistic.

COPIES UNITED STATES STYLES FOR HOME

King Christian of Denmark has decided that the newest of his numerous residences shall be furnished in American style in every detail. The style he has selected to copy is that of the simple and efficient equipment of the average American home. He has long been an admirer of the American arts and conveniences of home-making and he has insisted that his newest house, which is situated on the Skaw, will lack none of them.

The excuse for so many residences as King Christian has in so small a country as Denmark is his fondness of keeping in touch with his people, which, he maintains, he cannot do better than by living everywhere.

The king maintains an elaborate entourage, but it is only for the entertainment of visiting sovereigns and diplomats, As for himself he lives in the most simple manner. No ruler in Europe is more easily accessible.

Recently on a visit to Naskov the king was attracted by a delicious apple pie displayed in a shop window. He went inside to buy a piece and while there bought some cake for a small boy in the shop. Later the shop woman learned the identity of her royal customer and she promptly hung out a sign announcing that her shop purveyed to the royal family of Denmark.

NEW SENATOR FROM KENTUCKY

Johnson N. Camden of Versailles, Ky., recently appointed by Governor McCreary to fill the seat of the late Senator Bradley until a successor can be elected at the November election, was sworn in at Washington a few days ago. He has not announced his candidacy for the unexpired term of Mr. Bradley, which would end next March, but his friends are pointing out that his appointment would mean little to him if he does not enter the race for the primary nomination. Reports from the Blue Grass state are that Gen. Bennett Young, former Representative Smith, and former Governor Beckham are considering running for the short term, the latter being a candidate also for the long term.

If Mr. Camden decides to run for the short term, which is probable, his friends say he will have the best chance of winning.

Mr. Camden is not a stranger to Washington. His father, Johnson N. Camden served in the senate from West Virginia from 1881 to 1887, and in 1893 was elected to fill the seat made vacant by the death of Senator Kenna, serving until 1895. The newly-appointed senator during the residence of his father in Washington attended the Virvinia Military institute.

HINDU POTENTATE TO VISIT AMERICA

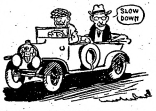
It is not at all unlikely that the Maharajah of Kapurthala will be among the distinguished foreigners who will visit America next year to attend the Panama exposition, so says recent gossip in Paris, where this magnificent "prince of princes" is as well known a figure in the luxurious set as Andre Fouquieres himself. Both are exquisites and it was the Parisian arbiter who went to India three years ago, on the occasion of the wedding of the eldest son of the Maharajah, to lead and arrange the cotillion; for, as an international chronicler on good taste declares, "no ballroom in France is considered complete without the presence of M. Fouquieres," and the Maharajah, who made this occasion like a dream of the Arabian Nights, really had Paris transported to Kapurthala.

It will not be the first visit of the Maharajah to this side of the Atlantic. He was the rage at Newport twenty years ago, when he was the guest of Mrs. O. H. P. Belmont and other powerful social leaders.

WASHINGTON GOSSIP

President Wilson Orders Lower Speed for Autos

WASHINGTON.—There is sorrow in the White House garage. Two mighty touring cars and a landaulet have been brought to a state of watchful waiting. There is an embargo on speed which will not be lifted. Four chauffeurs—any one of whom can pass within an inch of a given object while running at 50 miles an hour—are constantly on watch lest the speedometers start to climb on them.



About the only person in the garage who is happy is the automobile washer, who has figured it out that the slower automobiles run the less dirt they accumulate.

Ever since a presidential automobile was held up outside of Hyattsville the White House machines have been passed by about everything on the road. Recently one of those runabouts (the type that sounds like a lawn mower and travels with a limp) actually went ahead of the big seven-passenger car which President Wilson affects.

The cause of the sorrow is manifest. The engines in the White House cars are of the latest type, and can, without an effort, run the machine up to 50 miles an hour. And on the road it is extremely difficult to gauge speed unless one's eye is constantly on the speedometer.

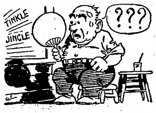
President Wilson has always insisted that the cars in which he rides be run slowly. But occasionally when his friends are taken out for a little spin the chauffeur has been inclined to open the throttle and let things whoop.

Besides the automobile washer, there are others in the White House who feel a certain relief. They are the secret service men.

Sleigh's Bells Give Shivers to the Gauzily Clad

IT WAS at noon on G street when the jingling bells of a sleigh were heard.

A large, perspiring, spluttering fat man suspended his palm leaf fan in mid-air. "The doctor told me to cut it down to two these hot days. I didn't; now I am hearing things," he muttered.



Another jingle, in frosty accents.

A willowy maid, exceedingly summerish and diaphanous as to her gown, pulled her gauzy skirts close about her and was seen to shiver.

And still they jingled. Temperature, 98 in the shade.

A puffing lady, of generous girth, plumped down her market basket on the pliant asphalt and felt her pulse.

Traffic was suspended, passing horses sniffed the air, and Doctor Cook's press agent came running up from a nearby hotel to see whether some other intrepid explorer had put another one across on his employer.

"Going, going, gone. At twenty. And it's a bargain at that."

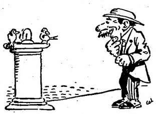
The raucous voice of the auctioneer explained the greatest natural phenomenon Washington has witnessed for many moons.

The fat man dashed back through the swinging doors for another bracer.

"That's the hottest job I've had this week," plaintively wailed the auctioneer, as he wiped a seeping sleeve across his briny brow.

Birds Use Bubble Fountain as a Bathing Place

THE English sparrow is the quickest of all the feathered tribe to adapt itself to the advances of science and civilization. This is frequently proved to the consternation of biologists and many lovers of the beautiful.



The most striking instance of this adaptivity was recently proved to a group of laymen who gathered by the little triangular park in front of the Munsey building, that has recently been landscape-gardened into architectural eminence.

The sycamores along the avenue side of the park, and its cool shrubbery are favorite gathering places for the sparrow. Before the Pulaski statue was erected, the sparrows disported themselves in the cool water of an open fountain. Some lovers of bird and animal life wondered what these sparrows did for a drink and a bath after the fountain was torn up. Apparently there was no water in sight.

Some time ago a drinking fountain of the bubbling type was installed. For weeks and even months the sparrows paid but little attention. One or two audacious fellows eyed the bubbling stream at close range, but could find no standing water.

In the heat of noontime the other day, one of the boldest and noisiest of a twittering group, solved the problem. He lit on the outer edge of the fountain, cocked his dark brown head and eyed the stream. One or two pedestrians stopped to watch. Others gathered. Finally Mr. Sparrow thrust his bill into the stream with a quick darting motion. Nothing happened, and he tried it again. Finally he let it rest in the stream, and withdrawing it only to throw back his head, drank his fill. Contented he eyed his surroundings while an admiring throng applauded his perspicacity.

Suddenly seized of a new notion he fluttered through the stream to the other side. He repeated this feat several times, and many sparrows, quick to learn, were soon using the drinking fountain in approved style.

He Got His Money's Worth of Conversation

"DO YOU swear," said the marriage license clerk light-heartedly, "that the statements herein given are the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth so help you God one dollar please?"

The young man with the large, expressive hands, the trembling knees and the huge, awkward feet, dug feebly into his pocket and produced the sum of money required. There was something so red-faced and apologetically rabbitlike in the way he did it that one almost expected to see him flap his ears. But he didn't.

WHERE KIN I FIND A PREACHER ?
MARRIAGE LICENSES

"Wish you all the luck in the world," said the marriage license clerk, evidently desirous of making the agitated young man feel at peace.

The tall awkward young man scratched himself violently.

"Where's a preacher?" he demanded abruptly.

The marriage license clerk waved a hand toward the city directory.

"Take your pick," he urged. "There are all kinds in the city. Also plenty of justices of the peace—if you want them."

"I want a Baptist," said the tall young man stubbornly. "I come from Powhucket, W. Va. And I kinder eloped here for the fun of seein' the city while I was gettin' married. And—"

"I found one!" he announced triumphantly. And then he continued the brief sketch of his life. He was a young man with a wide range of interests. And having paid a whole dollar for a bit of paper, he made up his mind that he would get his money's worth of conversation.

CESSATION OF HOSTILITIES NOW SEEMS TO BE ASSURED

Union of Various Factions in Mexico Now Being Attempted---Carbajal Asks Only Amnesty for Prisoners.

Washington, July 21.—While government officials here feel that the Mexican problem is rapidly shaping itself for solution and that the Constitutionalists and the Carbajal government soon will reach an agreement for the establishment of a new administration, much apprehension is manifested over the possible operations of the Zapatista forces.

Threaten Mexico City.

Dispatches from Mexico City and Vera Cruz, which declared that the followers of Zapata were dangerously near the capital are confirmed by advices to the state department. Officials here for some time have been cognizant of the strength of the Zapata troops, but the American government has been able to exert its influence with Zapata to prevent an attack on Mexico City.

Emissaries from General Carranza are now in communication with Zapata and it is hoped through these parleys to bring the military operations of the revolution under one head.

Hurry To Set Up Government

Constitutionalist forces are being hurried southward to help maintain order at the capital. The efforts of the American government are directed toward influencing a quick settlement between Carranza and Carbajal so that a stable government may be set up without loss of time.

The Constitutionalist agency here has delivered to the mediators a note rejecting the invitation for representatives of General Carranza and General Huerta to meet in peace conferences.

It was written by Carranza before Huerta resigned, but delivery was delayed.

See Union of Factions.

Washington, July 20.—Every influence and diplomatic agency at the disposal of the United States government are working for immediate peace in Mexico.

The Washington administration is convinced that with the elimination of Huerta, for which it has been steadily pressing for more than a year, the various factions in Mexico will be drawn together quickly.

To aid in this and to assure restoration of normal conditions without further bloodshed, officials here are exerting themselves to smooth the way for a new and stable administration in Mexico which shall be recognized by the powers of the world.

Efforts Bring Results.

Already the fruits of the American effort to bring Carranza and Carbajal together are apparent. Carranza, according to Silliman's reports, has revealed a spirit of friendliness to the United States and a readiness to discuss peace with Carbajal and prevent further fighting.

Amnesty for political offenders and guarantees that the lives and property of the teritory controlled by the federal government be conserved, are practically the only terms Carbajal asks.

Generally, Washington officials are highly optimistic over the favorable turn of events. Already they are predicting complete peace in Mexico in another fortnight. They were encouraged, for instance, by a telegram from General Obregon, commander of one of the three big divisions of the Constitutionalist army, saying Americans and foreigners could return to Guadalajara with assurances of safety. Obregon gave these assurances to American Consul Hostetter.

Huerta Off to Jamaica.

Puerto Mexico, Mexico.—General Huerta departed from this port on board the German cruiser Dresden for Jamaica, General Blanquet alone accompanying him. According to present plans Huerta will sail from Jamaica for Paris, where he will make his future home.

U. S. Counsels Zapata.

Not only is the American government at this moment counseling General Carranza, the Constitutionalist chief, to arrange with Francisco Carbajal, Huerta's successor, for the peaceful transfer of the government at Mexico City to the Constitutionalists without further fighting, but it became known that the administration is directly in communication with Emiliana Zapata, commander in southern Mexico.

Zapata, according to reliable reports to the state department, has 24,000 men, and though most of them are poorly equipped they would constitute a serious menace to a new government at Mexico City if they remain in revolution. Zapata, who demands agrarian reforms immediately, made common cause with the Constitutionalists and obtained supplies from them with which to fight the Huerta government. It is not known whether he will lay down his arms in favor of Carranza.

Carranza has been informed that he must conduct his triumph temperately, that there must be no excesses and no revenges when the army takes control of Mexico City and other important centers.

Wants General Amnesty.

Washington, July 18. — Francisco Carbajal, successor to General Huerta as provisional president of Mexico, to succeed General Huerta, resigned, advised the United States government informally that he intended to retire in favor of General Carranza, the Constitutionalist chief.

© HARRIS & EWING

VENUSTIANO CARRANZA.

Mr. Carbajal wishes only that a general amnesty be proclaimed and protection given to the property of those who opposed the Constitutionalists.

This statement of the attitude of Huerta's successor together with the announcement from Monterey that Carranza was willing to enter into negotiations with Carbajal relative to the transfer of authority at Mexico City was regarded here as practically assuring a cessation of hostilities and the restoring of peace in Mexico.

The views of Mr. Carbajal were expressed in detail to Secretary Bryan by Jose Castellot, former member of the Mexican senate, who called at the state department with a personal telegram which he had received through the Mexican embassy. It was the first communication betweeu the American government and the Carbajal administration.

The message incidentally revealed that Generals Huerta and Blanquet are planning to go to Europe. The communication addressed to Mr. Castellot, a personal friend of the new president, was as follows:

Carbajal Letter Follows.

"I have just taken the oath of office as president of the republic. Generals Huerta and Blanquet have departed for Europe. I desire to make it known with emphasis that my only purpose is to facilitate a solution of the grave problems which weigh upon our country. I have not the slightest ambition for myself and merely wish to terminate the internal conflict of our country. Please give me your impressions of the situation in Washington.

"FRANCISCO CARBAJAL."

This message, Mr. Castellot explained, meant that Mr. Carbajal had taken office only as a means of bridging the gap from the Huerta regime to the Constitutionalists and that the new president had no desire to remain in ofice.

Secretary Bryan thanked Mr. Castellot for the information he brought and told him that while recognition would not be accorded Carbajal, the United States was amicably disposed toward him and would applaud his patriotic efforts to bring about peace in President Resumes Work.

Washington, July 20. — President Wilson has completely recovered from his recent attack of indigestion. He has resumed his usual round of work and interviewed several business men, including S. R. Bertron, a banker, discussing business conditions and antitrust legislation. Expecting a definite outcome of the fight on the nomination of Thomas D. Jones, as a member of the federal reserve board this week. Mr. Wilson is preparing to take up the case of Paul Warburg.

Two Machines Are Demolished.

Duluth, July 20.—Five persons almost miraculously escaped death, three were injured and two automobiles were demolished, one of them plunging over a ten-foot embankment. The autos, owned by D. Butler, proprietor of a Marble hotel, and A. Scanlon, a Marble liveryman, collided head on between Coleraine, Minn., and Marble. The impact was terrific and the cries of the passengers of the two cars were plainly audible some distance away.

HUERTA'S RULE HAS BEEN ONE OF BLOODSHED

Killing of Madero Marked Beginning of Despotism.

MADE VAIN BOAST TO TAFT

Dictator Declared He Would Restore Peace at Once, but Refusal of United States to Recognize Him Assured His Downfall.

Victoriano Huerta took oath as provisional president of Mexico February 19, 1913, the day after President Francisco I. Madero, Jr., had been arrested at the national palace.

Three days later Madero and Jose Maria Pino Suarez, vice-president, were shot to death while on a midnight ride under guard from the palace to the penitentiary. The precise manner of their death has never been explained.

One of Huerta's first acts as provisional president was to telegraph William H. Taft, then president of the United States, the following message:

"I have the honor to inform you that I have overthrown the government. The forces are with me, and from now on peace and prosperity will reign."

PROVOKES CIVIL WAR.

The Mexican republic, however, was at once plunged into civil war again, notwithstanding the issuance by Huerta of a proclamation of general amnesty. The Sonora state congress officially repudiated the provisional government before Huerta settled himself comfortably in the presidential chair.

Zapata, revolutionary leader to the south of the capital, after negotiating a few days with the new regime, went back to his guerrilla campaign.

Salazar, one of the highest generals in the army, denounced Huerta.

Carranza, constitutionalist leader in Chihuahua, assailed Huerta in a bitter statement made public at San Antonio.

Francisco Villa announced himself an adherent of Madero and joined the northern army.

Pasqual Orozco of the clan of the northern revolutionists was the lone notable figure among the disaffected who declared for the new government.

TAFT LEAVES PROBLEM.

President Taft, nearing the end of his term, left to his successor the problem of adjusting diplomatic relations with Mexico. To Woodrow Wilson Huerta sent felicitations on the day of the American president's inauguration.

Hampered at the outset of his administration by the refusal of the United States to recognize him, Huerta soon faced growing difficulties in raising funds to run his government. His uneasy hold on affairs was weakened by minor constitutionalist victories in the north and by recurring rumors of a break with Felix Diaz, nephew of Porfirio Diaz and Huerta's ally in the overthrow of Madero.

HUERTA CALLS ELECTION.

May 1 Huerta announced that he would urge congress to call elections in October to choose his successor. The congress selected October 26 as the date of the election, and a decree to that effect was issued by Huerta June 3.

Feliz Diaz, who had announced himself as a candidate for the presidency, was sent to Japan July 17.

Henry Lane Wilson, American ambassador, was recalled to Washington, and Nelson O'Shaughnessy, charge d'affaires, was left in charge of American interests in Mexico.

REJECTS PEACE EFFORT.

Early in August it became known that President Wilson intended to send John Lind, former governor of Minnesota, to Mexico as his personal representative in an endeavor to arrange a basis for the republic's peace. Huerta announced that he would not tolerate foreign interference.

Nevertheless Mr. Lind delivered his note from President Wilson.

Huerta rejected all proposals made by the American government, chief of which were the suggestions that he resign and not be a candidate election day.

Relations between Mexico and the United States became acute. President Wilson proclaimed his policy in an address before congress to which was attached the correspondence between Mr. Lind and the Huerta administration.

HUERTA ARRESTS DEPUTIES.

Huerta was attacked in the Mexican senate October 5 by Senator Dominguez, who had the hardihood to speak what was in the minds of himself and some of his colleagues. Dominguez disappeared.

The chamber of deputies adopted a resolution calling for an investigation.

To this Huerta's reply was dramatic and swift. He marched a column of troops to the deputies' chamber, seized 110 of them and threw them into prison.

Through Mr. O'Shaughnessy the United States made representations against violence to the imprisoned deputies.

In the election campaign certain influence close to the dictator worked for his return to the presidency, with General Blanquet as his running mate, and lent color to the persistent report that Huerta really desired to be elected and that his pretenses to the contrary were a sham.

U. S. DEMANDS HE RESIGN.

When it became certain that the elections had resulted in no constitutional choice on account of the failure of voters to go to the polls, the American government peremptorily called on him to resign.

In a statement to the diplomatic corps November 9 Huerta announced that he would declare the result of the election null and order another election.

November 12 Huerta refused to accede to the American demand for his resignation, and Mr. Lind left Mexico City for Vera Cruz.

Meantime the United States dispatched warships to the Mexican coast and Americans continued to leave Mexico.

U. S. VEERS TO CARRANZA.

Definite proposals were made by the United States to Carranza and his adherents.

Several of the European powers, notably Great Britain, Germany and France, gave strong support to the policy of the United States.

The constitutionalists grew stronger and continued their advance to the south. They captured Victoria, Chihuahua, Juarez and Tuliacan.

The situation became so critical that Great Britain, Germany, France, Spain and Japan ordered warships to Mexican waters.

Fighting continued at Tampico and many other centers. Torreon soon was taken by the constitutionalists.

RAISES EMBARGO ON ARMS.

An embargo placed on the exportation of arms from the United States to Mexico was raised early in February of the present year.

A large number of American troops were concentrated on the border, and the American fleet in Mexican waters was strengthened.

The constitutionalists advanced on Torreon and Monterey. The former place was captured early in April.

Then came the departure of Mr. Lind from Vera Cruz and the arrest of a party of American bluejackets at Tampico, for which an apology and salute were demanded by the United States and refused by Huerta.

AMERICANS TAKE VERA CRUZ.

April 21 American bluejackets and marines were landed at Vera Cruz in consequence of the reported arrival of a large consignment of arms and ammunition for Huerta. A number of Americans were killed in the street fighting. The Mexicans retired and destroyed a portion of the railroad and the Americans held the port.

Shortly after a mediation proposal from Argentina, Brazil and Chile was accepted. A conference ensued at Niagara Falls.

In the interval American troops relieved the bluejackets at Vera Cruz. These have since remained in occupation of the port.

Tampico and Zacatecas fell into the constitutionalists' hands and the victorious armies continued their march on Mexico City, where rumors were in circulation for many weeks of the resignation of Huerta.

With Huerta's retirement the constitutionalists feel that their revolution has virtually triumphed. They turned against him the moment he overthrew Madero, the constitutional president of Mexico, in February, 1912, and have waged war with unrelenting vigor ever since.

U. S. TROOPS REMAIN IDLE.

The prospect of an early solution of the Mexican problem gave both president Wilson and Secretary Bryan much joy, naturally. American forces will not be withdrawn from Vera Cruz until a stable government has been established in Mexico City and recognition has been accorded the new government.

The feeling is general, however, that if Carranza gives guarantees to political offenders as well as the people generally recognition will be promptly extended by the United States and other nations of Central and South America, as well as Europe.

LAWYER IN PLACE OF POWER

For the First Time in History Mexican Republic Has a Civilian in Presidential Chair.

Mexico City.—Francisco Carbajal is forty-four years old, a native of the state of Campeche, and a lawyer.

Almost ever since the start of his career he has occupied posts in the judiciary. In the Madero administration he was a senator, but relinquished his post to re-enter the supreme court, of which he was chief justice at the time General Huerta appointed him minister of foreign relations.

When General Porfirio Diaz determined in 1911 to treat with the Madero revolutionists, Senor Carbajal proceeded to Juarez as his commissioner.

Senor Carbajal has a reputation for possessing considerable intellectual force and independence of character. His demeanor is quiet. He shuns the exuberance in verbiage and gesticulation to which Latin-Americans are prone. He is courteous, but a man of few words and little given to elaborate compliments.

Besides, he is neat and well groomed in appearance. His features indicate pure European descent, without any admixture of Indian blood.

Altogether he is a man who conveys an impression of reserve power. He is a good man of business.

His probity has never been questioned. He has been sagacious and successful in investments and, while not rich, is a man of independent means. He is a man of family.

BRYAN OUT FOR WOMAN SUFFRAGE; HIS STATEMENT

SECRETARY OF STATE FORMALLY DECLARES HIS POSITION FAVORING FRANCHISE FOR WOMEN.

MEETS MANY ARGUMENTS OFFERED BY OPPOSITION

Nebraskan Would Ask No Political Right Not Given His Wife and Asserts Woman Has Proved Herself Equal to Every Task Imposed Thus Far.

Washington, July 18. — Secretary Bryan, in a formal statement came out for woman suffrage. He declared he would ask no political right for himself that he was not willing to grant his wife, and announced his intention of supporting the proposed state constitutional amendment extending the franchise to women to be voted upon in Nebraska next November.

Woman Proves Herself Capable.

Woman, Mr. Bryan said, has proved herself equal to every responsibility imposed upon her, and would not fail society in this emergency. Above all other arguments in favor of giving her the ballot he placed the right of the mother to a voice in the moulding of the environment of her children.

"The mother," the secretary said, can justly claim the right to employ every weapon which can be made effective for the protection of those whose interests she guards and the ballot will put within her reach all of the instrumentalities of government, including the police power."

Bryan's Argument.

The statement follows in part:

"As man and woman are co-tenants of the earth and must work out their destiny together, the presumption is on the side of equality of treatment in all that pertains to their joint life and its opportunities. The burden of proof is on those who claim for one an advantage over the other in determining the conditions under which both shall live. This claim has not been established in the matter of suffrage.

"The first objection which I remember to have heard was that as woman cannot bear arms she should not have a voice in deciding questions that might lead to war, or in enacting laws that might require an army for their enforcement. This argument is seldom offered now, for the reason that as civilization advances laws are obeyed because they are an expression of public opinion, not merely because they have power behind them.

Might Relieve Monotony.

"Second, it is urged by some that woman's life is already full of care and that the addition of suffrage would either overburden her or turn her attention away from the duties of the home. The answer made to this is that the exercise of the franchise might result in a change of thought and occupation that would relieve the monotony.

"Third, many well meaning men and women affirm that suffrage would work a harm to women by lessening the respect in which she is held. This argument would have more weight had it not been employed against every proposition advanced in favor of the enlargement of woman's sphere. This objection was once raised to the higher education of woman, but it is no longer heard.

Fears Proved Groundless.

"These objections, however, honestly advanced, have proven impotent to retard woman's progress. May not the fears sincerely entertained by the opponents of woman suffrage be found to be as groundless as those that once forced the widow in eastern India to ascend the funeral pyre or as those that exclude Mohammedan women from the social benefits and responsibilities which the woman of the Christian world shares?

"And are not the second and third objections above stated refuted, to some extent, at least, by the fact that in the states which have adopted woman suffrage (and in the other nations that have adopted it) there is no agitation for a return to the system under which man has a monopoly of the right to vote? Is it not fair to assume that an effort would be made to correct the mistake if woman suffrage had really failed to give satisfaction to the people where it has been tried?

Rights of Mother Supreme.

"The mother can justly claim the right to employ every weapon which can be made effective for the protection of those whose interests she guards, and the ballot will put within her reach all the instrumentalities of government, including the police power.

"Politics will not suffer by woman's entrance into it. If the political world has grown more pure in spite of the evil influences that have operated to debase it, it will not be polluted by the presence and participation of woman.

Shark's Egg Is Black.

A shark's egg is one of the oddest looking things imaginable. It is unprovided with shell, but the contents are protected by a thick, leathery covering, almost as elastic as india rubber. The average size is 2 by 2¾ inches and it is almost jet black.

"Well, hide those scientific works on agriculture. And don't forget to tousle your hair and stick your trousers in your boots. Summer boarders always like to imagine there's a real comic-picture farmer around the place."

RASH SPREAD RAPIDLY

Granton, Wis.—"My sister had a very bad, deep, wet, running sore on the side of her face and it ran up to her ear. It commenced with a small blotch of pimples which turned into a kind of rash and spread rapidly. It itched and looked red and sore for some time and slightly swelled. A thin fluid dripped and ran from the sores which looked like water. Then the swelling would go down and it would keep on spreading. It bothered her during sleep and she would be restless. It was a kind of eczema.

"She treated for some time and it did not help her. It kept spreading larger and deeper. Having always used Cuticura Soap we told her to try it so she got some Cuticura Soap and Ointment and used them. It was two months when it was gone." (Signed) Miss Emma Retzloff, Apr. 7, 1914.

PARDON BODY TOPS PREVIOUS RECORDS

STATE BOARD FREES EIGHT AND COMMUTES SENTENCES OF ELEVEN.

WOMAN "LIFER" MAY GET OUT

Mrs. Brennan, Sentenced for Murder of Three Step-Children, Is Given Hopes of Freedom—Cases Acted Upon.

St. Paul.—In all, the board of pardons granted eight pardons and 11 commutations of sentence, when it met Wednesday, which is said by Archie M. Hayes, secretary, to top all previous records of this board. Peter A. Ward, who was convicted of attempted robbery in the Dyckman hotel during fair week, 1912, was one of the few to be denied.

To Free Mrs. Brennan.

Hopes of freedom within a year are held out to Mrs. Stella Brennan, who has been a prisoner in the state penitentiary at Stillwater for nearly nine years for the murder of three stepchildren, as the pardon board has commuted her life imprisonment to 20 years and the parole board may act on her case in a year. This action of the pardon board is believed to be due largely to the earnest efforts of Warden Henry Wolfer of the penitentiary, who not only holds the conviction that Mrs. Brennan was insane through her physical condition at the time, but that the woman's cause was inadequately defended through a change in attorneys after the trial had begun.

Mr. Wolfer said that Mrs. Brennan had become an expert stenographer, that she is entirely normal and that there is no question bu she is entitled to her freedom. Much weight is given to Mr. Wolfer's statement, as he rarely makes such earnest personal pleas for the release of prisoners.

Others Who Benefit.

Hazel Mundell, who fainted in court room when arraigned on the charge of arson before Judge H. D. Dickinson in the Hennepin county district court and afterward was operated upon for appendicitis, was granted a pardon at the request of the presiding judge.

Axel Linderoos, who pushed a companion off a moving train in Wadena county in 1897 and was convicted of murder in the second degree, receives a commutation of sentence to 40 years and will come under the parole laws in a short time.

Pardon was given to Henry Jackson, who was convicted of murder in the second degree in 1893. It was made a condition that he go to his home at Devils Lake, N. D., and remain there.

Pardons also were granted to Michael Dougherty, convicted of larceny in Hennepin county, provided that he leave the state; Philip Cable, convicted a month ago in Lyon county of attempt to commit robbery; Arthur Miller, sentenced in January from Traverse county for burglary; Maik Rusnock, sentenced in November, 1913, in Koochiching county, for assault in the first degree, who will return to Austria; Bertel Brosvik, sentenced from St. Louis county to six years in 1910 on the charge of forgery.

Fire Marshall Charles E. Keller asked for clemency on behalf of Frank Kramer, convicted of setting fire to the Gedney pickle factory at Plainview, Minn., declaring that the owner of the factory who had kept Kramer drunk for several days and hired him to set fire to the plant, already is at liberty under parole.

Commutation of Sentences.

Commutations of sentence, which will make the prisoners eligible to parole immediately, were granted as follows:

Helmer Tallum, sentenced from Mahnomen county for burglary in the third degree; has served four months.

Harry E. Leigh, sentenced from Swift county, for forgery, Aug. 30, 1913.

Sam Koski, sentenced from St. Louis county in April for assault in the second degree.

James Bradley, sentenced from Rice county in February for grand larceny in the first degree.

William Gaff, sentenced from Ottertail county in April for grand larceny in the second degree.

George L. Summers, convicted August, 1912, of grand larceny in Winona county.

Earl Currier, sentenced May 16 in Renville county for forgery.

Jacob Kotschi, who has served 9½ years for a statutory crime committed in Hennepin county, had his fifteen-year term cut to eleven years.

Albert Thuleen, convicted October, 1913, in Hennepin county of grand larceny in the second degree.

James W. Kuchera, also sentenced for a statutory crime committed in Ramsey county in 1911.

Of the other 150 cases on the calendar many were continued or taken under advisement and a few denied.

Judge Pleads for One.

Judge Charles B. Elliott, formerly of the state supreme court, appeared in person to urge clemency in some form for John Kondolas, who is in prison for causing the death of a tramp. Kondolas, according to Judge Elliott, is a young Greek, who had been but a few years in America when he was placed in charge of a roundhouse at Moorhead, with orders to eject tramps. One morning he was engaged in battle with two of them and finally drove both out. One died some days later in a hospital.

Men Who Are Said to Have Worked $5,000 Fake Horse Race Swindle Recently Arrested.

Minneapolis.—Edward Dixon, who has long been wanted here for swindling E. W. Cole of Mason City, Ia., out of $5,000 on May 29 by a fake wire-tapping game was arrested late Monday as his high-powered motor boat swung to the dock, at Excelsior, Lake Minnetonka. An hour later Charles "Red" Carlson, wanted on the same charge, was taken into custody.

Chief Martinson says he believes he has two of the smoothest wire-tapping swindlers in the country—men for whom warrants were sworn out June 4 after E. W. Cole of Mason City had picked them out of the rogues' gallery as two of a gang of four that had made him bite for $5,000 on the old fake horse race-poolroom dodge.

Dixon had been convicted, the police say, of an attempt to swindle a North Dakota farmer similarly nine months ago. He was out on bail, which he jumped.

Dixon lives in a luxurious summer home near Excelsior. His neighbor in another aristocratic cottage is Carlson.

Crookston Fair a Success.

Crookston.—A large crowd witnessed the first races at the Northwestern Minnesota fair. The stock show, grain, corn and alfalfa exhibits are excellent. W. E. Lee of Long Prairie gave a ten-minute talk on diversified farming, development of a better community spirit and improvement of farm homes and educational facilities to keep the boys and girls on the farm. He avoided any mention of politics.

Aged Prisoner Is Freed.

Stillwater.—After nearly twenty-one years as a convict at the state prison here, Henry Jackson, serving a life sentence, was released and left with his son to make his home in Brainerd. The aged man was working on the state farm when notified today that he had ben pardoned. Michael Dougherty, pardoned on condition that he leave the state, was released.

Body Found and Lost Again.

Park Rapids.—The body of an unidentified young man was found on the shores of Hines lake. It is believed that he was drowned on the Fourth of July when the county picnic was held there. The finders tied the body to the root of a tree and notified the coroner. On his arrival the body had disappeared and no trace of it can be discovered.

Forty College Girls Escape.

Grand Forks, July 17.—A bolt of lightning struck a telephone pole within 10 feet of Larimore hall, Wesley college, and while all electric wires in the dormitory were burned out, none of the 40 girls occupying the building were shocked or injured.

Kicked in Head by Horse.

Red Wing.—With his skull crushed, his nose broken and suffering from hemorrhages, Vele Gerezdan, a farm laborer, lies in a hospital here in a critical condition as the result of being kicked in the head by a horse.

Record Potato Yield Seen.

Crookston.—Leslie Welter, president of the Minnesota Red River Valley Development association, after completing a two days' investigation of the potato crops in Polk, Norman, Mahnomen and Becker counties, said: "The Red River valley is growing one of the biggest, if not the biggest, potato crop in its history. In Clay county we had some potatoes drowned out, but this occurred just in patches and the balance of the crop is so much above the average that the total yield even there will be normal."

MINNEAPOLIS WOMEN HURT

Car in Which Five League Workers Are Riding Topples Over Embankment.

Minneapolis.—An automobile, carrying five Minneapolis women, members of the Women's Welfare league, who were on their way to visit the league's summer camp at Prescott, Wis., toppled over a 300-foot bluff at Indian Mounds park, St. Paul, injuring all of the women, two of them seriously.

The injured are: Miss Gratia Countryman, spine hurt and internal injuries; Miss Grace Gerrish, hip broken, cut and bruised; Mrs. Manley Fosseen, wife of Senator Fosseen, bruised and cut about head, may be injured internally; Mrs. Richard A. Swain, cut and bruised about the head, may be injured internally; Miss May Wessberg, skull injured, probably internal wounds; unconscious, in Mounds Park sanitarium.

Miss Wessberg was the most severely injured and may die. Her skull was injured and she sustained other internal injuries.

The victims of the accident were in an auto driven by Mrs. Swain. The drive at the point where the machine left the road is tortuous and while rounding a bend Mrs. Swain lost control of the car when the brakes refused to hold.

As the auto plunged over the bluff Miss Gerrish was thrown out and landed in the road. As the car rolled over and over, crashing through bushes, the other occupants were thrown out one by one.

In the evening Rice Lake, Lum Park and the Rowe Pit iron mine of the Pittsburgh Steel Ore company at Riverton was visited. A banquet at the Iron Exchange hotel in Brainerd concluded the session.

"HOME-COMING" AT MADELIA

Twenty-fifth High School Commencement Celebrated—Hammond Unable to Attend.

Madelia. — "Home-coming week," held here as an anniversary of the organization and graduation of the first class of Madelia high school twenty-five years ago, attracted many visitors. Every class graduated from the high school but one was represented.

A. A. Benton, who traveled from New York for the home-coming, and A. W. Annis of Windom, gave addresses, recalling the pioneer days of the town. Old settlers came long distances for the reunion.

A parade of alumni was held, each class grouped and carrying their class banners. All the visitors afterwards were taken for a three-hour automobile ride.

Great disappointment was caused by the absence of Congressman Hammond, who organized the high school. He sent regrets, stating that he could not leave Washington.

Friday night J. E. Haycraft and E. C. Farmer gave addresses, followed by short talks from visiting members.

Law Spoils Wedding Romance.

Minneapolis.—Dr. Clyde Baker of Jackson, Minn., accompanied by Miss Melvina Page, faces wreathed in smiles, applied to William Hughes, marriage license clerk, for a license Monday, explaining that the chuckles were caused by the fact that he and his bride-to-be had escaped from their friends in Jackson and would be wed before returning to the home town. Frowns replaced the smiles when the clerk informed them the license must be obtained in the county in which the bride lives.

GOPHER IS INJURIOUS

RECOGNIZED AS MOST IMPORTANT ENEMY OF AGRICULTURE.

Natural Food of Rodent Consists of Succulent Roots and Such Green Vegetation as Can Be Dragged Into the Burrow.

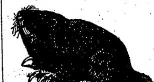
No other animal attacking the underground parts of alfalfa can equal or even closely approach the gopher in destructiveness. The pocket gopher occurs in almost all sections and is everywhere recognized as an important enemy of agriculture on account of its habits of feeding on cultivated pasture grasses and grains. They are injurious in fields of grain which they destroy in great quantities. In cultivated fields they are harmful on account of the large mounds which they throw up in digging their burrows.

The plains pocket gopher, which holds sway on the Western plains, and the prairie pocket gopher which is to be found in almost all parts of the country, are very similar in habits, and the methods of combating one form will also serve for the other.

The prairie gopher is short and stocky, showing an average length of about ten inches from the tip of its nose to the end of its stubby, hairless tail. Its body is covered with silky dark-brown hair, its eyes are small and well protected by fur, and its ears are so short as hardly to cause a ripple in the smooth-lying fur of the head. Its front feet are furnished with long, strong claws and otherwise modified for digging. In fact, the whole structure of the animal fits it for its subterranean existence.

Except for possible brief excursions at periods of migrating, the gopher passes practically its entire life in its burrows. Indeed, it is a rare occurrence to find one abroad on any errand. They appear to live solitary, each individual gopher apparently bent on having the world to himself, and each digging and taking care of his own dwelling. Doubtless where fields are so badly infested that tunnels cross and recross, more than one gopher may be trapped in the same runway. The female produces but one litter of young per year, yet because of her sheltered life raises enough of them that the species is constantly increasing.

The natural food of the gopher consists of succulent roots and such green vegetation as can be dragged from the surface into the burrow. The coming of alfalfa, with its deep-growing succulent roots, has largely solved the question of food supply for this animal by providing it with an abundance easily accessible both in winter and in summer. Truly the conditions of the alfalfa field are such as to render life easy for the gopher tribe. Not only does the animal injure alfalfa by actual consumption of the roots, but by covering up a considerable portion (sometimes 20 per cent) of the area badly infested, and by rendering the crop in fields so infested difficult to harvest. Of the many methods of combating these animals, poisoning has been found at once the quickest and most efficient. This is done by putting carbon bisulphid into the burrow and closing the burrow at once. The fluid may be poured into the burrow directly from the bottle (an ounce of the liquid) or preferably a wad of cotton saturated and rolled into the hole, and the opening closed immediately.



Pocket Gopher.

PROPER TIME TO CUT GRASS

Haste Makes Waste When Crop Is Hurried to Barn Not Fully Cured —Hurrying Doesn't Pay.

As to the best time for cutting grass, it does not pay to be in too much of a hurry. When the grass is young and tender and seemingly succulent in the fresh state, it is harder to cure, dries and shrinks more and has not nearly the food value of the more mature crop.

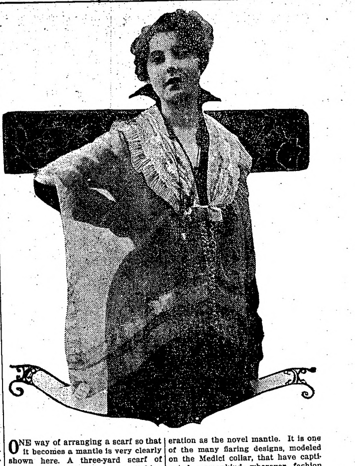
While the opposite extreme should be avoided, cutting before the seed is so ripe as to scatter, there is much more nourishment in the matured stalk; and one farmer who was complimented for bringing his cattle through the winter on a minimum amount of grain and yet keeping them in good flesh attributes his success largely to this fact.

Haste makes waste when the crop is hurried to the barn not fully cured. Hay cut green requires more thorough drying than that almost overripe. If the season is a wet one hay can be mown and taken in the same day when a pleasant day comes, even without a tedder, if matured.

Litter Plan of Feeding.

The deep litter plan of feeding grain, especially for morning, gives splendid results. If the ration is scattered through the litter in the scratching pen, after fowls have gone to roost, it will be ready for them in the morning, giving them both feed and exercise, and save some early morning work for you.

Scarf-Mantle and Medici Collar



ONE way of arranging a scarf so that it becomes a mantle is very clearly shown here. A three-yard scarf of chiffon is finished with hem-stitching at the head of a two-inch hem on three sides and has a half-inch hem on the fourth side. A tuck, equal in width to the hem, and an inch above it, is placed across each end.

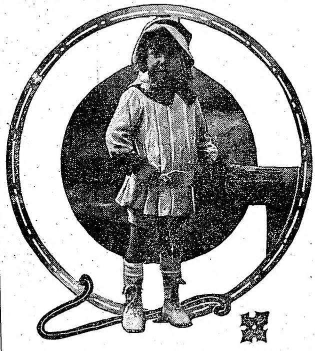
This length of chiffon is thrown around the shoulder like a shawl and a piece of wide silk lace is laid over it to form a collar. The chiffon and lace are caught up in small plaits to fit the mantle about the neck. A narrow knife plaiting, made of the chiffon, edges the lace, and this collar effect is finished with a flat bow of folded chiffon at the front. There is a little quilting made of a plain fold of chiffon, gathered on a shirring thread, which borders the edges of the mantle at the front.

The beautiful collar of black embroidery is quite as well worth consideration as the novel mantle. It is one of the many flaring designs, modeled on the Medici collar, that have captivated womankind wherever fashion counts for anything. It is wired, to hold its position, with tiny wires sewed between the two thicknesses of material used.

A strand of odd Chinese beads of mother-of-pearl and glass, fastened at intervals on a strong silken cord and finished with a tassel, adds an item of interest to the quiet gown of black cloth.

With a mantle which Spain may have inspired, a collar patterned after those worn in France three centuries ago, and queer beads of ancient Chinese origin as to design, the youthful wearer demonstrates how all the world pays tribute to beauty and is busy fashioning things for its adorning. It will not grow less busy, for beauty instinctively believes in going beautifully appareled.

Masculine Outfit for Tiny Boy



ON THAT happy day when the baby boy discards dresses and proudly disdains them forever afterward he dons a distinctly masculine outfit like that pictured in the pleasing illustration given here. Laces and thin fabrics are a thing of the past with him, and he is hereafter to be clothed in substantial stuffs to fit the rough-and-tumble experiences of his boyhood which lie before him.

All the world over mothers might follow this manner of dressing the small man, and find it in every way the most satisfactory of styles. It allows the child absolute freedom, is easily kept clean and is smart in appearance. It is so simple in construction that the most ordinary of needlewomen can undertake the making.

All the strongly-woven cotton, linen and plain woolen fabrics, and especially those that will stand tubbing, are used for the tiny boy. Serges, cheviots, velveteens (for dressy wear), ginghams, coarse, unbleached linens, cotton or wool corduroy, pique and white linens (the last two for dress-up occasions in summer time) and other desirable fabrics make it easy to choose something for him. In the picture shown here the blouse is of a gray flannel, with collar and cuffs of a ribbed fabric in red. The pants are of the same material as the blouse.

The little gray hat of felt has a ribbon band of red and ribbon ties in gray. These ties and the lad's curls are all that is left to him of babyhood, and by the time his years amount to four they must disappear.

It is usual to make two or three pairs of pants to one blouse and to provide a generous hem on the blouse in case of shrinkage. A belt made of two thicknesses of the material in the blouse and strengthened by machine stitching is best fastened with button and buttonhole. Wash fabrics should be shrunk before the suit is made.

Plain fabrics make the most attractive clothes for little boys. On linens or other material suited to embroidering, small patterns appear on the cuffs and collars. Machine stitching makes an appropriate decoration also for boys' clothes. But no ornamentation at all is better than much ornamentation, and embroidery or machine stitching or braiding is to be sparingly used.

THE SUNBEAM.

BY W. G. HUNT.

Published every Friday, at Sunbeam, Pennington County, Minnesota.

Entered as Second-class matter August 30 1905, at the post office at Sunbeam Minn. under the Act of Congress of March 3.1879

The Mankato Review is of the opinion that the Minnesota democracy can afford to exchange one congressman for a governor. True—if true—but, it takes "two to make a trade." It isn't possible to "first get a governor."—Red Lake Falls Gazette.

If O'Neill had had his record in the last legislature written on a school boy's slate so he could spit on it and rub it out, his wonderful gift of "gab" might elect him as Senator, but that horrid record haunts him like a nightmare. We wonder if he dreams of that speech that he is going to make at the laying of the corner stone of the State Normal School at Bemidji.

The laying of ties and steal rails on the electric line being built eastward from Thief River Falls started this week. Twenty miles of track will be laid in time to move this season's crop and three stations with loading platforms established. Our people who have long wished for an east and west railway line through Norman county, will watch the new venture with interest.—Norman County Index.

It is just the thing my boys, for a handy farmers railroad, and some of the older counties of the state would do well to pattern after the Baby Pennington.

C. L. Hanson of Thief River Falls. Senatorial candidate from this district, made friends on his visit here July 4th by his fair and square way of speaking on Government and State matters. He seems to be a man who is making good in his chosen profession as well as any other work he has undertaken, and undoubtedly would make good, if elected to represent us. Mr. Hanson is a Scandinavian by birth and a strong factor in his favor is that the majority of the people inhabiting the 65th District are of the same tongue.—Gonvick Banner.

Being a Scandinavian does not [illegible] or advance Mr. Hanson in our estimation, as we respect him as an honorable adopted citizen of this country, who has not made himself an "undesirable" citizen, but a good one, who will well and honorably represent the people of this District in the next State senate.

We are in receipt of a copy of the statement made to the public by the Engineers of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers and Firemen, of their side of the great anticipated strike on practically all of the Western Railroads. It seems to us that their contention is fair, and if the Railroad Corporations allow this strike to take place it will tie up the entire business of the western states. The men are only asking a fair increase of pay, in proportion to their increase earning capacity for the companies, and their increased cost of living. The facts of the whole matter is, that the railroads have been figuring their cost system down every year by increasing the size of their locomotives and cars, and still have the same number of men do the work without increasing their pay, and if this strike now comes it will be the fault of the railroads, and their managements, and not the employees. The enginemen will not place their grievances before an arbitration committee as the history of the past has been that the Railway companies would not keep their part of the agreement, and this time it is come across with an increase of pay, or we quit, and the men are right.

Pennington County Fair.

The Pennington county fair will be held at Thief River Falls on August 5, 6 and 7th this year. The fair will be bigger and better than ever, this year, as the management have secured the attendance of the great International Shows who will furnish entertainment during the three days of the fair. The world's famous Birdman Lincoln Beachy will make two flights daily on August 6th and 7th, and this man will not disappoint the people, as they were three year ago, but those who visit the Pennington county fair this year will see an aero plane fly. There is also a big program of races, and the farmers should try to assist the management by making a good display of farm products, and be sure to attend the fair.

WHY WE WILL NOT SUPPORT O'NEIL.

As it took Hon. D. P. O'Neill about three months to make his record in the last legislature as Representative of the farmers we will claim about that much time to publish it.

One of the most bitter fights in the last legislature was over the proposed amendment to the constitution limiting any one county in the state to a representation of only seven senators; Red Lake, Clearwater and Pennington counties only have one. Now do you not think that Hennipen and Ramsey counties had ought to be satisfied with fourteen? This amendment was proposed by country members who fore saw that with the rapid increase in the population of the big cities in this state that they would soon have complete control of the state legislature to the detriment of the farming country districts. Or to make it more plain they could pass a law compelling the state to pay for tickets for the city people to attend a moving picture show, while the farmer was at home being butted around by a calf that he was teaching to drink, so he could sell it to pay his taxes. There is nothing unfair about this as it is no more than the U. S. Senate have done regarding states, as the state of Rhode Island, the smallest state in the Union has just as much representation in the U. S. Senate as Texas, the largest state in the Union.

But O'Neill jumped up and pawed the air, and hollered that that was the most unfair proposition that he ever heard of, but when it came to a vote there was enough true reprensentatives of the country districts in that legislature to pass this just proprosed amendment to the constitution against the united opposition of the cities and D. P. O'Neill, and it is to be submitted to the people to be voted on in November. When the votes are counted on this proposed amendment from this district, ninety-eight percent of them will be, yes—X.

Now then Did O'Neill represent his constituants when he voted against the passage of this amendment, or did he represent the interest of the big cities and D. P. O'Neill? Please arise and answer, either O'Neill or his friends.

Any one knows that has ever had a measure before the legislature, or been interested in one, that they always inquire how the Hennipen and Ramsey delegation stands on the question, because they have a bunch of votes, and they "bunch them" when any question comes before the legislature, in which the farmers' interests is on one side and the cities on the other, hence the honest country members proposed to clip their wings so they could not fly so high, and passed the proposed amendment to the constitution, known as the Seven Senator amendment. But O'Neill said, "NO! NO! that is unfair," he is representing the farmers you know.

THE LOCAL NEWS

The farmers are all busy haying this week.

Post cards for sale at this office.

Wm. Causin is haying on the Jerry O'Brien farm this week.

C. L. Clark took his teams off of the ditch grade this week to start haying.

Some Indians have been camping west of here the past week digging snake root.

A Jew peddler was around pestering the people of this locality Wednesday.

T. C. Halverson is going to put in the first general store at the end of the new Electric Line six miles north of Highlanding.

Farmers should endeavor to get their horses acquainted with Automobiles, as they now have to meet them on the roads about as often as they do teams.

Work is progressing steadily on ditch 53, and they will tap the lake at the upper end of the branch in a few days.

Flax reached the nice little sum of $1.74 a bushel at Duluth Tuesday, which is welcome news to our Pennington county flax raisers.

Carl Narveson now has five head of horses and is doing quite a flourishing business in the horse dealing line.

The Great Northwestern Fair held at Crookston last week drew a large crowd and was a big advertising boost for Northern Minnesota.

The weather conditions are favorable for the crops, and Pennington county will reap the biggest crop this year that they ever had.

Superintendent of Schools Mostue is getting into the game already, and the campaign for that office promises to be a warm one.

Cornelius Peterson of Kratka, informs us that a small add in THE SUNBEAM soon sold all of his surplus oats, and he is firmly of the opinion that it pays to advertise.

The township has now got the approaches to the Highlanding ferry fixed up in good shape, and the Creamery Association will now put cables and ferry in good shape for crossing.

The horse flies and sand flies are after the stock all day now days and the mosquitoes are after them nights. A good big smudge built in the yard helps some to give them a little rest.

The grading is about all completed on the new Electric line railway, and a large crew of men are now laying the ties and steel on it, so we are sure to have a railroad before it is time to market this years crop.

It is reported that some of the Automobiles that drive on the Ellwell road between here and Thief River Falls have a fashion of not slacking their regular pace, or giving their share of the road, when they meet a farmer with a skittish team, but laugh to see him go into the ditch as they pass by. We have always been fortunate in meeting gentlemen in this respect, but it appears that some other farmers have not. When a road hog passes you with an Auto, at full speed and your team is rushing into the ditch, let the horses go and get the number of that Auto, then come and see W. G. Hunt, and he will endeavor to see that you get all damages that you suffer and that that Auto driver will be a little careful in the future. The farmers lands are taxed to build this good road to market and they are entitled to use their share of it and smart "Alex's" had better beware of running farmers teams into the ditch and laughing about it.

Now is the time to cut the heads off of the weeds, before they go to seed.

Harvest will not start in this locality for about two weeks, except winter rye.

The farmers will all be busy finishing up their haying during fair week, the first week of August, but there will be quite a number of them take in the fair.

Local twine dealers should attend to it to lay in their supply of twine for harvest, for if that railroad strike comes there will be no way of getting twine from the cities to the farming districts unless you haul it with teams.

POLITICAL ANNOUNCEMENT.

The undersigned respectfully solicits the support and vote of the electorate, men and women, of Pennington county at the November election for re-election to the office of SUPERINTENDENT OF SCHOOLS.

Being mindful of past favors, I now pledge my best efforts for the upbuilding of our rural schools.

Respectfully Submitted,
E. A Mostue.

ELECTIONS IN FRANCE.

They Are Held on Sunday and Rarely Finished in One Day.

In France elections are held on Sunday. Universal manhood suffrage is the rule. Every Frenchman of twenty-one years of age, on proof of six months' residence, is a legal voter at the elections to the chamber, saving only soldiers on active service and others disqualified for bankruptcy and criminal reasons. Because of the number of candidates the first day's polling in many districts is not final. Where no candidate receives an absolute majority, a second election is held. It often happens that from one-third to one-fourth of the elections for deputies are not finally decided until the second poll, when not infrequently one or more candidates in a district have withdrawn.

The polling begins at 8 in the morning and lasts until 6 in the evening. Instead of regularly appointed clerks and election officials, three volunteers take charge of the "urn" in which the ballots are deposited and conduct the proceedings. One of the penalties of being first to appear is the likelihood of being impressed into service as one of the assessors, of whom two, both independent voters, must serve with the "president of the ballot." The counting of the ballots is also done by volunteers called for from among the electors.

In the absence of the party system it is difficult strictly to classify the candidates. In a general way they range themselves in groups around certain well known political leaders.—New York World.

STRUCK FROM THE ROLLS.

What Happens to an English Lawyer When He Goes Wrong.

When a solicitor passes his examinations his name is entered on the "rolls" of the legal profession. Should he ever become guilty of professional misconduct his name is "struck off the rolls."

It is a grave matter. Any person having a complaint against a solicitor in reference to his professional conduct is supposed to forward it to the Incorporated Law society, the body which rules the legal profession. His private life doesn't trouble the society unless he is convicted of a criminal offense.

Having received the complaint and evidence in support of it, the society brings the matter before a divisional court composed of two or three of the most distinguished judges on the bench. The solicitor is given every chance of defending himself, but if, after hearing the evidence, the judges decide that he is guilty his name is "struck from the rolls." Should the offense be a minor one, caused more by misunderstanding than fraud, the solicitor may be suspended for a period and allowed to practice again at the expiration of it.

A solicitor cannot be "struck off the rolls" for negligence or bankruptcy. A client's remedy in the first case is to bring an action against him for damages. Bankruptcy is adjudged to be a misfortune and therefore is not "professional misconduct."—London Tit-Bits.

Where His Love Lay.

He was sitting in front of a brightly burning fire talking to her. After a while he said thoughtfully:

"This reminds me of a grate that I used to sit in front of years ago."

"I can well imagine how you enjoyed those evenings," she responded hopefully; "open fires give one such a sense of home." But he went on talking of drafts and heat and ashes and the hygienic condition of a room ventilated by a fireplace.

"I have never known a grate," he continued, "like the one in the home of the girl where I used to go so often."

A long silence followed, the crackling of the fire the only sound in the room. It was broken at last by him in a voice that had echoes of a dear memory in its tone: "You cannot imagine how I loved that—grate!"—New York Post.

Abelard and Heloise.

Heloise was noted as much for her intellectual ability as for her personal beauty. She was familiar with the literature of four or five languages—Italian, French, Greek, Latin and Hebrew. Her knowledge was remarkable; her conversational powers were brilliant. It was her bright mind and varied learning that first attracted the attention of Abelard. Abelard died in 1142, Heloise in 1164. First buried at St. Marcel, Abelard's remains were shifted several times, but finally reached the well known tomb at Pere la Chaise wherein also rest the ashes of Heloise.

The Reconciliation.

The doctor was soon at the child's bedside. Remedies were administered; then the agonized pair watched the fight for life—skill and vitality on one side, fierce disease on the other. When at last the struggle ceased the gray dawn of day was looking in at the window. Life had won. The child slept.

"She is all right now," said the doctor, shaking the man's hand, which had gripped his, and feeling his heart grow warmer under the look of mute gratitude the woman turned upon him.

When he had gone the two stood side by side at the baby's crib, listening to her regular breathing. Then with one accord they turned and kissed each other. And in that kiss the icy barrier between them melted away.—Atlanta Constitution.

CHAPTER XX.—Continued.

"I thought perhaps he had written you about his plans."

"My father does not know that I have returned to New York."

"Oh, I see. Of course. Um—um! By the way, I think the colonel is a corker. One of the most amiable thoroughbreds I've ever come across. Ripping. He's never said anything to me about your antipathy toward him, but I can see with half an eye that he is terribly depressed about it. Can't you get together some way on—"

"Really, Mr. Wrandall, you are encouraging your imagination to a point where words ultimately must fail you," she said very positively. Booth could hardly repress a chuckle.

"It's not imagination on my part," said Leslie with conviction, failing utterly to recognize the obvious. "I suppose you know that he is coming over to visit me for six weeks or so. We became rattling good friends before we parted. My Jove, you should hear him on old Lord Murgatroyd's will! The quintessence of wit! I couldn't take it as he does. Expectations and all that sort of thing, you know, going up like a hot air balloon and bursting in plain view. But he never squeaked. Laughed it off. A British attribute, I dare say. I suppose you know that he is obliged to sell his estate in Ireland?"

Hetty started. She could not conceal the look of shame that leaped into her eyes.

"I—I did not know," she murmured.

"Must be quite a shock to you. Sit down, Brandy. You look very picturesque standing, but chairs were made to sit upon—or in, whichever is proper.

Booth shrugged his shoulders.

"I think I'll stand, if you don't mind, Les."

"I merely suggested it, old chap, fearing you might have overlooked the possibilities. Yes, Miss Castleton, he left us in London to go up to Belfast on this dismal business." There was something in the back of his mind that he was trying to get at in a tactful manner. "By the way, is this property entailed?"

"I know nothing at all about it, Mr. Wrandall," said she, with a pleading glance at her lover, as if to inquire what stand she should take in this distressing situation.

"If it is entailed he can't sell it," said Booth quietly.

"That's true," said Leslie, somewhat dubiously. Then, with a magnanimity that covered a multitude of doubts he added: "Of course, I am only interested in seeing that you are properly protected, Miss Castleton. I've no doubt you hold an interest in the estates."

"I can't very well discuss a thing I know absolutely nothing about," she said succinctly.

"Most of it is in building lots and factories in Belfast, of course. It was more in the nature of a question than a declaration. "The old family castle isn't very much of an asset, I take it."

"I fancy you can trust Colonel Castleton to make the best possible deal in the premises," said Booth drily.

"I suppose so," said the other resignedly. "He is a shrewd beggar, I'm convinced of that. Strange, however, that I haven't heard a word from him since he left us in London. I've been expecting a cablegram from him every day for nearly a fortnight, letting me know when to expect him."

"Are you going to California this winter for the flying?" asked Hetty.

Sara entered at that juncture, and they all sat down to listen for half an hour to Leslie's harangue on the way the California meet was being mismanaged, at the end of which he departed.

He took Booth away with him, much to that young man's disgust.

"Do you know, Brandy, old fellow," said he as they walked down Fifth avenue in the gathering dusk of the early winter evening, "ever since I've begun to suspect that damned old humbug of a father of hers, I've been congratulating myself that there isn't the remotest chance of his ever becoming my father-in-law. And, by George, you'll never know how near I was to leaping blindly into the brambles. What a close call I had!"

Booth's sarcastic smile was hidden by the dusk. He made no pretense of openly resenting the meanness of spirit that moved Leslie to these caddish remarks. He merely announced in a dry, cutting voice:

"I think Miss Castleton is to be congratulated that her injury is no greater than nature made it in the beginning."

"What do you mean by 'nature?'"

"Nature gave her a father, didn't it?"

"Obviously."

"Well, why add insult to injury?"

"By Jove! Oh, I say, old man!"

They parted at the next corner. As Booth started to cross over to the Plaza, Leslie called out after him:

"I say, Brandy, just a second, please. Are you going to marry Miss Castleton?"

"I am."

"Then, I retract the scurvy things I said back there. I asked her to marry me three times and she refused me three times. What I said about the brambles was rotten. I'd ask her again if I thought she's have me. There you are, old fellow. I'm a rotten cad, but I apologize to you just the same."

"You're learning, Leslie," said Booth, taking the hand the other held out to him.

While the painter was dining at his club later on in the evening, he was called to the telephone. Watson was on the wire. He said that Mrs. Wrandall would like to know if Mr. Booth could drop in on her for a few minutes after dinner, "to discuss a very important matter, if you please, sir." At nine o'clock, Booth was in Sara's library, trying to grasp a new and remarkable phase in the character of that amazing woman.

He found Hetty waiting for him when he arrived.

"I don't know what it all means, Brandon," she said hurriedly, looking over her shoulder as she spoke. "Sara says that she has come to a decision of some sort. She wants us to hear her plan before making it final. I—I don't understand her at all tonight."

"It can't be anything serious, dearest," he said, but something cold and nameless oppressed him just the same.

"She asked me if I had finally decided to—to be your wife, Brandon. I said I had asked you for two or three days more in which to decide. It seemed to depress her. She said she didn't see how she could give me up, even to you. She wants to be near me always. It is—it is really tragic, Brandon."

He took her hands in his.

"We can fix that," said he confidently. "Sara can live with us if she feels that way about it. Our home shall be hers when she likes, and as long as she chooses. It will be open to her all the time, to come and go or to stay, just as she elects. Isn't that the way to put it?"

"I suggested something of the sort, but she wasn't very much impressed. Indeed, she appeared to be somewhat—yes, I could not have been mistaken—somewhat harsh and terrified when I spoke of it. Afterwards she was more reasonable. She thanked me and—there were tears in her eyes at the time—and said she would think it over. All she asks is that I may be happy and free and untroubled all the rest of my life. This was before dinner. At dinner she appeared to be brooding over something. When we left the table she took me to her room and said that she had come to an important decision. Then she instructed Watson to find you if possible."

"'Gad, it's all very upsetting," he said, shaking his head.

"I think her conscience is troubling her. She hates the Wrandalls, but I—I don't know why I should feel as I do about it—but I believe she wants them to know!"

He stared for a moment, and then his face brightened. "And so do I, Hetty, so do I! They ought to know!"

"I should feel so much easier if the whole world knew," said she earnestly.

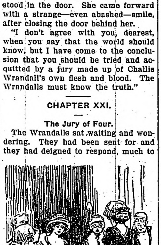
Sara heard the girl's words as she stood in the door. She came forward with a strange—even abashed—smile, after closing the door behind her.

"I don't agree with you, dearest, when you say that the world should know, but I have come to the conclusion that you should be tried and acquitted by a jury made up of Challis Wrandall's own flesh and blood. The Wrandalls must know the truth."

CHAPTER XXI.

The Jury of Four.

The Wrandalls sat waiting and wondering. They had been sent for and they had deigned to respond, much to their own surprise. Redmond Wrandall occupied a place at the head of the library table. At his right sat his wife. Vivian and Leslie, by direction, took seats at the side of the long table, which had been cleared of its mass of books and magazines. Lawyer Carroll was at the other end of the table, perceptibly nervous and anxious. Hetty sat a little apart from the others, a rather forlorn, detached member of the conclave. Brandon Booth, pale-faced and alert, drew up a chair alongside Carroll, facing Sara who alone remained standing, directly opposite the four Wrandalls.



The Wrandalls Leaned Forward in Their Chairs.

Not one of the Wrandalls knew why they, as a family, were there. They had not the slightest premonition of what was to come.

The Wrandalls had been routed from their comfortable fireside—for what? They were asking the question of themselves and they were waiting stonily for the answer.

"It is very stuffy in here," Vivian had said with a glance at the closed doors after Sara had successfully placed her jury in the box.

"Keep still, Viv," whispered Leslie, with a fine assumption of awe. "It's a spiritualistic meeting. You'll scare the spooks away."

It was at this juncture that Sara rose from her chair and faced them, as calmly, as complacently as if she were about to ask them to proceed to the dining-room instead of to throw a bomb into their midst that would shatter their smug serenity for all time to come. With a glance at Mr. Carroll she began, clearly, firmly and without a prefatory apology for what was to follow.

"I have asked you to come here tonight to be my judges. I am on trial. You are about to hear the story of my unspeakable perfidy. I only require of you that you hear me to the end before passing judgment."

At her words, Hetty and Booth started perceptibly; a quick glance passed between them, as if each was inquiring whether the other had caught the extraordinary words of self-indictment. A puzzled frown appeared on Hetty's brow.

"Perfidy?" interposed Mr. Wrandall. His wife's expression changed from one of bored indifference to sharp inquiry. Leslie paused in the act of lighting a cigarette.

"It is the mildest term I can command," said Sara. "I shall be as brief as possible in stating the case, Mr. Wrandall. You will be surprised to hear that I have taken it upon myself, as the wife of Challis Wrandall and, as I regard it, the one most vitally concerned if not interested in the discovery and punishment of the person who took his life—I say I have taken it upon myself to shield, protect and defend the unhappy young woman who accompanied him to Burton's inn on that night in March. She has had my constant, my personal protection for more than twenty months."

The Wrandalls leaned forward in their chairs. The match burned Leslie's fingers, and he dropped it without appearing to notice the pain.

"What is this you are saying?" demanded Redmond Wrandall.

"When I left the inn that night, after seeing my husband's body in the little upstairs room, I said to myself that the one who took his life had unwittingly done me a service. He was my husband; I loved him, I adored him. To the end of my days I could have gone on loving him in spite of the cruel return he gave for my love and loyalty. I shall not attempt to tell you of the countless lapses of fidelity on his part. You would not believe me. But he always came back to me with the pitiful love he had for me, and I forgave him his transgressions. These things you know. He confessed many things to you, Mr. Wrandall. He humbled himself to me. Perhaps you will recall that I never complained to you of him. What rancor I had was always directed toward you, his family, who would see no wrong in your king but looked upon me as dirt beneath his feet. There were moments when I could have slain him with my own hands, but my heart rebelled. There were times when he said to me that I ought to kill him for the things he had done. You may now understand what I mean when I say that the girl who went to Burton's inn with him did me a service. I will not say that I considered her guiltless at the time. On the contrary, I looked upon her in quite a different way. I had no means of knowing then that she was as pure as snow and that he would have despoiled her of everything that was sweet and sacred to her. She took his life in order to save that which was dearer to her than her own life, and she was on her way to pay for her deed with her life if necessary when I came upon her and intervened."

"You—you know who she is?" said Mr. Wrandall, in a low, incredulous voice.

"I have known almost from the beginning. Presently you will hear her story, from her own lips."

Involuntarily four pairs of eyes shifted. They looked blankly at Hetty Castleton.

Speaking swiftly, Sara depicted the scenes and sensations experienced during that memorable motor journey to New York city.

"I could not believe that she was a vicious creature, even then. Something told me that she was a tender, gentle thing who had fallen into evil hands and had struck because she was unevil. I did not doubt that she had been my husband's mistress, but I could not destroy the conviction that somehow she had been justified in doing the thing she had done. My gravest mistake was in refusing to hear her story in all of its details. I only permitted her to acknowledge that she had killed him, no more. I did not want to hear the thing which I assumed to be true. Therein lies my deepest fault. For months and months I misjudged her in my heart, yet secretly loved her. Now I understand why I loved her. It was because she was innocent of the only crime I could lay at her feet. Now I come to the crime of which I stand self-accused. I must have been mad all these months. I have no other defense to offer. You may take it as you see it for yourselves. I do not ask for pardon. After I deliberately had set about to shield this unhappy girl—to cheat the law, if you please—to cheat you, perhaps—I conceived the horrible thought to avenge myself for all the indignities I had sustained at the hands of you Wrandalls, and at the same time to even my account with the one woman whom I could put my finger upon as having robbed me of my husband's love. You see I put it mildly. I have hated all of you, Mrs. Wrandall, even as you have hated me. Today—now—I do not feel as I did in other days toward you. I do not love you, still I do not hate you. I do not forgive you, and yet I think I have come to see things from your point of view. I can only repeat that I do not hate you as I once did."

She paused. The Wrandalls were too deeply submerged in horror to speak. They merely stared at her as if stupefied; as breathless, as motionless as stones.

"There came a day when I observed that Leslie was attracted by the guest in my house. On that day the plan took root in my brain. I—"

"Good God!" fell from Leslie's lips. "You—you had that in mind?"

"It became a fixed, inflexible purpose, Leslie. Not that I hated you as I hated the rest, for you tried to be considerate. The one grudge I held against you was that in seeking to sustain me you defamed your own brother. You came to me with stories of his misdeeds; you said that he was a scoundrel and that you would not blame me for 'showing him up.' Do you not remember? And so my plot involved you; you were the only one through whom I could strike. There were times when I faltered. I could not bear the thought of sacrificing Hetty Castleton, nor was it easy to thoroughly appease my conscience in respect to you. Still, if I could have had my way a few months ago, if coercion had been of any avail, you would now be the husband of your brother's slayer. Then I came to know that she was not what I had thought she was. She was honest. My bubble burst. I came out of the maze in which I had been living and saw clearly that what I had contemplated was the most atrocious—"

"Atrocious?" cried Mrs. Redmond Wrandall between her set teeth. "Diabolical! Diabolical! My God, Sara, what a devil you—" She did not complete the sentence, but sank back in her chair and stared with wide, horror-struck eyes at her rigid daughter-in-law.

Her husband, his hand shaking as if with palsy, pointed a finger at Hetty. "And so you are the one we have been hunting for all these months, Miss Castleton! You are the one we want! You who have sat at our table, you who have smiled in our faces—"

"Stop, Mr. Wrandall!" commanded Sara, noting the ashen face of the girl. "Don't let the fact escape you that I am the guilty person. Don't forget that she owed her freedom, if not her life to me. I alone kept her from giving herself up to the law. All that has transpired since that night in March must be placed to my account. Hetty Castleton has been my prisoner. She has rebelled a thousand times and I have conquered—not by threats but by love! Do you understand? Because of her love for me, and because she believed that I loved her, she submitted. You are not to accuse her, Mr. Wrandall. Accuse me! I am on trial here. Hetty Castleton is a witness against me, if you choose to call upon her as such. If not, I shall ask her to speak in my defense, if she can do so."

"This is lunacy!" cried Mr. Wrandall, coming to his feet. "I don't care what your motives may have been. They do not make her any less a murderess. She—"

"We must give her over to the police—" began his wife, struggling to her feet. She staggered. It was Booth who stepped quickly to her side to support her. Leslie was staring at Hetty.

Vivian touched her father's arm. She was very pale but vastly more composed than the others.

"Father, listen to me," she said. Her voice trembled in spite of her effort to control it. "We are condemning Miss Castleton unheard. Let us hear everything before we—"

"Good God, Vivian! Do you mean to—"

"How can we place any reliance on what she may say?" cried Mrs. Wrandall.

"Nevertheless," said Vivian firmly, "I for one shall not condemn her unheard. I mean to be as fair to her as Sara has been. It shall not be said that all the Wrandalls are smaller than Sara Gooch!"

"My child—" began her father incredulously. His jaw dropped suddenly. His daughter's shot had landed squarely in the heart of the Wrandall pride.

"If she has anything to say"—said Mrs. Wrandall, waving Booth aside and sinking stiffly into her chair. Her husband sat down. Their jaws set hard.

"Thank you, Vivian," said Sara, surprised in spite of herself. "You are nobler than I—"

"Please don't thank me, Sara," said Vivian icily. "I was speaking for Miss Castleton."

Sara flushed. "I suppose it is useless to ask you to be fair to Sara Gooch, as you choose to call me."

"Do you feel in your heart that we still owe you anything?"

"Enough of this, Vivian," spoke up her father harshly. "If Miss Castleton desires to speak we will listen to her. I must advise you, Miss Castleton, that the extraordinary disclosures made by my daughter-in-law do not lessen your culpability. We do not insist on this confession from you. You deliver it at your own risk. I want to be fair with you. If Mr. Carroll is your counsel, he may advise you now to refuse to make a statement."

Mr. Carroll bowed slightly in the general direction of the Wrandalls. "I have already advised Miss Castleton to state the case fully and completely to you, Mr. Wrandall. It was I who originally suggested this—well, what you might call a private trial for her. I am firmly convinced that when you have heard her story, you, as her judges, will acquit her of the charge of murder. Moreover, you will be content to let your own verdict end the matter, sparing yourselves the shame and ignominy of having her story told in a criminal court for the delectation of an eager but somewhat implacable world."

"Your language is extremely unpleasant, Mr. Carroll," said Mr. Wrandall coldly.

"I meant to speak kindly, sir."

"Do you mean, sir, that we will let the matter rest after hearing the—"

"That is precisely what I mean, Mr. Wrandall. You will not consider her guilty of a crime. Please bear in mind this fact: but for Sara and Miss Castleton you would not have known the truth. Miss Castleton could not be convicted in a court of justice. Nor will she be convicted here this evening, in this little court of ours."

"Miss Castleton is not on trial," interposed Sara calmly. "I am the offender. She has already been tried and proved innocent."

Leslie, in his impatience, tapped sharply on the table with his seal ring.

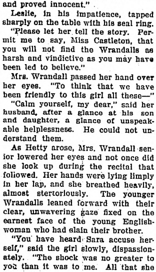
"Please let her tell the story. Permit me to say, Miss Castleton, that you will not find the Wrandalls as harsh and vindictive as you may have been led to believe."

Mrs. Wrandall passed her hand over her eyes. "To think that we have been friendly to this girl all these—"

"Calm yourself, my dear," said her husband, after a glance at his son and daughter, a glance of unspeakable helplessness. He could not understand them.

As Hetty arose, Mrs. Wrandall senior lowered her eyes and not once did she look up during the recital that followed. Her hands were lying limply in her lap, and she breathed heavily, almost stertoriously. The younger Wrandalls leaned forward with their clear, unwavering gaze fixed on the earnest face of the young Englishwoman who had slain their brother.

"You have heard Sara accuse herself," said the girl slowly, dispassionately. "The shock was no greater to you than it was to me. All that she has said is true, and yet I—I would so much rather she had left herself unarraigned. We were agreed that I should throw myself on your mercy. Mr. Carroll said that you were fair and just people, that you would not condemn me under the circumstances. But that Sara should seek to take the blame is—"



"And So You Are the One We Have Been Hunting for All These Months."

"Alas, my dear, I am to blame," said Sara, shaking her head. "But for me your story would have been told months ago, the courts would have cleared you, and all the world would have execrated my husband for the thing he did—my husband and your son, Mrs. Wrandall—whom we both loved. God believe me, I think I loved him more than all of you put together!"

She sat down abruptly and buried her face in her arms on the edge of the table.

"If I could only induce you to forgive her," began Hetty, throwing out her hands to the Wrandalls, only to be met by a gesture of repugnance from the grim old man.

"Your story, Miss Castleton," he said hoarsely.

"From the beginning, if you please," added the lawyer quietly. "Leave out nothing."

Clearly, steadily and with the utmost sincerity in her voice and manner, the girl began the story of her life. She passed hastily over the earlier periods, frankly exposing the unhappy conditions attending her home life, her subsequent activities as a performer on the London stage after Colonel Castleton's defection; the few months devoted to posing for Hawkright, the painter, and later on her engagement as governess in the wealthy Budlong family. She devoted some time and definiteness to her first encounter with Challis Wrandall on board the west-bound steamer, an incident that came to pass in a perfectly natural way. Her deck chair stood next to his, and he was not slow in making himself agreeable. It did not occur to her till long afterwards that he deliberately had traded positions with an elderly gentleman who occupied the chair on the first day out. Before the end of the voyage they were very good friends. . . .

"When we landed in New York, he assisted me in many ways. Afterwards, on learning that I was not to go to California, I called him up on the telephone to explain my predicament. He urged me to stay in New York; he guaranteed that there would be no difficulty in securing a splendid position in the east. I had no means of knowing that he was married. I accepted him for what I thought him to be: a genuine American gentleman. They are supposed to be particularly considerate with women. His conduct toward me was beyond reproach. I have never known a man who was so courteous, so gentle. To me, he was the most fascinating man in the world. No woman could have resisted him, I am sure of that."

She shot a quick, appealing glance at Booth's hard-set face. Her lip trembled for a second.

"I fell madly in love with him," she went on resolutely. "I dreamed of him, I could hardly wait for the time to come when I was to see him. He never came to the wretched little lodging house I have told you about. I—I met him outside. One night he told me that he loved me, loved me passionately. I—I said that I would be his wife. Somehow it seemed to me that he regarded me very curiously for a moment or two. He seemed to be surprised, uncertain. I remember that he laughed rather queerly. It did not occur to me to doubt him. One day he came for me, saying that he wanted me to see the little apartment he had taken, where we were to live after we were married. I went with him. He said that if I liked it, I could move in at once, but I would not consent to such an arrangement. For the first time I began to feel that everything was not as it should be. I—I remained in the apartment but a few minutes. The next day he came to me, greatly excited and more demonstrative than ever before, to say that he had arranged for a quiet, jolly little wedding up in the country. Strangely enough, I experienced a queer feeling that all was not as it should be, but his eagerness, his persistence dispelled the small doubt that had begun even then to shape itself. I consented to go with him on the next night to an inn out in the country, where a college friend who was a minister of the gospel would meet us, driving over from his parish a few miles away. I said that I preferred to be married in a church. He laughed and said it could be arranged when we got to the inn and had talked it over with the minister. Still uneasy, I asked why it was necessary to employ secrecy. He told me that his family were in Europe and that he wanted to surprise them by giving them a daughter who was actually related to an English nobleman. The family had been urging him to marry a stupid but rich New York girl and he—oh, well he uttered a great deal of nonsense about my beauty, my charm, and all that sort of thing—"

She paused for a moment. No one spoke. Her audience of judges, with the exception of the elder Mrs. Wrandall, watched her as if fascinated. Their faces were almost expressionless. With a perceptible effort, she resumed her story, narrating events that carried it up to the hour when she walked into the little upstairs room at Burton's inn with the man who was to be her husband.

I Want Some
U.S. CARTRIDGES

Rifle ammunition must act uniformly. If one cartridge goes off quicker than another the velocity will vary and accurate shooting becomes a thing of chance and luck.

The primer is what insures uniformity of explosion. Primers made of fulminate of mercury and ground glass are uncertain because in the mixing of heavy mercury and light glass the force of gravitation is always operating against a perfect mixture.

The U.S. Primer is a strictly chemical combination—not a physical mixture, and it fires with the precision and uniformity of a watch's tick.

The superior uniformity of the non-mercuric primer has led the Government to make only cartridges with this type of primer.

Another thing—mercury eats brass—renders it brittle and unstable. The U.S. primer has no action on brass—does not affect it and is not affected by it. It does not foul a gun barrel.

All these primer advantages give greater accuracy of bullet flight. Practically every important test in recent years open to American ammunition has been won by the U.S. Cartridges.

When you begin to use U.S. Ammunition you may expect a quick improvement in your marksmanship.

STOLE TO GET NEW START

Bank Cashier Experiences Overpowering Impulse to Get Some Place and Start Life Anew.

A bank teller in a middle western state grew weary of the narrow, circumscribed life in the town where he lived; he wanted wider interests, a new start in a new place, but a start with capital so he could push himself ahead. He took $35,000 of the bank's funds, jumped into his automobile and started for Mexico (this was before the present revolution across the Rio Grande had reached such serious proportions) across Kansas, Oklahoma and Texas. He expected to make a clean getaway by using a motor car instead of taking a train, forgetting that an auto can be traced. The surety company at once put an inspector on his trail, and the man was captured in Texas when he was almost at Laredo, ready to cross the border.

Of the sum he stole, $25,000 was recovered in the actual wrappers in which he had taken it from the bank. The automobile was recovered and sold, and the proceeds used to make up for part of the money he had spent. This cashier is now serving a long sentence in prison merely because he experienced an overpowering impulse to go some place and start life anew.

Baby Has Nine Grandparents.

Mrs. Sarah Elizabeth Goble, eighty-eight years old, of this town, became a great-great-grandmother today when a son was born to Mr. and Mrs. Jacob Lichtenstein of Bloomfield at the Mountainside hospital, where, it was said, both mother and child are doing well. The grandparents of the child, which will be named Edward H. Lichtenstein, are Mr. and Mrs. Edward H. Ackerman of Montclair and the great-grandparents Mr. and Mrs. Isaac A. Dodd, also of this town.

Before her marriage, in April, 1913, the mother of the babe was Miss Harriett Greevy Ackerman. The child born today has living two grandfathers and two grandmothers, two great-grandfathers and two great-grandmothers and the great-great-grandmother, eleven granduncles, eight grandaunts and three great-grandaunts. All of the family live in Montclair and adjacent towns.—Montclair (N. J.) Correspondent New York Sun.

GOOD CHANGE.
Coffee to Postum.

The large army of persons who have found relief from many chronic ailments by changing from coffee to Postum as a daily beverage, is growing each day.

It is only a simple question of trying it for oneself in order to know the joy of returning health as realized by an Ills. young lady. She writes:

"I had been a coffee drinker nearly all my life and it affected my stomach—caused insomnia and I was seldom without a headache. I had heard about Postum and how beneficial it was, so concluded to quit coffee and try it.

"I was delighted with the change. I can now sleep well and seldom ever have headache. My stomach has gotten strong and I can eat without suffering afterwards. I think my whole system greatly benefited by Postum.

"My brother also suffered from stomach trouble while he drank coffee, but now, since using Postum, he feels so much better he would not go back to coffee for anything."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Postum comes in two forms:

Regular Postum—must be well boiled—15c and 25c packages.

Instant Postum—is a soluble powder. A teaspoonful dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly—30c and 50c tins.

The cost per cup of both kinds is about the same.

A FAITHFUL FRIEND

By MILDRED CAROLINE GOODRIDGE.

A woman shrieked and fainted away, a gathering of street loiterers parted summarily, expressions of excitement, wonder and then horror beat out upon the ambient afternoon air at Purdy Corners.

Tragically and without warning there had sped around the corner of the public square a panting, bristling, wild-eyed collie dog. Its fleetness was that of a greyhound, its progress that of a loyal, intelligent dumb animal bent upon some mission of vital urgency.

"Old Judge Warren's dog!" shouted a dozen voices in unison.

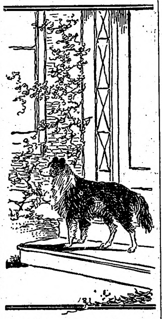
"What's he up to—gone mad?"

"No, he's been hurt—look at the blood on him!"

The last speaker was the village smith. To him both dog and owner had been known for years. With him Don had been always friend and favorite. The animal swung its bloodshot gaze towards him. There was pathos and pleading in the glance, a low whimpering howl, but Don kept straight on until he reached the stone steps leading up into the little county courthouse.

It was there, ever since he had done with judgeships and active business cares, that Judge Warren had come daily to keep in the routine of old acquaintanceship. That morning he had been missed. And now his usual companion had appeared in a manner that indicated the mysterious, the terrifying, the tragic.

For only a moment Don faltered at the steps. Then he sprang up them. The crowd followed. There was a sudden hush over all the scene. It was as if some dread werewolf of ancient times had invaded the peaceful hamlet, bringing in its trail a sanguinary token of impending disaster.



Would Linger All Day and Night Near the Closed Doorway of the House.

And then an awesome thing happened, The dog proceeded straight to the courtroom. The court was not in session, but the presiding judge sat in his accustomed place listening to some informal discussion of half a dozen lawyers. At the edge of the dais Don paused. As if appealing to justice, the reeking animal lifted its head. It uttered one shrill, curdling, mournful howl. It was the cry for vengeance, for justice, blood for blood! The animal turned swiftly, but first swept the faces of those near to it and gave a plaintive whine as though beseeching them to follow.

The truth was known in an hour. Grim faced and stern the village smith came to the office of Walter Burdett.

"You were the attorney for Judge Warren," he said.

"Were?" repeated Walter, startled. "Then—"

"We found him murdered in cold blood, the safe in his library ransacked. The dog must have put up a terrible fight, for he lies at his dead master's feet, all but bleeding to death."

Instantly the young attorney set the wheels of justice in motion. For 24 hours the entire country was scoured. No clew to the murderer or the missing plunder was discovered.

Then came a reluctant mournful mission for Burdett. Judge Warren had but one living relative in the world—Eva, his adopted niece. She was at a boarding school 200 miles away. Some one must advise her of the death of her only friend in the world. Burdett departed on his sad errand.

He was amazed when the first outburst of grief was over with the young girl to observe that into her fair face there had come a set sternness, as though the murder of her uncle had changed all the currents of her being. After the funeral it was thought best that she should remain at school until the estate was settled up. As she placed her hand in that of the young lawyer to say good-by, she retained the clasp with the words:

"You have been a true friend through all my trouble. I ask only one thing more—not vengeance, but justice. The cruel murderer of this good old man must be found—and punished."

And, as if registering a solemn promise, Walter Burdett looked into her eyes, and she knew he would not falter in his chosen mission.

No efforts were spared to run down the assassin, but not the slightest clue as to his identity or whereabouts was discovered. There was a description of a stranger seen about the town the day of the murder, but it was vague and led to no results of value.

Very often Walter visited the now deserted home of the dead jurist. It became necessary. Don, recovering from his fearful wounds, refused to leave the grounds. He would linger all day and night near the closed doorway of the house, looking up and down the road constantly as if expecting some one he was looking for to pass by.

Walter finally dragged the dog house to the spot, chained up Don and morning and night brought him his meals.

There came a climax. One moonlight evening Walter had just attended to the wants of the poor, faithful animal when an automobile sped by. Don had made a sudden leap, with a sharp, wild cry. He tugged at his chain, he glared after the disappearing machine. Plainly in the clear moonlight Walter saw that it held but one person, a man, apparently a stranger in the district.

Don leaped into the air. He bit his chain, he was fairly frantic. A speedy thought impressed Walter as, following the automobile with his eye, he saw it turn into a wooded stretch away from the traversed roadway.

Had the dog's instinct guided him to recognize in the automobile the slayer of his master? The impression led Walter to trace down the machine. It had halted in a dense grove, one edge of which was bounded by a deep ravine. There the stranger was reaching into the trunk of a hollow tree. He drew out a small iron box. Walter recognized it as the missing possession of his dead client.

"You are the man!" he shouted, springing upon the murderer.

"And you know too much!" growled out the other. They clinched. Walter fell underneath. The man had drawn a knife. Kneeling upon the breast of his adversary, he raised it menacingly.

At that moment there was a metallic jangling, then a weird shrill scream Don, broken free from his captivity, had sprang upon the shoulders of the man. Over and over they rolled. With a gasp Walter saw them disappear over the edge of the ravine.

There—the man dead, his victim's cruel fate avenged, Don stark and stiff, but his teeth sunk deep in the man's throat—both were found by neighbors summoned by Walter.

The shadow of the tragedy never entirely was dissipated in the life of Eva Warren, but in the sunshine of the love of Walter Burdett she forgot most of its bitterness.

ARE HARD TO REASON WITH

Patrons of Stores Advertising to Refund Money on Request Sometimes Make Queer Claims.

The clerks stationed at the exchange bureaus of the large stores tell of many curious incidents that take place in their work daily, as note the following incident:

A lady in a great hurry one day rushed up to the exchange desk of a well-known store and said: "Exchange this muff for me, please."

The clerk opened the package and asked in a polite manner: "Where is your purchase slip, madame?"

"Oh,' said the lady, "I lost that, but I bought the muff here, and I want my money back."

"But," continued the clerk, "we cannot refund money on this article unless you have the sales slip so we can see the date of purchase."

"Oh," said the caller in explanation, "I bought it at the beginning of winter, and," she continued, "I used the muff while it was cold, but now I have no further use for it, and wish my money back. You advertise to refund money on request, so I request the money be given me in exchange for my muff. You see, it is in very good order, and you can sell it again next winter."

It took the next quarter of an hour on the part of the manager and the exchange clerk to convince the irate caller this was not in reason, and as she departed she declared never again would she patronize the store that advertised "Money refunded on request."

"You see," said the exchange clerk after relating this incident, "what we have to deal with.

"Why, only the other day a lady brought in a package wrapped in tissue paper, laid it gingerly on my desk and asked me to refund her money on the contents. I opened the package and was surprised to find therein the dead carcass of a canary bird."

The Program.

"You didn't attend to any of those matters I mentioned when you left the house!" said Mrs. Crosslots.

"I'll do better next time. 'Forgive and forget,' you know."

"Yes. You'll do the forgeting and I'll do the forgiving."

This Funny World.

HOPE FOR THE BALD HEAD

Sewing Hairs on Scalps Is Proving Successful—Fine Gold Wires Are Used.

A method of sewing hairs in the human scalp in cases of parital or total baldness has been successfully used in several instances by Doctor Szekely, at the hospital of Saint Stephane at Budapest, and a report appears in the London Times.

The number of hairs "planted" in the head of a patient has been as many as 50,000. One hundred hairs are drawn through punctures in the scalp at every square centimeter, and as both ends are left free, the number is thus 200, or over one thousand to each square inch. Very fine gold wires are used, one five-hundredth of an inch in diameter, and fine long hairs from a woman's head are attached to the middle of these. The gold loop or knot acts as an "anchor," and after sterilization is introduced into the subcutaneous tissue, where it is slightly twisted, and holds the hair permanently in position. It is stated that 500 hairs can thus be introduced into the scalp within three-quarters of an hour.

Doctor Szekely has designed a special instrument for introducing and fixing the gold wires. The latter are so light and so fine that the total amount of gold in the scalp after "planting" 50,000 hairs is only one gramme. The hair is stated to appear perfectly natural, and a sapcule of tissue appears to form around each gold wire knot. The inflammation resulting from the treatment entirely disappears in form ten to twelve days, and in no case so far has any intense inflammation or suppuration resulted. The hair can be washed, brushed and treated with oil in the ordinary way, and one of the earliest patients so treated, a lady, has retained her hair intact with the original luster and flexibility, for over seven years.

Robbed to Play Poker.

In one of the southern states a man whose habits were bad, robbed an express company of several thousand dollars. Instead of decamping he remained in the city. He confessed to the theft and said he had lost the money playing poker. The surety company sent a man to prosecute the thief. He found the defaulter had been receiving a good salary from the express company and that there was no reason for his taking the money. Further investigation revealed the fact that the county attorney had sat in the poker game and won most of the money; the other players were friends of the county attorney. The surety company dropped the case at once and paid the express company the amount of the loss.

Puts "Pep" in Actors.

A high-tension dressing room is being installed at the Palace theater for the electrification of performers before they go upon the stage. The room will contain a powerful Tesla coil and the walls will be wound with heavy insulated copper wire carrying high currents. Tired artists will enter this chamber and emerge, filled with electricity and enthusiasm. It is expected that a short visit to the "pep house," as the artists have already termed it, will send any actor upon the stage keyed up to blowing-off-steam pressure.—New York American.

THOUGHT SHE COULD NOT LIVE

Restored to Health by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

Unionville, Mo.—"I suffered from a female trouble and I got so weak that I could hardly walk across the floor without holding on to something. I had nervous spells and my fingers would cramp and my face would draw, and I could not speak, nor sleep to do any good, had no appetite, and everyone thought I would not live. Some one advised me to take Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. I had taken so much medicine and my doctor said he could do me no good so I told my husband he might get me a bottle and I would try it. By the time I had taken it I felt better. I continued its use, and now I am well and strong.

"I have always recommended your medicine ever since I was so wonderfully benefitted by it and I hope this letter will be the means of saving some other poor woman from suffering."—Mrs. MARTHA SEAVEY, Box 1144, Unionville, Missouri.

Human Documents of Married Life

By Virginia T. Van de Water

Intimate and Human, Intensely Alive, Each Story Presenting a Problem Which Might Occur to Any One of Us at Any Time

WHY I LEFT MY HUSBAND

NOT long ago a woman was talking to me of an acquaintance of mine whose husband was miserly, ill tempered, ill bred, yet whose wife was uniformly patient with him.

"She can stand it all," remarked my friend, "because her husband has always been faithful to her. He has never talked love to, or looked love at, another woman."

The remark set me to thinking. Are there women who can forgive all that a man may do so long as he remains faithful to the letter of his marriage vows? Is the sin of infidelity the only one that the average woman cannot condone? Perhaps that is true, but, if so, I am not like other women. For my husband was faithful to me, as the world counts fidelity. He certainly never made love to any other woman, nor did he care particularly for the society of the opposite sex.

One of the wearing things about a sorrow or a mistake is that one goes over it in her mind, again and again, always with the same wondering thought, "Suppose I had done this or that, might not the result have been different?" Who that has suffered does not know the torture of such futile conjecture? So I, in reviewing my marriage, find myself wondering if, as a girl, I had been trained differently, I might not have been a more judicious wife and made a better husband of the man I married.

But my parents were affectionate, old-fashioned people whose one law of life was that of love. "Bear and forbear," I was told, was the rule for a happy marriage. To efface one's self, if need be, for the sake of the dear one was right. The plan worked well with my parents and in their home. We were a singularly happy and devoted family.

So when I married the man I loved I determined to smooth his pathway through life, and to sacrifice my own wishes when they conflicted with his. This gave him happiness for a few years, and made him selfish. I had not learned that a wife is, to a certain extent, responsible for the character of the man she marries as well as for the characters of the children she bears. The old adage, "Marriage makes or mars a man," is sadly true, and the pitiful part of it is that in trying to make a man comfortable a wife often mars him.

For the first five years of our wedded life we were tolerably happy. My husband's income was sufficient for our wants. We lived in a pretty cottage in a suburban town, and my babies and home kept me confined so closely that I had no time for outside interests or ambitions. My father had given me a musical education, and before my marriage I was known as a rather remarkable pianist.

As a wife and mother I kept up my practicing. That I did this in spite of motherhood cares and housekeeping responsibilities was, perhaps, evidence that I was one of the musicians who really love their art.

Money matters cause more marital unhappiness than all the conjugal infidelities which are supposed to fill the divorce courts. At first the one point of painful feeling between my husband and myself was the financial situation.

I do not mean that my husband was stingy. During the early years of our wedded life he was willing to have me order such clothes as I needed and send the bills to him. He was safe in doing this, for I was not extravagant. Alfred paid the wages of our one servant, settled the housekeeping accounts, wrote out a check for the tailor who made me one handsome street costume each year, but he did not give me money. When we had been married some months I spoke of this to him. He laughed lightly.

"Why, dear girl," he said, "don't I give you all that you want? You know I am willing to get you any little things that you ask for. I can't see what use you have for money beyond car fare and postage stamps."

I flushed uncomfortably. I could not explain to him that I disliked having to ask my husband for every cent I spent. But I tried to explain.

"Well, it is embarrassing not to have a penny. Suppose I want to take a ride on the street car, or suppose a friend asks me to go walking and proposes that we take a cab home—it is uncomfortable not to have a cent in one's pocket."

"Ah-h," he said slowly, "you want your friends to think that you have money of your own? I understand. Hereafter I will hand you a couple of dollars when you want it for car fare and similar trifles. As I have an account at the stable, have the cab charged to me if you need one. Let me know when you require money for stamps and cars—and take this now!"

He laid a two dollar bill on the table and went off to the station to catch the train that would carry him to his office in town.

This was the first time that I had ever been out of temper with my husband.

At another time my husband was planning to be away for several days, and I told him, stammeringly, that I had no money in the house "if anything should happen." He gave his smile of amused and slightly wearied patience, and drew forth a roll of greenbacks. Drawing out three one-dollar bills, he gave them to me with the remark:

"Here, take these to use as you please in case 'anything should happen,' as you say. Remember I gave them to you, however."

His speech left me with an uncomfortable feeling when he told me good-by and went to town. As he was not to be back for three days, he had suggested that I ask an old schoolmate of mine to make me a little visit during his absence. She arrived that noon. In the afternoon she and I went for a stroll down the one business street of our little town. Our only drug store was an agency for a popular candy firm. My friend called my attention to this fact, adding:

"Let's get some caramels—I'm candy-hungry!"

She tried to pay for the pound of sweetmeats, but as she was my guest my ideas of hospitality interfered with my allowing her to do so. I laid one of the dollar bills my husband had given me on the cashier's desk. What would Alfred think? I wondered with a little thrill of apprehension.

I was soon to know. When I reached home I found a telegram from Alfred saying he had received a letter at his office which made his trip unnecessary, and that he would be home to dinner.

We were in our own room that night before he spoke of the money.

"By the way," he said suddenly, "I will need some change tomorrow morning, and have only large bills with me. Let me have those three ones I gave you this morning, will you? I will give them back to you before I go on my next trip," he added teasingly.

And then I had to admit that I had used sixty cents. He asked for what I had needed it, and I felt like a naughty child when I murmured guiltily, "Caramels."

The humor of the situation did not strike me then. Even now I cannot smile at it, for I remember his contemptuous laugh.

"You said you wanted to have money on hand 'if anything happened,'" he remarked. "And candy was what happened. I fancy that is the silly kind of thing that would often occur if you had the handling of the family purse."

When the elder of our two boys was five years of age, the firm employing my husband failed. He had little trouble in getting another position, for he had engaging manners and personal magnetism, and was popular with his business acquaintances. But the new position made our moving into the city a necessity.

My husband did not like the idea of an apartment, so we decided to take a house, although our income really did not warrant it. I opened my eyes in horror as I heard what the rent would be, but Alfred, always sanguine when prompted by desire, assured me that I had no need to worry, as that was his business, not mine. "If I can stand it I guess you can," he said shortly, and I was silenced.

But I soon learned that he could not meet all the expenses incidental to a city residence. He became morose, unhappy, and, at last, when I begged him to confide in me, he burst forth with:

"Our family costs too much! Somehow other men can get on with a salary like mine. But we can't! I suppose you feel now that you're in town you must make a splurge, for your bills are half as much again as they used to be.

"You have ordered new carpets, new hangings, and new curtains, while in the country you were satisfied with those you had."

I saw he was in one of his unreasonable moods, but I tried to explain. "My dear Alfred," I pleaded, "I told you that it would cost a great deal to furnish a city house, and I wanted to make the things we had out in the country go as far as they would, but you insisted that I get the carpets, rugs, and hangings of which you speak. Yet I did not get as handsome articles as you suggested."

"Oh, that's it!" he exclaimed. "Say, 'I told you so!' but the fact remains that I advised you to get what was necessary, and, of course, to buy good things, thinking that you would have sense and judgment enough to go slowly and easily. The result is but another proof that you have no idea of the value of money. It serves me right for thinking that you had!"

Yet, the next week, he proposed that we engage a second maid. I showed him how much this would increase our expenses, but he said he knew where the money was coming from, and insisted that I hire a girl who should be waitress and chambermaid. The maid-of-all-work thus became cook and laundress.

Oh, that first winter in town! How hard it was! Burdened with the sense of loneliness in a great city, with the knowledge that we were living right up to our income and not saving a cent, that my boys missed the country air and the freedom to run out of doors and play as they used to on our quiet suburban streets, I would lie awake far into the small hours, listening to the wind moan about the house, and longing for the little cottage thirty miles away.

True to my theory of unselfishness, I told my husband nothing of all this, but I tried to make him love his new home. When bills were large he would regret that I "could not be content in the country," forgetting that I wanted to remain there, and that he had insisted on our coming away. But, little by little, the city life attracted him, and at last he joined a fashionable club, after which he complained less of the "barren town life." He told me little of his business affairs until one day when he came to me and asked me if I would go to a notary public with him, as he wanted to have me sign my name with his so that he could get some ready money.

"But I don't understand," I said, "what my signature has to do with it!"

Then, in a sudden impulse of confidence, he told me that he had not the money for the rent, and wanted to borrow something on his life insurance, and, as he was insured for my benefit, my signature was necessary.

It was at this juncture I determined I must do something to increase the family income, so, without mentioning my plan to my husband, I went to a professor of music with whom I had been acquainted for years and asked him if he would tell me how to get a few pupils. He knew of my musical ability and recommended me to several wealthy persons who had children to be taught, and who were able to pay the prices which he told me to ask. When, after some months, I had made two hundred dollars by this work, I confessed my secret to my husband, just when he was again in financial difficulty. I had hoped the fact that I could hand him some money would lift a load from his mind. To my astonishment, he became furiously angry.

"To think that you, my wife, should demean me by earning money!" he exclaimed. "It is a part and parcel of the whole thing nowadays! You are not satisfied to live simply, to economize and help your husband as the dear, old-fashioned women used to, but you must get out into the world and hustle, just as men do!"

There was much more said. I apologized and told him I only meant to help him. At first he would not forgive me. Then, suddenly, his whim changed, as unexpectedly and quickly as a weather-vane will veer about in a southerly gale.

"Poor girl!" he said, putting his arm about me. "What else could I expect?—I, a man who cannot supply his wife with the luxuries most women have! What a failure I am! No wonder that, seeing other women with handsomer homes and more pleasures than you have, you should use your talent to get these things!"

I hastened to reiterate my statement that my desire was to be of assistance to him, and, to prove it, I pressed upon him the money I had earned. He protested at first, then took it to please me and "just as a loan." He never offered to return it, and I never asked for it.

And here I acknowledge that I made the greatest of blunders. This is one of the things over which I ponder and say, "If I had acted otherwise." But such speculation is useless. I appreciate that what I then called my unselfish duty was a sinful error. I should have allowed Alfred to be independent of me, since he claimed to be. I might have been happier.

For by this time I appreciated that I was not happy. I had my children, my two bonny boys, and it was for their sakes that I had tried to make myself believe that their father was all that I wished him to be. Yet his attitude toward them was one of the things that widened the breach between us. He loved his boys in a certain way, especially when I paid little attention to them. But he was jealous of my devotion to them, and, when angry, was very severe with them. I have a theory that parents should seem to agree in the management of their children, so when Alfred was unjust to the boys I said nothing at the time, but afterward my sense of justice would lead me to explain the circumstances. Such explanations irritated my husband. I remember one afternoon when he came home and found lying on the table in his room his favorite meerschaum with the mouth-piece broken. David, our elder son, then a lad of ten, chanced to be passing the door. His father called to him. I knew from his voice that he was angry, and I hastened to the scene. He had the child by the arm and was asking:

"Who laid that pipe there?"

"I did, father," replied the boy. "I picked it up from the floor where—"

He got no further, for his father struck him across the face. "Of course you picked it up from the floor after dropping it there!"

"But, father, I did not drop—"

"No lies, sir! See here," turning to me, "what this puppy has done! Little cur! Little liar!"

I interposed gently, "My dear, perhaps he did not break the pipe. Did you, son?" I asked of the frightened boy.

"No, mother, I only picked it up when I saw it lying on the floor."

His father gave a derisive laugh. "And I suppose it fell down of itself from the pipe-rack and broke itself," he sneered.

"But, father—"

"Go to your room!" ordered my husband, and, as the lad turned to obey, he caught hold of his arm and shook him roughly.

I kept silence until the door of the boy's room shut behind him, then I said: "Alfred, you are behaving foolishly. How do you know David broke the pipe?"

But he was past reasoning with, and answered me with a flow of sarcasm that was so pitifully weak and silly that, as I listened to him, to his railings and childish fury, I found all respect for him dying within me.

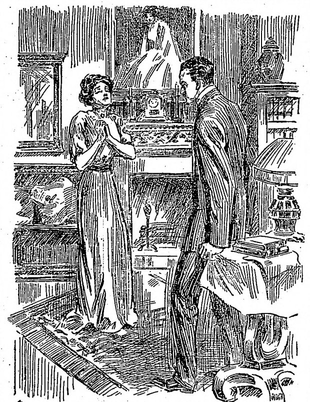
When he paused for breath I went to my own room. Later I descended to the kitchen and interviewed the maids, asking them if they knew who had touched my husband's pipes that day. The chamber-maid remembered that she had knocked one out of the rack when dusting.

"Do not forget to tell the boys' father of it," I said, "for he thinks one of them did it."

I was in the dining-room when the maid made her confession. She was sorry, she said, but it was an accident. My husband remarked that he was sorry, too, as the pipe was a valuable one, but that he knew "accidents would happen." He never apologized to his son, nor referred again to the matter.

Yet what could I do or say when my boys would come to me after such a scene and express their indignation? It taxed all my ingenuity to seem to explain their father's attitude. I pleaded that he had business troubles, that he was not well, that he was nervous, that he loved them truly, and that they must not mind his little irritable ways. I knew that I was not honest with them. But he was their father, with whom they must live, with whom I must live.

When the younger boy was fifteen, my mother died. To me, her only child, she left enough money to buy the house in which we dwelt, and to lay aside something toward my boys' education. I did not tell my husband what the small amount was, only that it was not much. I was sure that if he knew the real sum he would some day come to me with a complaint of the cost of living, and that I would weakly help him out by letting him use my money. In justice to my boys I had no right to do this.



"TO THINK THAT YOU, MY WIFE, SHOULD DEMEAN ME BY EARNING MONEY!"

When my mother died, my father came to live with us. That was my mother's wish, and my husband agreed willingly to this plan, for I was in great sorrow. At such times he was always considerate.

I had thought the situation trying before my father came to live with us. After that it was well-nigh intolerable.

My father's health was not strong, and I had to watch his diet carefully, and see that he did not overexert himself. There never was a more sweet-natured man than he, nor a more loving parent. He must have seen the difficulties in my path, for he tried, in little unobtrusive ways, to make things easy for me. All these small acts of thoughtfulness Alfred would resent, for he was jealous of my love for anyone but himself. I remember his anger when father made me a present of an easy chair, upholstered in a color which my husband did not like. When he came home that night I called him into the library to see father's gift to me. Fortunately the donor had gone up-stairs to get ready for dinner and did not witness my husband's dark looks as he surveyed the piece of furniture.

"So you like that, do you?" he sneered. "Well, I suppose, as the immortal Abe said, 'if people like that kind of thing that is the kind of thing they like.'"

"But, Alfred," I faltered, "it is very handsome."

"Perhaps you think so. For my part I think it is hideous, and an unnecessary addition to the house."

"But father meant to please us," I reminded him.

"To please you, perhaps," he replied. "I beg you to remember that any addition to this house is not a present to me, nor is it made for my benefit. The house is yours, you know—yours, by the right of purchase with your mother's money, and I have no claims here. You are careful to remind me of that by buying things without consulting me, and your father aids and abets you in it by sending home furniture which I do not like, and which I shall never use."

During all these years Alfred's income increased steadily, but we had no more money to spare than when he drew a smaller salary. Our expenses kept pace cruelly with our resources.

One of the hardest things I had to bear during the last winter of my father's life was my husband's resentment of my care of him. The disease that was killing the elderly man made him weaker each month, but to the last he kept up and about and dreaded to give trouble. He insisted upon paying higher board to me, as he said that he knew the delicacies he must have to suit his weak digestion were an added expense. He had a nurse come in and attend to him each night and morning to relieve me of care. Yet my husband would fly into a temper whenever I spent ten minutes with the sick man while he was at home. One evening my husband and I were going to dinner at the house of Alfred's employer. I dressed rather early, as did Alfred, and, being entirely ready, I went into my father's room to tell him good night. As I came out of his door my husband stood at the head of the stairs awaiting me. He asked me, stiffly, to come down to the library. I went with him, silently, for I knew there was a storm brewing. Closing the door behind me, he said:

"May I inquire if you intend to make a slave of yourself to your father's whims for the next ten years? He may live as long as that, you know."

"He cannot live very long, Alfred," I said. "I hardly think you appreciate how serious his condition is."

"Well, you appreciate it enough for two," he said, with the curl of the lip that always exasperated me. "Where do I come in in this deal?"

The scales fell from my eyes, and I saw how, through years of folly, I had fostered this man's selfishness.

I had time to wash my face in cold water to steady my nerves a little before the cab in which we were to go to dinner was announced. During the drive to our destination not a word was said by either my husband or myself.

Yet I was hardly prepared for the toast which my husband offered when, toward the close of the dinner, our host laughingly challenged each man to drink to that which he loved best. Alfred sprang to his feet, holding his glass of champagne high above his head. The candles lighted up his handsome, beaming face, his fine eyes, the gleam of his teeth as his brilliant smile flashed forth.

"Gentlemen!" he exclaimed, "stand up, every one of you! For I drink to the dearest thing in life or death to me—my peerless, beautiful wife!"

When the toast had been drunk amid loud applause, my hostess leaned toward me, tears in her honest eyes.

'Oh, my dear!" she said, "it is worth while to have lived to win such a love as that!"

Three months after the scene I have described, my father died. I could not weep as I stood by his open grave, but Alfred, burying his face in his hands, shook with sobs. The officiating clergyman told me afterward that my husband "felt as if he had lost an own father."

Six months later my elder son married the girl of his choice. He had accepted a position in Colorado, and, after the wedding, the young couple went west to their new home.

The house was sadly quiet during the long winter after my son's departure. His brother was now through college and doing night work on a newspaper. He had but one evening off a week, and insisted on devoting that to me, although I begged him to make calls or seek young society. But he had always been a "mother's boy" and was, he said, happier with me. My husband spent most of his evenings at his club, coming in late. He had bought himself a handsome saddle horse, and after office hours would take long rides with his friends. Sometimes he would dine with these friends before returning home. I always ordered dinner for the usual hour, on the chance of his coming in, but half of the time I sat down to the table alone. The loneliness and strain began to tell on me. I was thin and nervous and so far from well that my son insisted I must have some recreation. His "evening off" was Saturday, and, one week, as a surprise to me, he got theater tickets for that evening and appeared at the door of my room about five o'clock in the afternoon to tell me to dress to go out to dinner with him and to the play afterward. He kissed me as I exclaimed with pleasure.

"It is so long since I have had any little fun like this!" I said.

"Well, you shall have it any time I can give it to you, mother mine. I wish I could be with you all the time."

Then I remembered my husband. "But suppose your father comes home to dinner?" I said hesitatingly.

"I can't help it if he does, mother. I have kept count, and out of seven evenings he has been at home to dinner just three times, and you have, for the other four nights, dined alone, and spent the entire evening by yourself. This kind of thing has got to stop. If he does not consider your convenience, you need not consider his."

I laid my hand on his lips. "Don't talk like that, dear!" I begged. "Your father has always done as he pleased, and I have encouraged him in it. He is master in his house and has a right to go and come as he chooses. I do not want to be selfish."

"And I want you to be just this once. I do not believe that father will come home, anyway. And if he does, he should be glad that you are out having a good time."

"I will leave a little note of explanation for him," I said.

We had a lovely time, Donald and I. It made me feel almost young again to sit opposite the good-looking boy at dinner, to hear the music of the orchestra, and to have to make no effort to please anybody. My boy always understood me, and if I talked he was pleased; if I was silent, he did not mind. The play was "Peter Pan," and I was as much charmed by it as were the children in the audience. We chatted happily of the events of the evening all the way home. As we reached the front door I saw a light in the library windows and knew that my husband was waiting up for me. A glance at his face showed me that he was angry. I tried to ignore his manner and to tell him cheerfully what a pleasant time we had had.

"Who paid for this nonsense?" he asked sharply.

"It was Donald's treat," I said, before my son could reply. And I tried to smile.

"A fool and his money are soon parted!" remarked my husband. "It's a pity, sir, that instead of throwing away your cash you don't try to lift some of the load from the shoulders of the father to whom you have been an expense all these years."

I tried to check my son's reply, but he was no longer a child, but a man, and answered hotly:

"I was not aware, father, that you were burdened by my support. I have watched this menage for many years, and, so far, I cannot see that Dave and I have been an expense to anyone except mother."

"And who do you suppose supports her?" roared my husband furiously.

"I will if she will let me!" was the unexpected rejoinder.

But why recall all the painful scene that followed? Until my husband and my son faced each other in anger that night I had never known actual terror. I feared that Alfred would strike Donald, and, knowing how ungovernable my husband's rage was, I trembled for the result if he did. The climax was reached when the father ordered the son to "leave the house tomorrow morning and never set foot in it again."

In the silence of my room in the early morning hours I determined to leave my husband. I would sell my house and take an apartment where Donald and I could have a quiet little home together. By the terms of my father's will I had enough to live on economically for the rest of my days. I would be a burden to nobody. I knew that my husband's income was sufficient to support him in luxury. He did not need me; my son did. I no longer loved my husband. I could not stand life with him another day.

Alfred and I had been married for twenty-seven years. When I left him my uncle asked me if, after enduring the condition of affairs for over a quarter of a century, I could not have borne it to the end of my life. I asked him whether, if a life sentence had been pronounced upon him, he would have refused, after twenty-seven years, to have the sentence commuted.

TALES OF GOTHAM AND OTHER CITIES

Many Peaceful Families Live in Apartment House

NEW YORK.—Impossible though it may seem, Brooklyn has an apartment-house in which 22 families dwell in terms of great intimacy and perfect accord. Either virtue would make an apartment-house remarkable, but the combination makes this one unique. And to make the house still more distinctive, it has a janitor by whom and not at whom both the tenants and landlord swear.

The tenants of the house believe the millennium has arrived, and well they may. They get along so well together that they have formed an organization known as the St. Mark's Amity association, the object of which is to increase the good fellowship among the tenants of the house by holding periodical celebrations. The house which possesses all these virtues is at 1484 St. Mark's avenue. It was built two years ago, and so strong is the spirit of fraternity among the tenants that every one of the original 22 families to engage apartments in the house is still living there. The only changes in the personnel of the tenants have been caused by births or deaths, the head of the amity association boasted.

Of course, one of the essentials in the perfect carrying out of a scheme of this sort is the janitor. He really is the keynote on which the strength of the whole structure depends. No. 1484 St. Mark's avenue was fortunate enough to secure a gem of a janitor—a gem in the rough, but a gem nevertheless. The name of the gem is Nathan Diamond.

Modern Thief Runs Away With Box Car of Gloves

CHICAGO.—All hail, ye Knights of the Road and ye members of the Society of the Dark Lantern and the Jimmy, to "Tip" O'Neil, Grand High Mogul of the Brotherhood of Modern Thieves. For some one stole a box car and switch engine and "got away with it," and there is much mystery, and much denying. The police are seeking "Tip."

A few weeks ago a New York importing house received an order from a Chicago department store for silks and satins, and four cases of silk gloves, valued at $10,000.

A special watchman was to accompany the goods in transit, and stay with the car until delivered.

Ten days ago the consignment, guard and all, started for Chicago. In due time they were shunted into a spur in the Northwestern railroad yards, preparatory to being unloaded and recatalogued by the surety company which gave bond to the importers to guarantee the safe delivery of the goods.

Until then the guard had proved faithful and never shut an eye on his thousands of pairs of gloves and hundreds of yards of beautiful silk.

But the heat of a scorching day drove him to the outer air. Half an hour liberally covers the time he, the guard says, was away from the car.

When he returned he was just in time to see the car, attached to a switch engine, scurrying down the yards. Vainly he called and yelled. The engine would not stop. When the uproar finally brought out the railroad police the car and engine were lost to view.

Later the car and switch engine were found near Thirty-third street. The gloves were gone.

Curious Customs Are Learned by a New Arrival

CLEVELAND, OHIO.—While fresh from the province of Galatia and able to speak only a few words of English, a twenty-four-year-old man told Police Prosecutor Samuel H. Silbert he had been inveigled into a marriage by a woman of thirty-eight a short time after his arrival in Cleveland a year ago.

IT'S TH' CUSTOM HERE TO MARRY A GIRL WHEN YOU ONCE WALK WITH HER
HUH

"She met me on the street the day I arrived in Cleveland," the man told the prosecutor. "She induced me to walk with her to her home.

"The next day very early she came to my home. She told me of a peculiar custom regarding marriage in this country.

"'When a single man walks with a woman to her home in America he is forced by custom to marry her,' she told me. I thought this was funny. But she took me to the place where we got a marriage license, and we were married in a short time."

The man appealed to Prosecutor Silbert for protection from his wife. His wedded life, he said, had been spent dodging dishes and other missiles. Specifically, a brick, he charged, she hurled at him had struck him on the head, inflicting a deep wound.

Prosecutor Silbert took out a warrant for the woman's arrest.

"The trouble began soon after our marriage," the man told Prosecutor Silbert. "First, I learned she had been married before and was divorced. Then she insisted she be known under her maiden name, saying mine was too long and was too hard to spell and pronounce. She said this was another American custom."

Puts His Trust in Left Hind Leg of a Rabbit

BIRMINGHAM, ALA.—Ervin Pope, a prisoner, five times sentenced to hang for murder, has just obtained another review of his case by the Supreme court. He believes a rabbit foot charm is better than a crack lawyer, but the two work extremely well. His long fight for life has not only made him celebrated as a prisoner, but has made his legal counsel famous.

NOTHIN' CAN HARM ME WHILE I HAVE THIS RABBIT'S FOOT

Pope has been sentenced to hang in five separate trials for murder. Several gallows have been erected for his execution. While a prisoner in the Birmingham jail he watched from his cell window the building of two scaffolds for himself.

For five years he has been fighting for his life. The Supreme court has ordered five new trials for him and in every one the lower court convicted Pope and prescribed the death sentence. Seven different days were set for the hanging.

But Pope never believed he would be hanged. He said no court could resist the charmed influence of a left hind foot of a rabbit killed by a cross-eyed, red-headed Ethiopian in a graveyard in the dark of the moon on Friday the thirteenth of the month. Such a charm he carries constantly and attributes his longevity to it.

Pope is charged with the murder of J. B. McClurkin. The principal witness against him was a negro named John Body, in front of whose house the killing occurred, who swore he was awakened by screams and blows and a voice shouting "Ervin!"

DIDN'T KNOW CONGRESSMAN KENT

Perhaps the worst of all the petty annoyances that beset a congressman's path is to have some of the swarm of employes about the capitol fail to recognize him.

"And this, irritating at all times, becomes a source of extreme mortification if any of your constituents happen to be around," observed Representative Kent of California, commenting on a recent contact with this briery little thorn along the congressional trail.

"Some friends from home, to whom I wished to show special attention, dropped in on me," he said, "and I devoted myself to showing them about the capitol. They were keenly alive to the distinction of having their representative personally conduct them, and were profuse in their expressions of regard for my courtesy—hence the situation was all the more embarrassing when, on seeking to enter the members' gallery, I was incontinently halted by a raw and ignorant assistant-something-or-other and curtly forbidden to enter.

"Of course, it was all straightened out and the fellow apologized. But the damage had been done. After that miserable little episode things were different in that party. The paint had come off the doll and I could feel that they felt I must be small potatoes if an insignificant little whiffet like that didn't know who I was. You see, they couldn't get out of their back-home way of looking at a congressman. Back there, everybody knows him; even the boy who brings the groceries knows him by sight—and to find some one right here under the very dome who does not!

"And the worst of it all is you cannot explain to them that there are 400 of us right here; explaining would only magnify it.

"So, you just have to let them take home the memory of you—with the sawdust leaking out!"

SAYS CREOLES ARE NOW UP TO DATE

Representative Albert Estopinal of Louisiana, himself a Creole, says that the manners and opinions of these proud people of the old regime have undergone marked change within the past generation.

"Within the last thirty years there has been widespread adoption of what may be called up-to-date American ways of thinking by the Creoles. There are those still left, however, who adhere to the old traditions of the blood, for we are all proud of our French and Spanish ancestry.

"Not so very long ago I had occasion to go into the new residential district of New Orleans. I took with me in my car a relative who was a native and resident of New Orleans—a Creole, like myself. Now, although he was well along in years, he was as much a stranger and exhibited as much novel interest in that quarter of the city as though he had been fresh from a foreign land. He knew New Orleans well; but it was the New Orleans of old, the New Orleans of the Creoles who have lived all their lives there into old age who have never been north of Canal street, the main thoroughfare."

BRILLIANT MME. POINCARE

Here is a love story—all the way from France. A husband risks misrepresentation and even ridicule to honor his wife, and he is president! The gallantry and courage of Poincare have made presidents' wives equal to queens.

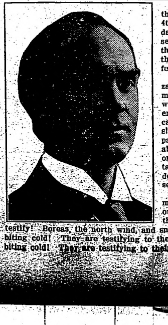
Mme. Poincare's position is, of course, as delicate as brilliant. One of the republic's dogmas is that France requires no queen. For instance, heretofore when a French president drove in state to Longchamps, honoring commerce, sport and fashion in the culmination of the season, nobody noticed if his wife was present with him.

But Mme. Poincare is different. And Poincare is very different. His wife must take her place; it is his principle; it is his joy. And Paris admires. He is pretty sure to be attacked for it, in the general attack which is preparing against him, but Paris admires a man who will fight.

Certainly he fought for his wife before the royal visits.

Mme. Poincare rode beside Queen Alexandria. She took King George's arm in public ceremonies. She was photographed, standing as straight as an arrow, very young and stylish, by King Christian, the two making the prominent couple, as he saluted at the review. She showed everywhere with the four royalties, before all Paris and the world.

CONGRESSMAN HENRY'S WITNESSES



The effort to change the date of the presidential inauguration from the 4th of March to a more seasonable day bobs up in the house of representatives from time to time. During the present session a hearing upon the matter before committee was set for a day on or near the 4th of March.

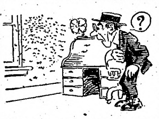
It happened that a terrific blizzard struck the capital that very morning. As the committee members, witnesses, reporters and others gathered the blast rattled fiercely at the casements and the swirling snow and sleet drifted high against the window panes. When some remark was made about certain witnesses not appearing on account of the weather Representative Henry of Texas, who is an ardent advocate for a change of date, seized the opportunity.

"Witnesses!" he exclaimed, dramatically. "Witnesses! There are our witnesses!" and pointed out through the windows. "Hear them testify! Boreas, the north wind, and snow and sleet and driving storm and biting cold! They are testifying to their presence here at this season—to biting cold! They are testifying to their presence here at this season."

WASHINGTON CITY SIDELIGHTS

Swarm of Bees Is Attraction in Capital Street

WASHINGTON.—Chauncey C. Brainerd, the Washington correspondent of the Brooklyn Eagle, entered his office on Fourteenth street in the heart of the business section early the other morning and found a compact group of visitors there ahead of him. The guests were rolling about the office, not on the floor, but halfway between it and the ceiling. A swarm of bees coming from the land of no man knows where had taken possession.



Brainerd knows little about bees except that they sting, a fragment of knowledge which made him cautious. He turned on the electric fan, and the visiting swarm getting into the path of the wind passed out an open window to fasten themselves in a body in a little poplar tree not more than 12 feet high which had been set out to take the place of a storm-broken maple.

The bees were an attraction. Traffic was blocked for a while with a throng of curious but none too courageous spectators. Finally a bold one fastened a big paper box to the tree just below the bees. Just then a farmer came along. He took a little bell off a bicycle which was standing at the curb, put it in the box and rang it. In two seconds the bees had dropped in a bunch from the foliage into the box, the cover was clamped on and the farmer drove away with his prize.

Wilson Likes June Brides, But Couldn't See 'Em

PRESIDENT WILSON has no desire to spoil the honeymoon of any June bride. Unfortunately, however, affairs of state prevent him from granting all the favors asked by June brides who happen to come to Washington on their honeymoons. That is why a certain June bride and her darling hubby from Passaic, N. J., had to leave town very much disappointed.

WILL TH' PRESIDENT POSE WITH US FOR A PHOTO ?

Accompanied by the aforesaid darling hubby, and clad in a very, very diaphanous gown, this June bride strode into the executive offices to see Secretary Tumulty.

"We have just been married," announced the bride, blushing.

"Congratulations," said Tumulty.

"Isn't it delicious!" she exclaimed.

"It is," agreed the secretary.

"We want to see the president," announced the bride.

"Sorry miss—I mean madam, but he is very busy."

"But," she pouted, "John and I thought it would be just too nice if he posed with us for a photograph."

The secretary gasped and then gulped.

"Impossible," he said. "He's too busy."

"Then," exclaimed the bride, "won't you do it?"

"I am very sorry," explained Tumulty, "but the president needs me right away."

Found a Good Way to Defeat a Political Boss

"THE most abject slaves of a political boss will revolt if their slavery is flung in their faces," philosophized Representative McKellar, who comes from the Memphis (Tenn.) district. "I had a concrete example of that in my first congressional campaign," he continued. "One day I met in the street the political boss of Binghamton, a manufacturing suburb. For years he had voted the men like sheep, and he was proud of his autocratic rule. He had opposed General Gordon, my predecessor, and was now violently, but good-naturedly, opposing me.

"'Mac,' he said, 'you won't get but four votes in Binghampton; there are 352 votes there altogether, and I'll poll the 348. I carry them in my vest pocket.'

"'We'll see about that, Tom,' I replied, with a laugh.

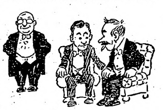
"And thereupon, relying upon that principle of human nature I have just stated, I planned my attack upon Tom's stronghold, where I was to speak the following night.

"I got my crowd in a good humor that evening with a few preliminary stories, and then electrified them by assuring them that I did not expect their votes; that they could not vote for me, even if they wished to, for, no longer ago than yesterday, I told them, their fellow townsman had informed me that he carried all their votes but four in his vest pocket—and they would all be cast against me. I called for a show of hands from those whose votes reposed in Tom's vest pocket; not a hand! I then called for the hands of the independent voters—and every hand went up!

"And, on election day, I carried Binghamton by a handsome majority!"

One Side of Politics at the Nation's Capital

HE HAD a keen eye, and from the neck up he looked like a brilliant, successful young man. A survey of him from his chin down disclosed the fact that he wore a shiny evening suit a size too small for him, that he had a telltale sinking-in somewhere in the immediate vicinity of his wishbone, and the tops of his shoes were in far better condition than the soles. Altogether, he was on his uppers—a fact which he was confiding to his friend in the hotel lobby.



After a while there appeared in the distance the picture of unlimited wealth, unsullied success, and uninterrupted prosperity. Instead of a sinking-in at the wishbone, he exhibited a Dutch-window effect. His clothes fitted him to perfection. Evidently he had come out a victor in every battle he had fought against adversity.

As soon as he appeared, the young man in the small evening clothes was electrified into new life.

"Excuse me," he said to his friend. "That old duffer is from Wisconsin, and he wants to get an ambassadorship. I'm helping him to get it."

All of which is another indication that strangers looking for honors in Washington will pay large sums of money to any needy person who claims to have influence with Bill Jones, who says he has influence with Congressman Smith, who is known to have influence with Senator Jones, who must have influence with a cabinet official who has more influence than anybody else with the president. It's the fine old graft.—Popular Magazine.

AUSTRIA BEGINS WAR ON SERVIA; POWERS ANXIOUS

FIRST BLOW BELIEVED STRUCK WITHOUT FORMAL DECLARATION BEING ISSUED.

FEARED MANY NATIONS MAY BECOME INVOLVED

Iron-Clad Censorship Causes Secrecy About All Movements—Developments Are Regarded as Very Grave—Possibility of General Conflict.

London, July 28.—Late developments appear to furnish new proofs that Austria is fully determined to make war on Servia and the possibilities of a general European war seem greater than have ever confronted the present generation. The Servian reply to the Austro-Hungarian ultimatum was an acceptance of almost all the imperious demands, except that Austrian officials shall participate in the investigation and fix the responsibility for the anti-Austrian propaganda.

Servia Proposes Hague.

Servia proposed an appeal to the powers at The Hague for the settlement of that feature. Notwithstanding this humiliating surrender, which was more than Europe expected of the proud little nation, the Austrian government gave the Servian minister his passports which may be construed as a virtual declaration of war. Austria committed an act of war by arresting the chief of Servian general staff, General Putnik, near Budapest, but he was soon released by the emperor's direct command.

A formal declaration of war is not expected because Servia is not a party to The Hague convention, which requires this. The suspension of all parliamentary and judicial institutions has been decreed in Austria and an iron-clad censorship has drawn a cordon of secrecy around the country, so that the outside world is in complete ignorance of everything happening there, except what the government wants the world to know.

War Even Now?

Even now the Austrian armies may be closed in upon Servia and launching a sudden blow, as Japan did when she sent her fleet against the Russian ships without warning.

While Austria announces "a part mobilization" the Austrian ambassador at London has issued a significant notice to all Austrians liable for military service to return home. The only possibility of averting war at the eleventh hour, which Austria recognizes is that Servia shall reconsider her reply to the Austrian note and bow to all the demands. Even then Austria proposes to exact payment for all her expenses in connection with her military measures.

Russia Is Looked To.

The question as to whether Russia will take up arms to save her Slav protege from a crushing blow is the crucial feature of the situation on which the peace of all Europe hinges.

The same degree of secrecy which Austria has imposed has been established in Russia, also, therefore it cannot be known what military preparations are in progress there. The Russian government has permitted messages to go forth quoting the St. Petersburg papers as considering intervention inevitable and demanded by the popular sentiment.

Germany has informed the other powers that she considers that the Austro-Servian quarrel concerns those nations alone. If any other power takes it up she declares, serious consequences must follow.

FRENCH DISCUSS WAR STAND

Paris, July 28.—The French cabinet took under consideration the Austro-Servian trouble, several of the 12 members present having been summoned by telegraph from the country. Prior to the meeting, the war minister, Adolphe Messimy, conferred with General Joffre, chief of the general staff, General Michel, military governor of Paris and the minister of the interior, Louis Malvy.

The war will be looked upon, if it comes, as a terrible day for hundreds of thousands of men. It is not now known whether they will receive the order for mobilization.

The question of war is the principal topic of discussion in the boulevard cafes and all classes of Parisians are taking an absorbing interest in developments.

Caillaux Trial Is Stirring.

Paris, July 27.—The chief judge challenging on of his colleagues to a duel, the reading of the "mysterious" letters which were supposed to affect the case so profoundly, and the physical collopse in court of Mme. Caillaux were the three incidents which Saturday stirred the emotions in connection with the trial of Mme. Caillaux for the murder of Gaston Calmette. A peculiarly French atmosphere was lent to the affair by the quarrel of the judges. The exact cause has not been ascertained.

SAME AS DECLARATION OF WAR

SERB MINISTER ASKED TO QUIT VIENNA.

Russian Ambassador to Act Instead—First Encounter Near Semendria.

Vienna, July 28.—No declaration of war has been issued and it is believed that none will be since Servia never subscribed to The Hague convention.

Equivalent to Declaration.

The sending of his passports to the Servian minister, M. Jovanovitch, by the Austrian foreign office, however, is deemed equivalent to a declaration of war. This action was taken Sunday the report that the Servian minister had left Vienna Saturday having been incorrect.

M. Jovanovitch left immediately. In his absence the Russian ambassador will take charge of Servian interests.

There were patriotic demonstrations throughout the day, although a heavy rain was falling.

Great crowds gathered in front of the war office and cheered the officers who appeared. Processions with flags flying, filled the streets.

A general mobilization in Montenegro is reported.

Italy Makes Announcement.

Italy has informed Austria that in event of armed conflict with Servia she will adopt a friendly attitude in accordance with her relations with the triple alliance.

Proclamations have been posted ordering partial mobilization.

The Austro-Hungarian bank has raised the bank rate from 4 to 5 per cent and the committee of the bourse has decided to close the bourse today. The committee explains that its decision was actuated by regard for the public interests, to prevent an unwarranted disturbance of industrial interests and to counteract disquieting reports.

The Neue Freie Presse says the minister of finance will raise $6,000,000 for the government's immediate requirements and adds that negotiations between the powers for the localizing of the conflict will continue.

Imperial Decree.

The imperial decree issued Saturday gives the government enormous powers to ensure the secrecy of its measures. The authorities are entitled to open all letters. Only telegrams approved by the censor can be dispatched to any point.

Newspapers publishing details of military preparations or movements can be suppressed. All the railways are guarded by sentries with orders to use their arms on any person who fails to stop when commanded.

The prospect of war is not regarded here as child's play. The Servians put 400,000 men into the field during the Balkan wars. Both officers and men are passionately patriotic.

According to a Semlin rumor the first encounter between Austria and Servia has occurred near Semendria on the Danube, 24 miles southeast of Belgrade.

Some vessels conveying Austrian infantry were said to have been fired on from the Servian side of the Danube and to have returned the fire.

MOBILIZE RESERVISTS IN U. S.

Austrian Envoy Thinks 200,000 Countrymen Here Will Respond to Call to Colors.

Manchester, Mass., July 28. — Dr. Constantin Theodor Dumba, ambassador from Austria-Hungary, to the United States, yesterday instructed consuls in this country to order all Austro-Hungarian reservists whose whereabouts are known, to prepare to return to the army, in event war is declared with Servia. The ambassador, who is at his summer home here, expressed the opinion that war was imminent.

To Order Mobilization.

"I am now expecting official notice," he said, "that war has been declared. When this comes I shall order a general mobilization of all my countrymen up to the age of 42 in the United States for their return to Austria. I think there are about 200,000 Austrians and Hungarians in the United States.

"The only instructions I have received were that Servia's answer to our demands was unsatisfactory and that diplomatic relations had been severed."

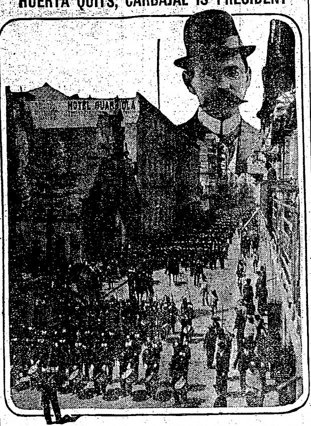
5,000 Mile Burro Trip.

Mitchell, S. D., July 27.—On a tour de luxe on the hurricane deck of a Mexican burro, W. E. Barnard, afflicted with tuberculosis, of Fullerton, Cal., is expected to reach his former home in Mitchell in May or June of next year. "Barney," as he is better known in both his native city of Mitchell and his California home, is making a 5,000 mile journey. It will be camp life for him for the next 13 or 14 months.

Lake Steamer Strikes Rock.

Sault Ste. Marie, Mich., July 27.—From meagre dispatches received here it is learned that the steamer Huron, plying during the tourist season between Toledo, Ohio, and Sault Ste. Marie, by way of the Georgian bay route, struck a rock near Little Current, and is slowly sinking. Her passenger list was full this trip, but all were safely put ashore. Arrangements are being made to transfer them by rail to Sault Ste. Marie and thence by steamer to Lake Erie. The Huron left the Soo Thursday night.

HUERTA QUITS, CARBAJAL IS PRESIDENT



These are the Mexican federal troops that, immediately after the resignation of General Huerta, escorted to the national palace his successor, Francisco Carbajal. Inset is a portrait of the new president.

ORDER IN MEXICO IS ASSURED

FOUR IMPORTANT LEADERS BEING BROUGHT INTO HARMONY.

Encouraging Messages Are Received by Washington of Progress Already Made.

Washington, July 27.—Official advices reveal that the Washington administration is meeting with success in bringing Provisional President Carbajal, General Carranza, General Villa and General Zapata into harmony for the restoration of peace in Mexico.

From these four leaders—representing all the factions concerned in the establishment of a stable government—came encouraging messages in answer to the counsel and advice which the United States has been lending through its numerous consular and diplomatic agents to smooth the way to a complete agreement.

General Zapata, about whom little has been known hitherto, answered a communication sent indirectly to him, promising to co-operate with the Constitutionalists in the work of pacification. It became known also that two emissaries from General Carranza to General Zapata were due in Vera Cruz and would explain to the southern military leader the concessions and reforms planned by the Constitutionalist chief.

Officials were confident an amicable understanding would be reached and did not attribute any significance to the activity of the roving Zapatista bands in the vicinity of Mexico City.

General Carranza, through the American consuls accompanying him, sent renewed assurances of his friendliness for the United States and indicated that he would make satisfactory arrangements concerning the amnesty and guarantees desired by the Carbajal government.

HINDUS ARE AGAIN IN REVOLT

Seize Vessel, Drown Crew and Hold Immigration Officers Hostages.

Vancouver, B. C., July 24.—There are rumors afloat that the Hindus have again taken possession of steamer Komagata Maru, that they have gotten rid of the crew and that four members of the crew have been drowned. Up to the present there had been no means of verifying these statements.

It is further stated that two immigration officials are aboard the Komagata Maru, whose names cannot be ascertained and that they are being held as hostages.

The Sixth Regiment has been called out and is now patrolling the wharves, while the inlet is being patrolled and search lights played around on the waters.

Huerata Now in Jamaica.

Kingston, Jamaica, July 25.—General Huerta and the party of fugitives from Mexico accompanying him, arrived here on board the German cruiser Dresden, from Puerto Mexico.

Rossevelt Will Hurry Suit.

Oyster Bay, N. ., July 25.—The reply of Colonel Roosevelt to the $50,000 libel suit of William Barnes was an attack on the Republican state chairman and a promise to help the suit forward. Colonel Rossevelt said he would not be deterred from attacking Mr. Barnes by the suit, but on the contrary would assail him the harder. He expressed the hope that he would have the opportunity to take the stand against Mr. Barnes before election. "I'll do all I can to help hurry it," he said.

4 KILLED, 60 HURT IN DUBLIN AFFRAY

SEVEN MORE WILL DIE AS RESULT OF SOLDIERS FIRING INTO CROWD.

ARMS SHIPMENT IS CAUSE

Regulars Sent to Intercept Consignment of Munitions—Meet With Resistance—Bottles and Stones Hurled By Mob—Nationalists Are Wildly Excited.

Dublin, July 27.—Three men and one woman are dead and more than 60 persons are in the hospital, wounded as the result of a battalion of the King's Own Scottish oBrderers firing into a mob in the streets of Dublin. Seven of the wounded are expected to die. Among them are three women and a boy of ten.

Cause of Affray.

The affray was the result of a gun-running exploit of the Nationalist volunteers who were being aided by a mob composed largely of women and youths. A consignment of rifles, said to number 10,000 rifles, was landed at Howth, nine miles from Dublin, from a private yacht.

The Nationalist volunteers cut the telegraph wires and stopped travel on the Dublin roads and, according to reports, sent away most of the rifles, together with 70,000 rounds of ammunition in motor cars.

Ordered to Capture Arms.

A battalion of the King's Own Scottish Borderers was ordered to capture the arms when the authorities heard the volunteers were bringing them into the city.

The soldiers encountered a detachment of volunteers at Clonmell bridge and an outbreak resulted, but there was no shooting. Soon a great crowd collected and followed the troops jeering them and cheering for John Redmond, the Nationalist leader, and home rule.

Finally the mob began throwing bottles and stones, injuring several soldiers. To this attack the battalion replied with a scattered fusillade. In an instant the street was covered with wounded, while terrified men, women and children ran in all directions.

Battle Near Hospital.

St. Juras hospital is situated only 200 yards from the scene of the affray and the wounded were quickly taken there, where four of them died. The soldiers and police seized 100 rifles from the volunteers.

Excited crowds filled the streets of Dublin, some of the men carrying rifles. The Borderers are confined to barracks to prevent the people from attacking them.

Prominent Man Hurt.

Among those seriously wounded is M. J. Judge, a prominent officer of the Nationalist volunteers.

Won't Recognize S. D. Law.

Washington, July 25.—The Richards primary law, designed by the South Dakota legislature to "let the peopl rule," and select their own postmasters, will not be recognized by Postmaster General Burleson. At the White House today the postoffice head said that he did not consider the law anything other than an experiment and that he could not recognize its previsions. The appeal made to the president by the South Dakota postmasters has been forwarded to the postmaster general.

COLONEL BEGINS TO PREPARE DEFENSE

ENGAGES LAW FIRM TO CONDUCT HIS CAUSE IN $50,000 LIBEL SUIT.

ALSO RENEWS HIS ATTACKS

Roosevelt's Statement on Which Complaint Is Based—Allegation of Political Leader.

Oyster Bay, N. Y., July 27.—Theodore Roosevelt, after renewing his attack on William Barnes, Republican state chairman, has begun the work of preparing his legal defense in the $50,000 libel suit begun against him by Mr. Barnes, as a result of the colonel's recent statement alluding to the chairman and Charles F. Murphy, leader of Tammany hall.

Calls It "Boss Rule."

In that statement the former president attacked so-called "boss rule," in state politics and favored the candidacy of former State Senator Harvey D. Hinman for governor.

Col. Roosevelt engaged to defend him the New York law firm, Bowers and Sands, which acted for him in the trial last year of his libel suit against the Michigan publisher who charged him with being an inebriate.

Colonel Makes Statement.

Colonel Roosevelt said he regarded the action of Mr. Barnes as the most striking proof that could be given that the bosses recognize in him personally the one enemy that the type of machine government for which they stand has to fear.

Part of Colonel Roosevelt's statement on which Mr. Barnes bases his complaint, is as follows:

"In this campaign, I have a duty to the Progressives of the nation and a duty also to the state of New York. In national politics, insofar as I am able, I shall endeavor to strive for the success of the principles embodied in the Progressive national platform. Therefore I shall oppose the policies of the present administration, which I regard as deeply injurious alike to the honor and the interest of the American people.

Duty in State.

"But in this state the prime duty is a good citizens' movement—a union movement to save the state from the bipartizan control of Messrs. Barnes and Murphy, precisely like the good citizens' movement last year, when by union the city was saved from the domination of Mr. Murphy. I hope with all my heart that all independent citizens, whether Progressives, Republicans or Democrats in their national affiliations, will stand shoulder to shoulder for clean non-partizan government in the state at large this fall.

"In New York state we see at its worst the development of the state of bipartizan boss rule. The outcome of this system is necessarily that invisible government which the Progressive party was in large part founded to oppose. It is impossible to secure the economic, social and industrial reforms to which we are pledged until this invisible government of the party bosses, working through the alliance between crooked business and crooked politics, is rooted out of our government system. In New York state the two political machines are completely dominated, the one by Mr. Barnes, the other by Mr. Murphy. The state government is rotten throughout in almost all of its departments; and this is directly due to the dominance in politics of Mr. Murphy and his sub-bosses, acting through such entirely subservient agents as Governors Dix and Glynn, aided and abetted when necessary by Mr. Barnes and the sub-bosses of Mr. Barnes.

Calls Two Alike.

"Mr. Murphy and Mr. Barnes are of exactly the same moral and political type. Not one shadow of good comes from substituting one for the other in the control of our government. Not one shadow of good comes from perpetuating a government seesaw with first one of them and then the other at the upper end of the plank while the function of the people of the state is limited to serving as a trestle across which the plank is laid.

"The interests of Mr. Barnes and Mr. Murphy are fundamentally identical, and when the issue between popular rights and corrupt and machine ruled government is clearly drawn, the two bosses always will be found fighting on the same side openly or covertly, giving each other such support as can with safety be rendered. These bosses do not hold public office themselves. They act through the holders of public office whom they control. Yet they really form the all powerful invisible government which is responsible for the maladministration and corruption in the public offices of the state."

The Barnes' Complaint.

Mr. Barnes' complaint asserts the references to the plaintiff contained in the statement were libelous, false and untrue.

"The defendant published said statement maliciously, and with intent thereby to injure the plaintiff, and without lawful cause, and for the purpose of defaming and injuring the legitimate political influence and activity of the plaintiff in the performance of his duty of citizenship," the complaint adds. "By reason thereof plaintiff has been damaged in the sum of $50,000."

FELT HE HAD BEEN DECEIVED

Why Old Mose Insisted He Had a Distinct Grievance Against "Marse Tom."

"Economy has its pains as well as its pleasures," says a Washington preacher, "if the experience of an old darky of my acquaintance in Virginia counts for anything.

"One spring, for some reason, old Mose was going around town with a face of dissatisfaction. When questioned, he poured forth a voluble tale of woe in these terms:

"'Marse Tom he come to me last fall an' he say, 'Mose, dey's gwine to be a hard winter, so yo' be keerful, an' save you' wages fast an' tight.'

"'An' I believe Marse Tom, yassuh. I believe him, an' I save, an' save, an' when de winter come it ain't got no hardship, an' dere I was wid all dat money jest thrown on my hands!'"

ECZEMA ITCHED AND BURNED

R. F. D. No. 4, Box 55, Holland, Mich.—"My child's trouble began by getting red and sore around her neck, and her face, behind her ears, under her arms, and different parts of her body were affected. The eczema appeared in a rash first. It was wet and looked as if it was sweaty. It seemed to itch and burn so that she could not sleep or rest. It got so bad at last that behind her ears was one crust or sore so that I had to cut her hair. There was a hard crust covering her neck. She could not have her clothes buttoned at all. I could hardly change her clothes. It caused an awful difigurement for the time. She would cry when I had to wash her.

"We had her treated for some time but without success. I got one cake of Cuticura Soap and one box of Cuticura Ointment and I had not used more than half of what I bought when she was all cured." (Signed) Mrs. G. C. Riemersma, Mar. 21, 1914.

Germany's Care of Its Babies.

Of late years there has developed in Germany, and especially in Saxony, a theory that the cow, and not the milk, should be the subject of first care. Germany is proud, not only of its high birth rate, but of its growing ability to make the births effective by caring for the infants through the period of greatest mortality. Proper nourishment is recognized as the largest factor.

IN SUCH PAIN WOMAN CRIED

Suffered Everything Until Restored to Health by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

Florence, So. Dakota.—"I used to be very sick every month with bearing down pains and backache, and had headache a good deal of the time and very little appetite. The pains were so bad that I used to sit right down on the floor and cry, because it hurt me so and I could not do any work at those times. An old woman advised me to try Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and I got a bottle. I felt better the next month so I took three more bottles of it and got well so I could work all the time. I hope every woman who suffers like I did will try Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound." — Mrs. P. W. LANSENG, Route No. 1, Florence, South Dakota.

Why will women continue to suffer day in and day out or drag out a sickly, half-hearted existence, missing three-fourths of the joy of living, when they can find health in Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound?

For thirty years it has been the standard remedy for female ills, and has restored the health of thousands of women who have been troubled with such ailments as displacements, inflammation, ulceration, tumors, irregularities, etc.

If you want special advice write to Lydia E. Pinkham Medicine Co. (confidential) Lynn, Mass. Your letter will be opened, read and answered by a woman and held in strict confidence.

A RECORD FOR ATTENDANCE

Miss Julia Rue of Rushford Hasn't Missed Day at School in 14 Years.

Rushford.—Miss Julia Rue has made a remarkable record for school attendance, and one believed to be without an equal, not only in Minnesota, but in the United States.

Miss Rue commenced school when 6 years of age, being at that time unable to speak a word of English. She went through all the grades, the high school here, and then took up work at the Winona normal for two years, afterwards teaching two years at Warren, Minn., and in all that time, fourteen years, has never missed a day.

It has been said that she had never been tardy during the fourteen years; however, Miss Rue explains that this is not the case. She admits, even glories in having been tardy once or twice during that time. Miss Rue is now 20 years of age. She is an instructor in the Warren school.

Miss Rue holds the record, so far as can be ascertained, for school attendance. Miss Ethel Wicks of Waukegan, Ill., was a few years ago proclaimed as the champion student, attending school through the grades and high school and never missing a day, but Miss Rue goes her "a few better," having a fourteen-year record.

KILLED WITH STONE; NO CLUE

Unidentified Man is Found Murdered in Field Near Town of Melrose.

Melrose.—A dead man was found in a pasture two and a half miles west of Melrose. The body bore evidence of foul play. The skull was crushed. A bloody stone nearby is supposed to have been the weapon used. It was the only clue found.

The murder is believed to have been committed several days before. There was nothing on the body to identify the murdered man. He was about 40 years of age wore a blue suit, gray cap, was 5 feet 2 inches tall and had black hair. He is supposed to have been a man seeking work in the harvest fields.

A piece of expensive toilet soap wrapped in a Sunday magazine was the only thing found on his person. The body was buried immediately following the coroner's inquest.

MINNESOTA LABOR MEN ELECT

Federation Also Adopts Resolution Against Prohibition and County Option.

Duluth, Minn., July 24.—E. G. Hall of Minneapolis was re-elected president of the Minnesota State Federation of Labor at the closing session of the annual convention here last night. G. W. Lawson, Duluth, was elected secretary treasurer and Winona was chosen as the next meeting place.

The resolution against prohibition, which was returned to the committee for reconsideration after a stormy debate, was introduced again, still retaining the stand against national and state prohibition and county option. It was passed by a decisive majority, the big fight expected on it failing to materialize.

Gophers Take Many Prizes.

Fargo.—Minnesotans shared generously in the live stock awards at the North Dakota state fair. Lewis Hansen of Kragness, Minn., took third place for stallions four years or more. With twenty-two Berkshires on exhibition, the Farmer farm of Farmington, Minn., captured five firsts, five seconds, four thirds and four fourths. H. A. Berenthal of Wyckoff, Minn., had thirty-six head of Chester Whites on exhibit, and his entries took twelve firsts, eight seconds, four thirds and two champion ribbons.

SHIPS TURN ASIDE; SAVE DOG

Three Lake Superior Steamers Go Out of Course to Rescue Pet From Drowning.

Duluth.—Scott Worden is the master of the lake steamer W. K. Bixby, and his dog, a pedigreed bull terrier, came up for a trip on the voyage ending here Wednesday. On the steamer was the owner, Maurice McMillan and his wife, and the dog, named Tige, was a prime favorite. While the Bixby was in White Fish Bay, headed for Duluth, Tige fell overboard. Before the swiftly moving vessel could be turned it had forged two miles ahead, but came around and headed back to the rescue.

Some distance behind the Bixby was the steamer T. F. Cole, also upbound, and fearing that the Cole might run the dog down, Captain Worden signalled the Cole to swing out, which she did, going away to the south.

A Northern Navigation company's passenger steamer, headed down, was also signalled to turn and she went north. The passengers thought that a man had fallen overboard and crowded the rail to see the rescue.

The Bixby presently sighted Tige, swimming bravely but nearly exhausted. A boat was lowered and sailors lifted the fighting dog to safety. Then the steamers tooted and proceeded.

BOLT KILLS UNKNOWN MAN

Severe Bemidji Electrical Storm Does Considerable Property Damage.

Bemidji.—At the height of one of the severest electrical rain storms ever experienced here, an unidentified young man who sought shelter in the lake dock bandstand, was struck by lightning and killed Wednesday. On his body was found a notebook bearing the name "James Dale."

The rainfall in three hours' time amounted to 4.15 inches. The storm crippled the electric light plant.

The house of Andrew Dahl on the lake shore was struck and plastering was torn off and other damage done.

CELEBRATE NEW DIRECT LINE

Minneapolis Business Men Get Acquainted With Those Along Dan Patch Extension to Mankato.

Mankato.—That the business men of Minneapolis, Mankato and intermediate towns might become better acquainted, and at the same time celebrate the establishment of a thorough and direct line of communication between Minneapolis and those cities, an excursion to Mankato was made Thursday, under the auspices of the trade extension committee of the Minneapolis Civic and Commerce association over the Dan Patch line.

Up until July 1, when the Dan Patch line took a lease of the tracks of the Great Western railway from Faribault to Mankato, there was no direct route to this city, the fourth largest in the state, Madison Lake, Elysian, Waterville and Morristown except via St. Paul. As a result of this, freight rates from Minneapolis to the points named, were from nine-tenths of 1 cent to 3 cents per hundred pounds higher than the rates from St. Paul to the same destinations, by reason of the longer haul. The rates are now on a parity with those of St. Paul.

It was to celebrate the opening of this new artery of trade that the excursion was made.

Committees in Northfield, Faribault, Madison Lake, Elysian, Waterville, Morristown and Mankato entertained and welcomed the visitors.

SUFFRAGISTS WILL ADVERTISE

Movies Will Be Novel Method at State Fair for Booming Cause.

Hamline.—Motion pictures are to be called into service by suffragists of Minnesota to advertise their cause and raise funds for advancing its interests. They will install and conduct a movie show on the pike at the Minnesota State Fair here in September.

The Women's Welfare League of St. Paul will assist the Minnesota Woman Suffrage association in the venture.

The State Fair board has given the space for the show, with the understanding that 35 per cent of the gross receipts will be given to the fair. It will cost $400 to open and operate the "votes for women" entertainment.

The program will include a suffrage play, "What Eighty Million Women Want," the only film story in which Mrs. Emmeline Pankhurst has ever appeared, based on a story of New York politics; moving pictures of the St. Paul and Minneapolis suffrage demonstrations on May 2 and one other woman's rights play.

The women will distribute literature in the audiences, get signed memberships for organizations, and signatures for a petition to be presented to the legislature.

Women in automobiles with megaphones will tour the grounds, advertising their attraction.

GAME PROTECTION DISTRICTS

Commission Divides the State for Supervision Purposes—Forty-Five Wardens Appointed.

St. Paul.—Minnesota is now divided into five game protection districts, each district in charge of a member of the state game and fish commission. The object of the new plan is to bring the commissioners into more intimate touch with the actual work of their body and to exercise more careful supervision of the activities of the game wardens.

The commission, at its meeting yesterday appointed forty-five game wardens, who will be placed on the payroll Aug. 1. The funds of the commission are exhausted, but an appropriation of $80,000 will be available.

The monthly payroll of the wardens amounts to $3,150.

TAXES SHOW BIG DECREASE

Drop in Returns Shown by Winona County Rolls in Spite of New Statute.

Winona.—Definite figures are not available, but at the Winona county auditor's office assessments have been so far reviewed that it is certain there will be heavy decreases in both real and personal tax returns.

The personal property assessment outside the city of Winona increased $17,000, as compared with last year, but this will be wiped away with the personal returns from the city, which will show a decrease of $160,000. In the city the decrease on real estate is $170,000, as compared with 1913.

In the townships and villages the decrease also will be heavy.

Minnesota Congressman Sails.

Washington.—As a national delegate to the international interparliamentary union, to be held at Stockholm, Sweden, on Aug. 19, Representative Steenerson of Minnesota, accompanied by his wife, has just sailed from New York on the steamer Celtic. As a member of the committee on postoffices of the house, Mr. Steenerson may conclude to go to Madrid, Spain, in September, to attend the session of the Universal Postal union, before he returns to this country.

TURN OF FORTUNE

By AUGUSTUS GOODRICH SHERWIN.

"Fifty against the dog!" shouted Matteo the Marksman.

"Taken," in a mere careless drawl came the reply from Arvidi, the gamester.

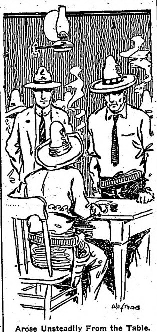
It was a typical Mexican scene—the interior of the chief gambling den at Truro and a critical stage of the game in progress.

Marvin Howe happened to be present amid that swarthy crew—a floating quantity in the general situation involving warfare, anxious to get North and out of it and the opportunity offered just that day with a decidedly favorable change in fortune if he carried out secret instructions given to him.

The position was this: The commandant of the sectional insurgents wished to send a particular message to a co-patriot one hundred miles away. It involved a junction of the two forces. The intermediate forty leagues of territory, however, were occupied by a dangerous enemy. The chief at Truro was surrounded by enemies and spies. He had hired Howe to do some translation and reposed confidence in him.

Howe engaged to cross the danger line and deliver his message. Both knew that while as an American citizen Howe might get through to Texas, he would be challenged, suspected, searched on the way.

So a singular maneuver was decided upon. Within the private room of the chief earlier that evening, his secretary had imprinted across Howe's broad shoulders the message he wished conveyed to his fraternal auxiliary. Those Mexicans were adepts in using an indelible stain that would wear and remain clear, at least for a period. Howe was to try to find some free lance who would accompany him and bring back a reply, while he, well rewarded, returned to home, friends and fiancee—to Nellie Duryea, the only Nellie in the world to him beyond the unsettled border line.



Arose Unsteadily From the Table.

Howe had thought of Matteo and that was why he was now an inmate of the noisy gambling den. He was a free rover, neutral, popular with both sides of the insurrectionist party, he knew the country like a book and Howe fancied felt friendly towards him.

Howe had found him at the card table pitting his money recklessly against the most daring gambler in Truro. It was a strain on his patience to see him immersed in the cards. He was in funds at the start and then Howe saw his last dollar go. A handsome ring was staked, then his watch and now his most faithful friend and companion, the dog.

Everybody who knew Matteo knew also his dog. The animal was tiny, but fearless and very intelligent. He was the constant companion of his master, who had taught him all kinds of cute tricks. With his unerring marksmanship, the man who could clip a silver coin at fifty paces, combining his show dog, could gather a crowd at any time on the public plaza and could have a royal salary in a vaudeville sketch.

The cards went the rounds again. Matteo lost. Howe saw a strangely desperate glint in his eye as he arose unsteadily from the table. He turned slightly pale. Then he shrugged his shoulders and walked over and kissed the little dog asleep on a pile of newspapers. Straight as a soldier then, he walked from the room.

"It will break his heart to lose his friend," Howe told Arvidi quickly. "May I redeem him?" and he proffered fifty dollars in paper money.

"All right," nodded the gambler and then Howe snatched up the dog and rushed after his master. Howe overtook him at the street door.

"Yours," he said, placing the little pet in his arms.

Matteo stared at Howe in a dazed uncertain way. Then his fingers gently caressed the dog. His voice broke as he comprehended what Howe had done.

"Amigo," he said, folding his hand in a fervent grasp, "when my fortune turns I shall know how to repay you."

"I can help it turn just now," remarked Howe significantly. Howe knew he was a man to be trusted. He told him that he was authorized to pay royally for his guidance and direction.

"I can pilot you safely," he said—"I am your man."

It was a devious route, that by which Matteo led Howe from Truro. His sole object seemed to be to evade a collision with marauding parties and he succeeded famously in this. The third day out of Truro, however, an incident occurred that confirmed a suspicion Howe had entertained ever since starting on his present mission.

The morning they left Truro Howe had noticed a man he had seen hanging around the chief's quarters dogging his footsteps. He had called the attention of Matteo to this, who had carelessly asserted that if he was one of the numerous spies in action they "would soon lose him."

However, twice in two days after they had started on the trail they caught sight of a distant figure remindful of the man they had observed at Truro.

It was early in the morning that Matteo suggested a plunge into a near creek before they lit a little fire and cooked their frugal breakfast. They had disrobed and were disporting themselves in the cool sparkling stream when an ominous sound echoed out—

Click!

Then to the consternation of Howe, turning he saw a man, the man who had shadowed him in the city just rushing away with a camera.

"Matteo!" shouted Howe quickly—"the spy. He has photographed the message on my back!"

"So!" observed Matteo, speedily springing ashore. "Ah! He had that purpose in following us, eh? Then he shall not get away so easily."

Matteo had run to where his clothes lay. It was to seize his revolver, with which he was a crack shot, from its holster.

Howe, transfixed, watched the man with the camera running down the river shore. The fugitive had a fair lead. Matteo aimed.

Crack!—followed a sure steady aim. Howe saw the runner waver and change the camera to his other hand, evidently hit.

Crack!—a second sharp explosion followed. Howe saw the camera shoot out pieces of glass and wood where the bullet had pierced it. Dropping the wrecked camera and holding his wounded hand, the spy disappeared.

"The message is written partly in cipher," explained Howe, "but that man might have been able to make it out after close study."

"He is doubtless one of the unscrupulous crowd infesting the province, ready to blackmail, sell secrets or betray his best friend," acceded Matteo. "Well, he has failed in his mission and we will scarcely go in bathing again."

They reached the end of their journey in safety and the secret message was transcribed.

Matteo returned to Truro with a rich reward awaiting him. Marvin Howe crossed the border, bound for home and his waiting fiancee, pretty Nellie Duryea.

TEN HOURS' SLEEP NEEDED

Neurasthenia and Its Resultant Evils Would Then Disappear, Says Prof. Carl Schleicht.

Sleep—that is what gunmen, pickpockets, divorcees, speeders, tango maniacs and many others need, if Prof. Carl Ludwig Schleich has the right idea.

"Civilized man or woman of today"—the professor is speaking—"must learn to sleep at least ten hours of the 24 if he or she expects to check the increased wear and irritability of his of her modern neurasthenic life and temperament. Sunset and sunrise are nature's time for sleeping and awakening. Sleep quietly one-half your life away. You will have twice as much out of the other half. Sleep is the preserver of the spiral electricity of the blood vessels—it is the key that winds up the timepiece of life."

Rather neat, what?

The trouble with our criminals is neurasthenia—expressed in a confusion between their possessions and other people's. Our society women have neurasthenia—expressed in the feverish tango, bridge parties, and shopping orgies. Then there are our business men, whose neurasthenia is expressed in a foolish fancy that dollars plus dollars equals happiness. The American family's neurasthenia has produced a divorce record that is not pretty to look at.

When men or women are hungry they do desperate deeds. When they are hysterical from lack of sleep they are fit for treason, stratagems and spoils. Many are so sleepy that they can not sleep.

Going to bed at sunset and getting up at sunrise is a particularly rational policy in summer. Neurasthenic city people, without taking the professor's extravagant dose of ten hours of sleep out of every 24, could do a great deal worse than go to bed early in the summer and then get up in time to gather, for their health's sake and for the peace of their souls, a glorious bouquet of sunrises.

WOULD HAVE SUNDAYS DULL

British Member of Parliament Sees Mistake in Nonobservance of the Sabbath.

"I think Sunday ought to remain what some people call 'dull,'" said J. Ramsay MacDonald, M. P., speaking at Leicester. He appealed to religious institutions to see that Sunday is not secularized. People talked a lot of nonsense about the Scottish Sabbath, and did not know what they were talking about. If they were only trained to appreciate the Scottish Sabbath—it would take some amount of training—they would not be sorry if they had it.

All the talk about turning Sunday into a day of recreation was humbug and dangerous. In trying to do it they were beginning at the wrong end of the stick. They should not sacrifice the blessings they had got.

He looked forward to the time when everybody would have sufficient time for recreation during the secular days of the week. An enlightened democracy should value a day of spiritual rest so much that their hands would be lifted up against any man or movement that desired to secularize the Sunday.—London Chronicle.

"Tickets," said the collector as he opened the door of the car in which sat a man who looked as if he was anchored to his seat. The man handed over the pasteboard, which was duly inspected. Then, looking around, the collector said: "Is there another gentleman in the car?"

"No."

"Is that other portmanteau yours, then, too?"

"Other portmanteau?"

"Yes; on the floor there by the other."

"Those," said the traveler with dignity, "are my feet."

A mother sent her little daughter down to open the door and entertain the minister, Mr. Black, while she finished dressing. When she appeared the little kitten ran in ahead of her, and the tiny maiden jumped up and down and screamed to the top of her voice: "Oh, kitty, witty, go out, quick."

The mother was horrified, and said: "Daughter, what makes you act so?"

"Well, mother, dad said last night 'that Mr. Black's sermons were enough to make a cat sick,' and I don't want mine sick."

WHO IS FASEL?

What does Thief River Falls owe Fasel? If you owe him twenty-five cents go up and pay it because he needs the money to establish that new bank at Goodridge.

Well as to Fasel, he has seventy-five percent of the votes of Thief River Falls in his vest pocket and sixty-five percent of the votes of Highlanding township, while Deer Park, Hickory, Star and Mayfield are inhabited by a few common Norwegians that don't know how to vote, if they don't vote for Fasel.

As to A. P. Anderson, who is a common "Holliken" that has made good, we wish to say; that if you elect him for County Auditor of Pennington county, he is a man that is well qualified for the position to which he aspires, and if you have any business to do in the Auditor's office of Pennington County, you will meet an honorable man that can talk plain English and snakka "Norsk a litte grau" if necessary.

This is only a starter in the campaign. Later on we might mention something about extension of time of Ditch Contracts.

From the Nat'l Republican Congressional Committee, Washington, D. C.

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE.

Washington, July—Minnesota wheat farmers have lost an average of $99.00, each, a year by the slump in the price of wheat since the Republican Party went out of power. All the Minnesota wheat farmers put together have lost $9,300,000 a year. Recent hot debates in the House of Representatives led to an investigation of wheat prices. The results of this investigation are now given out for the first time. The figures given are right up to July 1. They reveal a general slump of fifteen cents a bushel in wheat prices since Republican times.

There are 93,049 wheat reporting farmers in Minnesota, whose estimated wheat production this year was 62,000,000 bushels. The figures show the average farmer throughout the country has lost $95.00 a year through the decrease in the price of his wheat from what it was under Republican times. The loss to the wheat farmers of the whole United States is 139,500,000 a year. The total estimated wheat production of the country for this year is 930,000,009 bushels, from reports from 1,458,967 wheat farmers.

As the farmer editor had to go to Thief River Falls this week after a wagon, to use in haying he has not had time to look up the next chapter of O'Neil's record. We have to be careful, you know, to publish absolute facts, as D. P. would have a smile coming if we guessed at anything we published. Next week we will devote chapter 4 to telling the people how that Normal School happened to be located at Bemidji instead of Thief River Falls. This is the case that Dan bases his hopes on to bring an action against THE SUNBEAM for libel for saying he SOLD OUT. We never said that, and we are not going to say it next week either, but we will publish the facts as they were, and leave the people to draw their own conclusions, and if they feel like sending him down there again to MISREPRESENT them, go and vote for him.

POLITICAL ANNOUNCEMET.

To the Voters of the new 65th District, composed of the Counties of Pennington, Clearwater and Red Lake:

I hereby announce myself as a candidate for Representative for the said district. I solicit your support and votes at the election to be held November 3rd, 1914.

I have been a resident of the District for the past thirty-two years and have, I believe, grown to know the wants and needs of the citizens of the District, and as political platforms have been eliminated by the Non-Partisan Election Law, I therefore hold it to be the duty of all persons seeking legislative honors to declare themselves upon public questions affecting the welfare, health and morals of the people of the State,

If nominated and elected I pledge myself to use my best efforts and ability to work for the following legislation:

Legislation for economy and efficiency in State Administration of business affairs for the purpose of lightening the burden of the tax payers of the state.

I favor putting the telephones of the state under the supervision of the Railroad and Warehouse Commission and compelling physical connection of lines and regulations of rates.

I shall encourage the adoption of the Revolving Fund Amendment known as House File No. 1242. Also the Iniative Referendum Amendment.

Equal suffrage for women.

I favor the sale of foreign bonds held by the State of Minnesota, and the investment of the permanent funds of the state in improving our own, instead of loaning them to other states at a low rate of interest. The money should be used to finance our Counties, Cities, Drainage Projects, School Districts and Loans on Resident Farm Property.

I favor the increase in the royalities paid the State when the present mineral leases expire.

I favor Consolidation and Reduction of the State Board Commissions in the interests of economy.

I favor the submission of the liquor question to the vote of the people, to the end that communities where they are of the opinion that right living and higher morals may be attained by the elimination of liquor, may at least have an opportunity of putting their views to the test, that is, I favor County Option and if elected will vote for its adoption.

I also favor liberal allowances for advertising the resources of the State with a view of inducing immigration.

I firmly believe in the rule of the people and if elected shall support every measure which may tend to increase the power of the State government and all measures which may tend to the betterment of the condition in the rural communities.

Hoping you will give my platform due consideration and favor me with your franchise, I am most

Respectfully,
JOHN A. DUFFY.

Pennington County Fair.

The Pennington county fair will be held at Thief River Falls on August 5, 6 and 7th this year. The fair will be bigger and better than ever, this year, as the management have secured the attendance of the great International Shows who will furnish entertainment during the three days of the fair. The world's famous Birdman Lincoln Beachy will make two flights daily on August 6th and 7th, and this man will not disappoint the people, as they were three year ago, but those who visit the Pennington county fair this year will see an aeroplane fly. There is also a big program of races, and the farmers should try to assist the management by making a good display of farm products, and be sure to attend the fair.

Miss Sadie Vattendahl, of Oklee, visited at the home of her sister, Mrs. John Radneicki, of Rhoda, Sunday last.

Miss Myrtle Hunt got one of her fingers into the printing press yesterday, and jammed it quite seriously.

Owing to the day being so hot last Sunday, there was a small crowd at the Young Peoples' Society which was held at Lande's, in the town of Deer Park.

County Treasurer Trovaton seems to be following the style of Adolph Eberhart, of having considerable business to do outside the treasurer's office.

The grain is filling fine and the farmers are now confident of getting a big crop this year, and prices are steadily advancing, particulary on flax.

The farmers will be pretty busy next week finishing their haying, and those who are not through, will be likely to take in the hayfield instead of the county fair.

The crew of men which have been working on the branch ditch of 53, moved over into the town of Hickory, yesterday, to do grading and ditching over there.

The warm weather of the past week has rushed the corn crop forward at a rapid rate, and has not done any damage to the other grain, as there has been a good breeze every day, which keep the heads of the grain moving.

We are publishing the announcement of H. O. Kjomme, as candidate for County Attorney, this week. Mr. Kjomme is a young man who has built up a good law practice in Thief River Falls, by honorable dealing with his clients, and is a man that the people can safely trust to take care of that important office.

The new town on the electric line north of Highlanding is certainly booming, with a string of teams hauling material from Thief River Falls. The line will soon be ready to do business, but there are a lot of enterprising business men who want to get in on the ground floor and are using teams to get their hauling done.

Candidate Stenvick was in [illegible] accident last week, and the Bagley Independent intimates, as a joke, that perhaps Duffy gave the auto driver $5.00 to put Stenvick out of the Representative race, but we do not think it is necessary to kill him again, as he killed himself, politically, when he was County Attorney of Clearwater County.

The Thief River Falls News-Press, gave Commissioner Shaw a write up last week, that was a little sarcastic to say the least. However the article indicates that Shaw got himself into trouble by trying to save money for the county he represents, as one of the commissioners, and a roasting of that kind benefits a commissioner, instead of injuring him.

THE OLD TRADE DOLLAR.

And the Exact Ratio of Gold to Silver In the Year 1870.

Three mining engineers were gathered together the other day, and the question as to the value of an old trade dollar came up. Strange as it may seem, no one knew its value, and there was considerable haziness as to the exact value of an ounce of pure gold or of the old fashioned value of an ounce of silver, says a correspondent in the Engineering and Mining Journal. Calculations which I made seemed to indicate that the ratio of gold to silver in 1870 was not exactly 16 to 1. Possibly it may be of interest to the profession to know the exact figures which I have received from the assayer of the mint bureau, United States treasury.

Coinage value of one ounce pure gold is $20.671834625. A convenient fact, easy to remember, regarding this figure is that forty-three ounces of coin gold, 900 fine, are worth $800.

Coin value of an ounce of silver 1870	$1.2929
Coinage value of a trade dollar in 1870	1.01815
The coinage value of a Mexican dollar in 1870	1.0159

The trade dollar was coined so that it might be used in the orient on a parity with the Mexican dollar, which it slightly exceeded in value. The Mexican dollar, no longer coined, weighed 417.74 grains and was 902.7 fine, slightly in excess of the United States fineness of 900.

In 1870 the ratio of gold to silver was not 16 to 1, but 15.9884— to 1. This silver ratio has been discontinued, and the ratio for the present subsidiary coinage is 14.95349 to 1.

Heyse as a Prize Winner.

The late Paul Heyse was probably the only man of letters who could boast of having obtained two important literary prizes with an interval of more than half a century between the awards. All the world knows that he got the Nobel prize. All the world does not know that his play, "The Sabines," was allotted a prize in a dramatic competition as long ago as 1857. He was a member of the Round Table of the good King Max of Bavaria, a sovereign whose joy it was to surround himself with men of science and letters.—Pall Mall Gazette.

OLDEST PARIS NEWSPAPER.

The Journal Des Debats and Napoleon's Famous News Order.

The oldest newspaper in Paris, the Journal des Debats, was one of the cluster of newspapers which sprang into being with the beginnings of popular government in 1789.

It was founded by a printer named Baudoin, and purported to be, as its name shows, a mere chronicle of political events. Owing to its pungent criticisms of men and affairs it soon became one of the most influential of the Paris journals.

In 1805 the paper was compelled by Napoleon to change its name and became the Journal de l'Empire. It was in the course of the correspondence which took place between Napoleon and the editor, Fievee, on the subject of the threatened censorship that the emperor gave the order which has become famous, about the policy of the newspaper, "that it should publish no news unfavorable to the government until the truth was so well known that publication was needless."

After Napoleon's retirement to Elba the paper resumed its old title. It is still edited and printed in the house where it was first started, beside the church of St. Germain de l'Auxerrois, from the tower of which the signal was given for the massacre of St. Bartholomew's eve. Of all the great Paris newspapers it has been the least affected by the modern developments of journalism, and its dignified columns are an encouragement to thoughtful reflection and a serious study of affairs. —London Times.

HOW TREES EAT.

They Seem to Digest Their Food Before Absorbing It.

Every gardener knows that a tree can be fed and made to grow with increased vigor. If proper nourishment in the form of humus, nitrogen, phosphate, etc., be placed about its roots the tree will absorb this food and grow rapidly and strongly.

But how the tree feeds is somewhat more difficult to explain. In all probability the tree digests its food first and consumes it afterward. Certain it is that the average tree has no means of consuming food as a whole, as members of the animal kingdom absorb it. It is well known that the larvae of certain insects digest their food first and consume it afterward. Observation would indicate that this is exactly what the tree does. The tiny rootlets act on the substances in the earth, dissolving and breaking them up so they can be absorbed through the root pores. In order so to be taken up the chemicals must be in liquid form and devoid of all waste.

The end of each root is armed with a horny substance, with which it can burrow through the hard soil in search of food. When food is found it is dissolved into a liquid and absorbed by the root fibers. From the root the food is carried by the sap to all parts of the tree.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

CHINESE HUMOR.

Illustrated by a Story of the Hospitality of Two Friends.

That the Chinese are possessed of a keen sense of humor is shown by the following anecdote which is related in the Spirit of the East Magazine:

"There were two men who had been friends from their school days. One lived in the town, the other in the country. After a separation lasting a whole year, the countryman decided to pay a visit to his friend the townsman. The latter gave him a hearty welcome, but the repast he furnished consisted merely of two bowls of rice and a single egg.

"'What a pity,' he said with a great sigh, 'that you came so early! If you had only waited for another year, my friend, we should have had fowl for our dinner, as this egg would have developed into a chicken!'

"Not long afterward the townsman returned the visit. For his entertainment the countryman cut a hard piece of bamboo rod into small pieces, salted them, roasted them in fat and served them up.

"'What a pity,' he ejaculated, 'you came so late! If you had only come a year ago, my friend, we should have had tender bamboo shoots for dinner today!'"

An Unrepresentative House.

One of the most elaborate calculations of the composition of the house of commons a hundred years ago is given in Dr. Oldfield's "Representative History." According to this 218 members were returned by 87 peers in England and Wales, 31 members by 21 peers in Scotland and 51 members by [illegible] peers in Ireland. Thus just 300 members were returned by peers. In addition 137 members were returned by 90 commoners in England and Wales, 14 members by 14 commoners in Scotland and 20 members by 19 commoners in Ireland, while the treasury commanded [illegible] seats, the admiralty 4 and the [illegible] in a house of 658 [illegible] claim to be more or less independent.—London Chronicle.

How We Go to Sleep.

Sleep begins in its first phase by a state of distraction, which brings on states of absentmindedness, accompanied always by numerous and separate hallucinations, closely connected with the length of the absentminded states. Immediately afterward, in a second phase, these states of distraction pass into a very delicate motor disturbance, due to the absence of parallelism in the axes of the eyes or by the deviation of their conjugate movements, says the Family Doctor. Finally, in a third and final phase, which indicates the very near approach of actual sleep, the vasomotor system seems to conform to laws very different from those that regulate its mechanism during waking hours.

Under a Banyan Tree.

The first parliament house of the Boers was under a banyan tree, under which the rulers of the Transvaal gathered in the early days of the republic to discuss questions affecting the country, and the tree became known as the "first volksraad of the Transvaal." The Boers call the spot Wonderboom. It is a few miles outside of Pretoria, at the entrance to a cleft in the mountain.

CHAPTER XXI.—Continued.

"I did not see the register at the inn. I did not know till afterwards that we were not booked. Once upstairs, I refused to remove my hat or my veil or my coat until he brought his friend to me. He pretended to be very angry over his friend's failure to be there beforehand, as he had promised. He ordered a supper served in the room. I did not eat anything. Somehow I was beginning to understand, vaguely of course, but surely—and bitterly, Mr. Wrandall. Suddenly he threw off the mask.

"He coolly informed me that he knew the kind of a girl I was. I had been on the stage. He said it was no use trying to work the marriage game on him. He was too old a bird and too wise to fall for that. Those were his words. I was horrified, stunned. When I began to cry out in my fury, he laughed at me but swore he would marry me even at that if it were not for the fact that he was already married. . . . I tried to leave the room. He held me. He kissed me a hundred times before I could break away. I—I tried to scream. . . . A little later on, when I was absolutely desperate, I—I snatched up the knife. There was nothing else left for me to do. I struck at him. He fell back on the bed. . . . I stole out of the house—oh, hours and hours afterward it seemed to me. I cannot tell you how long I stood there watching him. . . . I was crazed by fear. I—I—"

Redmond Wrandall held up his hand.

"We will spare you the rest, Miss Castleton," he said, his voice hoarse and unnatural. "There is no need to say more."

"You—you understand? You do believe me?" she cried.

He looked down at his wife's bowed head, and received no sign from her; then at the white, drawn faces of his children. They met his gaze and he read something in their eyes.

"I—I think your story is so convincing that we—we could not endure the shame of having it repeated to the world."

"I—I cannot ask you to forgive me, sir. I only ask you to believe me," she murmured brokenly. "I—I am sorry it had to be. God is my witness that there was no other way."

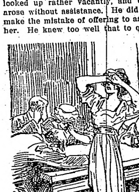
Mr. Carroll came to his feet. There were tears in his eyes.

"I think, Mr. Wrandall, you will now appreciate my motives in—"

"Pardon me, Mr. Carroll, if I suggest that Miss Castleton does not require any defense at present," said Mr. Wrandall stiffly. "Your motives were doubtless good. Will you be so good as to conduct us to a room where we may—may be alone for a short while?"

There was something tragic in the man's face. His son and daughter arose as if moved by an instinctive realization of a duty, and perhaps for the first time in their lives were submissive to an influence they had never quite recognized before—a father's unalterable right to command. For once in their lives they were meek in his presence. They stepped to his side and stood waiting, and neither of them spoke.

Mr. Wrandall laid his hand heavily on his wife's shoulder. She started, looked up rather vacantly, and then arose without assistance. He did not make the mistake of offering to assist her. He knew too well that to question her strength now would be but to invite weakness. She was strong. He knew her well.



"There Was Nothing Else Left for Me to Do."

She stood straight and firm for a few seconds, transfixing Hetty with a look that seemed to bore into the very soul of her, and then spoke.

"You ask us to be your judges?"

"I ask you to judge not me alone but—your son as well," said Hetty, meeting her look steadily. "You cannot pronounce me innocent without pronouncing him guilty. It will be hard."

Sara raised her head from her arms.

"You know the way into my sitting-room, Leslie," she said, with singular directness. Then she arose and drew her figure to its full height. "Please remember that it is I who am to be judged. Judge me as I have judged you. I am not asking for mercy."

Hetty impulsively threw her arms about the rigid figure, and swept a pleading look from one to the other of the four stony-faced Wrandalls.

They turned away without a word or a revealing look, and slowly moved off in the direction of the boudoir. They who remained behind stood still, motionless as statues. It was Vivian who opened the library door. She closed it after the others had passed through, and did not look behind.

* * * * * * *

Half an hour passed. Then the door was opened and the tall old man advanced into the room.

"We have found against my son, Miss Castleton," he said, his lips twitching. "He is not here to speak for himself, but he has already been judged. We, his family, apologize to you for what you have suffered from the conduct of one of us. Not one but all of us believe the story you have told. It must never be retold. We ask this of all of you. It is not in our hearts to thank Sara for shielding you, for her hand is still raised against us. We are fair and just. If you had come to us on that wretched night and told the story of my son's infamy, we, the Wrandalls, would have stood between you and the law. The law could not have touched you then; it shall not touch you now. Our verdict, if you choose to call it that, is sealed. No man shall ever hear from the lips of a Wrandall the smallest part of what has transpired here tonight. Mr. Carroll, you were right. We thank you for the counsel that led this unhappy girl to place herself in our hands."

"Oh, God, I thank thee—I thank thee!" burst from the lips of Sara Wrandall. She strained Hetty to her breast.

"It is not for us to judge you, Sara," said Redmond Wrandall, speaking with difficulty. "You are your own judge, and a harsh one you will find yourself. As for ourselves, we can only look upon your unspeakable design as the working of a temporarily deranged mind. You could never have carried it out. You are an honest woman. At the last you would have revolted, even with victory assured. Perhaps Leslie is the only one who has a real grievance against you in this matter. I am convinced that he loved Miss Castleton deeply. The worst hurt is his, and he has been your most devoted advocate during all the years of bitterness that has existed between you and us. You thought to play him a foul trick. You could not have carried it to the end. We leave you to pass judgment on yourself."

"I have already done so, Mr. Wrandall," said Sara. "Have I not accused myself before you? Have I not confessed to the only crime that has been committed? I am not proud of myself, sir."

"You have hated us well."

"And you have hated me. The crime you hold me guilty of was committed years ago. It was when I robbed you of your son. To this day I am the leper in your path. I may be forgiven for all else, but not for allowing Challis Wrandall to become the husband of Sebastian Gooch's daughter. That is the unpardonable sin."

Mr. Wrandall was silent for a moment.

"You still are Sebastian Gooch's daughter," he said distinctly. "You can never be anything else."

She paled. "This last transaction proves it, you would say?"

"This last transaction, yes."

She looked about her with troubled, questioning eyes.

"I—I wonder if that can be true," she murmured, rather piteously. "Am I so different from the rest of you? Is the blood to blame?"

"Nonsense!" exclaimed Mr. Carroll nervously. "Don't be silly, Sara, my child. That is not what Mr. Wrandall means."

Wrandall turned his face away.

"You loved as deeply as you hate, Sara," he said, with a curious twitching of his chin. "My son was your god. We are not insensible to that. Perhaps we have never realized until now the depth and breadth of your love for him. Love is a bitter judge of its enemies. It knows no mercy, it knows no reason. Hate may be conquered by love, but love cannot be conquered by hate. You had reason to hate my son. Instead you persisted in your love for him. We—we owe you something for that, Sara. We owe you a great deal more than I find myself able to express in words."

Leslie entered the room at this instant. He had his overcoat on and carried his gloves and hat in his hand.

"We are ready, father," he said thickly.

After a moment's hesitation, he crossed over to Hetty, who stood beside Sara.

"I—I can now understand why you refused to marry me, Miss Castleton," he said, in a queer, jerky manner. "Won't you let me say that I wish you all the happiness still to be found in this rather uneven world of ours?"

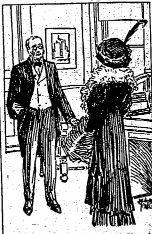
The crowning testimonial to an absolutely sincere ego!

CHAPTER XXII.

Renunciation.

On the third day after the singular trial of Hetty Castleton in Sara's library, young Mrs. Wrandall's motor drew up in front of a lofty office building in lower Broadway; its owner stepped down from the limousine and entered the building. A few moments later she walked briskly into the splendid offices of Wrandall & Co., private bankers and steamship-owners. The clerks in the outer offices stared for a moment in significant surprise, and then bowed respectfully to the beautiful silent partner in the great concern.

It was the first time she had been seen in the offices since the tragic event that had served to make her a member of the firm. A boy at the information desk, somewhat impressed by her beauty and the trim elegance of her long black broad-tail coat, to say nothing of the dark eyes that shone through the narrow veil, forgot the dignity of his office and went so far as to politely ask her who she wanted to see and "what name, please."



"What's This?" He Demanded, Sharply.

The senior clerk rushed forward and transfixed the new boy with a glare.

"A new boy, Mrs. Wrandall," he made haste to explain. To the new boy's surprise, the visitor was conducted with much bowing and scraping into the private offices, where no one ventured except by special edict of the powers.

"Who was it?" he asked, in some awe, of a veteran stenographer who came up and sneered at him.

"Mrs. Challis Wrandall, you little simpleton," said she, and for once he failed to snap back.

It is of record that for nearly two whole days, he was polite to every visitor who approached him and was generally worth his salt.

Sara found herself in the close little room that once had been her husband's, but was now scrupulously held in reserve for her own use. Rather a waste of space, she felt as she looked about the office. The clerk dusted an easy chair and threw open the long unused desk near the window.

"We are very glad to see you here, madam," he said. "This room hasn't been used much, as you may observe. Is there anything I can do for you?"

She continued her critical survey of the room. Nothing had been changed since the days when she used to visit her husband here on occasions of rare social importance: such as calling to take him out to luncheon, or to see that he got safely home on rainy afternoons. The big picture of a steamship still hung on the wall across the room. Her own photograph, in a silver frame stood in one of the recesses of the desk. She observed that there was a clean white blotter there, too; but the ink wells appeared to be empty, if she was to judge by the look of chagrin on the clerk's face as he inspected them. Photographs of polo scenes in which Wrandall was a prominent figure, hung about the walls, with two or three pictures of his favorite ponies, and one of a ragged gipsy girl with wonderful eyes, carrying a monkey in a crude wooden cage strapped to her back. On closer observation one would have recognized Sara's peculiarly gipsy-like features in the face of the girl, and then one would have noticed the caption written in red ink at the bottom of the photograph: "The Trumbell's Fancy Dress Ball, January 10, '07. Sara as Gipsy Mab."

With a start, Sara came out of her painful reverie. She passed her hand over her eyes, and seemed thereby to put the polite senior clerk back into the picture once more.

"No, thank you. Is Mr. Redmond Wrandall down this afternoon?"

"He came in not ten minutes ago. Mr. Leslie Wrandall is also here. Shall I tell Mr. Wrandall you wish to see him?"

"You may tell him that I am here, if you please," she said.

"I am very sorry about the ink wells, madam," murmured the clerk. "We—we were not expecting—"

"Pray don't let it disturb you, Mr. Bancroft. I shall not use them today."

"They will be properly filled by tomorrow."

"Thank you."

He disappeared. She relaxed in the familiar, comfortable old leather-cushioned chair, and closed her eyes. There was a sharp little line between them, but it was hidden by the veil.

The door opened slowly and Redmond Wrandall came into the room. She arose at once.

"This is—er—an unexpected pleasure, Sara," he said perplexed and ill-at-ease. He stopped just inside the door he had been careful to close behind him, and did not offer her his hand.

"I came down to attend to some business, Mr. Wrandall," she said.

"Business?" he repeated, staring.

She took note of the tired, haggard look in his eyes, and the tightly compressed lips.

"I intend to dispose of my entire interest in Wrandall & Co.," she announced calmly.

He took a step forward, plainly startled by the declaration.

"What's this?" he demanded sharply.

"We may as well speak plainly, Mr. Wrandall," she said. "You do not care to have me remain a member of the firm, nor do I blame you for feeling as you do about it. A year ago you offered to buy me out—or off, as I took it to be at the time. I had reasons then for not selling out to you. Today I am ready either to buy or to sell."

"You—you amaze me," he exclaimed.

"Does you offer of last December still stand?"

"I—I think we would better have Leslie in, Sara. This is most unexpected. I don't quite feel up to—"

"Have Leslie in by all means," she said, resuming her seat.

He hesitated a moment, opened his lips as if to speak, and then abruptly left the room.

Sara smiled.

Many minutes passed before the two Wrandalls put in an appearance. She understood the delay. They were telephoning to certain legal advisers.

"What's this I hear, Sara?" demanded Leslie, extending his hand after a second's hesitation.

She shook hands with him, not listlessly but with the vigor born of nervousness.

"I don't know what you've heard," she said pointedly.

His slim fingers went searching for the end of his moustache.

"Why—why, about selling out to us," he stammered.

"I am willing to retire from the firm of Wrandall & Co.," she said.

"Father says the business is as good as it was a year ago, but I don't agree with him," said the son, trying to look lugubrious.

"Then you don't care to repeat your original proposition?"

"Well, the way business has been falling off—"

"Perhaps you would prefer to sell out to me," she remarked quietly.

"Not at all!" he said quickly, with a surprised glance at his father. "We couldn't think of letting the business pass out of the Wrandall name."

"You forget that my name is Wrandall," she rejoined. "There would be no occasion to change the firm's name; merely its membership."

"Our original offer stands," said the senior Wrandall stiffly. "We prefer to buy."

"And I to sell. Mr. Carroll will meet you tomorrow, gentlemen. He will represent me as usual. Our business as well as social relations are about to end, I suppose. My only regret is that I cannot further accommodate you by changing my name. Still you may live in hope that time may work even that wonder for you."

She arose. The two men regarded her in an aggrieved way for a moment.

"I have no real feeling of hostility toward you, Sara," said Leslie nervously, "in spite of all that you said the other night."

"I am afraid you don't mean that, deep down in your heart, Leslie," she said, with a queer little smile.

"But I do," he protested. "Hang it all, we—we live in a glass house ourselves, Sara. I dare say, in a way, I was quite as unpleasant as the rest of the family. You see, we just can't help being snobs. It's in us, that's all there is to it."

Mr. Wrandall looked up from the floor, his gaze having dropped at the first outburst from his son's lips.

"We—we prefer to be friendly, Sara, if you will allow us—"

She laughed and the old gentleman stopped in the middle of his sentence.

"We can't be friends, Mr. Wrandall," she said, suddenly serious. "The pretence would be a mockery. We are all better off if we allow our paths, our interests to diverge today."

"Perhaps you are right," said he, compressing his lips.

"I believe that Vivian and I could—but no! I won't go so far as to say that either. There is something genuine about her. Strange to say, I have never disliked her."

"If you had made the slightest effort to like us, no doubt we could have—"

"My dear Mr. Wrandall," she interrupted quickly, "I credit you with the desire to be fair and just to me. You have tried to like me. You have even deceived yourself at times. I—but why these gentle recriminations? We merely prolong an unfortunate contest between antagonistic natures, with no hope of genuine peace being established. I do not regret that I am your daughter-in-law, nor do I believe that you would regret it if I had not been the daughter of Sebastian Gooch."

"Your father was as little impressed with my son as I was with his daughter," said Redmond Wrandall drily. "I am forced to confess that he was the better judge. We had the better of the bargain."

"I believe you mean it, Mr. Wrandall," she said, a note of gratitude in her voice. "Good-bye. Mr. Carroll will see you tomorrow." She glanced quickly about the room. "I shall send for—for certain articles that are no longer required in conducting the business of Wrandall & Co."

With a quaint little smile, she indicated the two photographs of herself.

"By Jove, Sara," burst out Leslie abruptly. "I wish you'd let me have that Gipsy Mab picture. I've always been dotty over it, don't you know. Ripping study."

Her lip curled slightly.

"As a matter of fact," he explained conclusively, "Chal often said he'd leave it to me when he died. In a joking way, of course, but I'm sure he meant it."

"You may have it, Leslie," she said slowly. It is doubtful if he correctly interpreted the movement of her head as she uttered the words.

"Thanks," said he. "I'll hang it in my den, if you don't object."

"We shall expect Mr. Carroll tomorrow, Sara," said his father, with an air of finality. "Good-bye. May I ask what plans you are making for the winter?"

"They are very indefinite."

"I say, Sara, why don't you get married?" asked Leslie, surveying the Gipsy Mab photograph with undisguised admiration as he held it at arm's length. "Ripping!" This to the picture.

She paused near the door to stare at him for a moment, unutterable scorn in her eyes.

"I've had a notion you were pretty keen about Brandy Booth," he went on amiably.

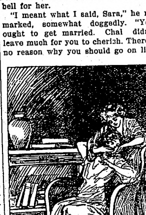
She caught her breath. There was an instant's hesitation on her part before she replied.

"You have never been very smart at making love guesses, Leslie," she said. "It's a trick you haven't acquired."

He laughed uncomfortably. "Neat stroke, that."

Following her into the corridor outside the offices, he pushed the elevator bell for her.

"I meant what I said, Sara," he remarked, somewhat doggedly. "You ought to get married. Chal didn't leave much for you to cherish. There's no reason why you should go on like this, living alone and all that sort of thing. You're young and beautiful and—"



"Because I Love You So Dearly," Said Sara.

"Oh, thank you, Leslie," she cried out sharply.

"You see, it's going to be this way: Hetty will probably marry Booth. That's on dit, I take it. You're depending on her for companionship. Well, she'll quit you cold after she's married. She will—"

She interrupted him peremptorily.

"If Challis did nothing else for me, Leslie, he at least gave me you to cherish. Once more, good-bye."

The elevator stopped for her. He strolled back to his office with a puzzled frown on his face. She certainly was inexplicable!

The angry red faded from her cheeks as she sped homeward in the automobile. Her thoughts were no longer of Leslie but of another . . . She sighed and closed her eyes, and her cheeks were pale.

Workmen from a picture dealer's establishment were engaged in hanging a full length portrait in the long living-room of her apartment when she reached home. She had sent to the country for Booth's picture of Hetty, and was having it hung in a conspicuous place.

Passing the open library door, Sara paused for an instant to peer within. Then she went on down the hall to her own sitting-room. The canary was singing glibly in his cage by the window-side.

She threw aside her furs, and, without removing her hat, passed into the bed-chamber at the left of the cozy little boudoir. This was Hetty's room. Her own was directly opposite. On the girl's dressing-table, leaning against the broad, low mirror, stood the unframed photograph of a man. With a furtive glance over her shoulder, Sara crossed to the table and took up the picture in her gloved hand. For a long time she stood there gazing into the frank, good-looking face of Brandon Booth. She breathed faster; her hand shook; her eyes were strained as if by an inward suggestion of pain.

She shook her head slowly, as if in final renunciation of a secret hope or the banishment of an unwelcome desire, and resolutely replaced the photograph. Her lips were almost white as she turned away and re-entered the room beyond.

"He belongs to her," she said, unconsciously speaking aloud; "and he is like all men. She must not be unhappy."

Presently she entered the library. She had exchanged her tailor-suit for a dainty house-gown. Hetty was still seated in the big lounging chair, before the snapping fire, apparently not having moved since she looked in on passing a quarter of an hour before. One of the girl's legs was curled up under her, the other swung loose; an elbow rested on the arm of the chair, and her cheek was in her hand.

Coming softly up from behind, Sara leaned over the back of the chair and put her hands under her friend's chin, tenderly, lovingly. Hetty started and shivered.

"Oh, Sara, how cold your hands are!"

She grasped them in her own and fondly stroked them, as if to restore warmth to the long, slim fingers which gave the lie to Mrs. Coburn's declarations.

"I've been thinking all morning of what you and Brandon proposed to me last night," said Sara, looking straight over the girl's head, the dark, languorous, mysterious glow filling her eyes. "It is good of you both to want me, but—"

"Now don't say 'but,' Sara," cried Hetty. "We mean it, and you must let us have our way."

"It would be splendid to be near you all the time, dear; it would be wonderful to live with you as you so generously propose, but I cannot do it. I must decline."

"And may I ask why you decline to live with me?" demanded Hetty resentfully.

"Because I love you so dearly," said Sara.

THE END.

Pigeon Makes 700-Mile Trip.

Thirteen-year-old Marion Olram of Goldfield, Nev., is in her new San Francisco home today, and so is Dizzy, according to a dispatch to the New York Sun.

Dizzy is not a homer, but for an ordinary pigeon it has an acute traveling sense. It followed its little mistress all the 700 miles by train from Goldfield to San Francisco, and then to her home here. Marion kissed Dizzy good-by at Goldfield and then wept. She looked out of the car window—and there was Dizzy. She took it in, kissed it again and tossed it out once more.

But the pigeon wouldn't go back. When the Olrams got on the ferry at Oakland, across the bay from San Francisco, Dizzy alighted on the girl's arm.

Island Paradise of Birds.

On one little island in Gatun lake, formerly known as Lion Hill, before the impounded waters of the Chagres river isolated it from the rest of the Canal Zone, are more species of birds than in any one locality in the western hemisphere. E. A. Goldman of the biological survey, department of agriculture, in two short collecting trips to Panama has procured about 300 different species, and it is estimated that a larger variety is to be found within the limits of the Canal Zone than in any one state in the United States—about 900.

In the neighborhood of Gatun, at the Atlantic entrance of the Canal Zone, no less than 250 species have been found.

Good Ones.

"Do you want me to misrepresent the goods and say they are fine when they are not?" asked the new salesman.

"Yes," sternly answered the unscrupulous dealer. "Always remember that our assets are your lie-abilities."

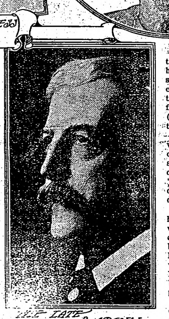
PRINCE OSCAR'S MORGANATIC MATCH

COUNTESS VON BASSEWITZ

PRINCE OSCAR

THE DUCHESS of FIFE

QUEEN MARY



THE LATE DUKE of ARGYLL

EMPEROR WILLIAM highly pleased the democratic element which is anxious he should make it possible for them to remain loyal to him, by his gracious consent to the morganatic marriage of Prince Oscar, his fifth son, and the sprightly Countess Ina von Bassewitz-Levitzow, the empress' maid of honor.

Indeed the recent history of European royalty would lead to the belief that the mysterious theory of "equal birth" is rapidly breaking down. Since beautiful Princess Sophia of Saxe-Weimar killed herself because she was restrained from wedding a simple nobleman the disintegrating tendency has been still stronger.

Probably the greatest single factor in breaking down the walls of Hohenzollern tradition of exclusiveness is the curious position of Queen Mary of England.

She is the granddaughter of a German morganatic marriage. Her grandfather, son of Duke Alexander of Wurtemburg, renounced his royal rank to contract a morganatic union with the Polish Countess Claudine von Rhedy. He was then created prince and duke of Teck.

So the Tecks do not belong to the "higher nobility" of Germany. This class includes only those who hold the title under the holy Roman empire. If Princess Mary of Teck had remained in Germany she could only have been the morganatic wife of even the youngest son of a reigning German family.

Indeed, her marriage with a member of a family which had once reigned, but long ago lost its possessions, would have been morganatic.

By this quaint theory of "equal birth," a marquis or even a duke may not have the "equal birth" of a plain count, supposing the count family is in the musty old list of the holy Roman empire and the duke and marquis are not.

The inconsistency of the "equal birth" theory was once admitted with much sang froid by Kaiser Friedrich, father of the present emperor, according to an anecdote widely quoted. A country gentleman of the lowest rank was discussing families with Friedrich and finally exclaimed: "I can't say I understand all these rules, but I claim my family is quite as good as the Hohenzollerns!"

"Very true," quoth the kaiser, "but the Hohenzollerns have got on faster!"

Perhaps the better standing of "unequal marriages" is to be attributed to the almost uniform felicity of such matches. Two non-royal marriages in the English reigning family, that of Queen Victoria's daughter Louise to the late duke of Argyll and of King George's sister Louise to the duke of Fife, turned out most auspicious to the parties directly involved and at the same time did much to build up the present good feeling between the English rulers and their people.

In Germany Frederick William II, king of Prussia from 1744 to 1797, bought off his royal wife to agree to a separation so he could morganatically marry Fraulein von Voss, a maid of honor to his daughter, Princess Frederick. Saying it was simply a matter of state, the king's father-in-law, the old duke of Brunswick, actually arranged the separation of his royal daughter and the morganatic marriage with her rival. There was little romance about this transaction, but the king proved happier with his morganatic wife than he had been with his mate of "equal birth."

So eager was Prince Constance of Hohenzollern to marry morganatically the daughter of Baron Schenk that he abdicated the governorship of the principality of Hohenzollern in 1850 in favor of the king of Prussia. The king graciously created the bride-to-be countess of Rothenberg and "they lived happily ever afterward."

The same year Prince Adalbert of Prussia, for whom the present kaiser's third son is named, made a morganatic match with the famous German dancer, Theresa Elsser, who had been created baroness of Barnim.

Then there is the famous struggle of Duke George II of Saxe-Meiningen to secure recognition for his wife, who was Ellen Franz, a popular Shakespearean actress. She was the daughter of an Englishwoman and a Naumberg schoolmaster. On their wedding day in 1875 or immediately thereafter, every one of the court dignitaries and all the ministers of state resigned. All sorts of downright insults were heaped upon the heads of the talented woman until her tormentors received the well-deserved title, "souls of lackeys." The colonel of a Prussian regiment stationed in Meiningen forbade his officers to greet the wife of the duke (now a baroness) when she passed them. The Hohenzollerns ignored her.

By a curious coincidence on the day when his son publicly announced his coming morganatic marriage the kaiser for the first time sent a message of friendly greeting to the wife of his "cousin of Saxe-Meiningen," who that day attained her seventy-fifth birthday.

But while the Bassewitzes never have had the privilege of "equal birth" with royalty, they have held the honor of knighthood as far back as they can be traced. It is to be noted that the Bassewitzes were knights in the days when the ancestors of the Princess Fugger was a master weaver in Augsberg. Yet the Fuggers now have the privilege of "ebenburtigkeit!"

The countess captivated the hearts of all Germans who have met her, as well as the members of the royal family, by her sparkling wit and by her excellent singing voice.

"After Wilhelm heard her sing he could not resist her," is the saying with regard to the removal of the kaiser's opposition. She is not strikingly beautiful, but her pleasing appearance has made her a brilliant star in the stodgy court of the German empress. All the other women attached to the empress' service have been in her service since the early days of her marriage and either are, or are old enough to be grandmothers.

The countess' best friend in her love affair has been the Crown Princess Cecilie, whose brother is the grand duke of Meklenburg, of which the countess' father is minister of state. Coming from the same place to Berlin, and with the same vivacity, good looks and pleasure in pretty clothes and piquant society, they naturally formed an alliance against the stiff and conventional surroundings.

The day after the marriage of Prince Oscar and Countess Ina the royal bridegroom will confer a settlement upon his wife. This is the "morgengabe" (morning gift), from which the term "morganatic" comes.

The marriage ceremony differs from the usual custom in that the bride joins her right hand to the bridegroom's left hand (a token of their unequal birth) and for this she cannot inherit the estates of her husband or receive his royal name.

Hence the day after the marriage he bestows a new title upon her, according to the arrangements of the state, and a financial settlement.

This morganatic marriage is considered as founding an entirely new family. The kaiser will grant the family a new name and Prince Oscar will be paid a lump sum instead of his princely allowance.

Morganatic marriages have from time to time been attacked as equivalent to concubinage.

This is a mistake, for the whole system of morganatic marriages has been built up by the Protestant church to preserve the purity of the marriage relation and at the same time preserve the sanctity of royalty.

The royal bridegroom cannot marry again in the lifetime of his morganatic wife unless she is regularly divorced.

The children take the title and rank of the mother, but they invariably obtain high office and rich emoluments from the royal family when they are grown and, as in the case of the Tecks, frequently marry into royalty.

AT THE CONCERT.

"Mother, why do they play some of the music so low and the other so loud?"

"So that the people who are hard of hearing can get their money's worth."

WHERE EMERALDS COME FROM

Where do they come from—those flashing stones of pure pellucid green that often form the central setting of beauty's choicest gems? Diamonds form but satellites when that rarest of jewels, a perfect emerald, flashes its fire or lends its sheen to the jewel-incrusted crown of royalty. Its birth is hidden in the mystery of nature's alchemy, but its beauty and charm have been recognized from the very dawn of history.

Emeralds flashed on the shield of Aaron; the Ptolemies of Egypt treasured them, and their lapidaries knew the art of engraving on their hard surfaces the mystic symbols of their ancient faith; the Theban tombs revealed choice emeralds among their long-buried treasures, while Herculaneum and Pompeii have added their quota to the greed of modern excavators. Nero, that half-mad monster who once ruled the destinies of Rome, used an enormous emerald for a monocle, and in the filmy fabric of the gowns of Cleopatra emeralds shone in verdant luster.

Mt. Zabarah, in Upper Egypt, is said to have been the source of many of these ancient gems, but centuries have passed since these prolific mines were exhausted, and modern jewelers must now depend upon the western hemisphere for their supply.

In the spoils Pizarro sent to Spain were found the first fine specimens of American emeralds, and thus was revealed another source of the manifold wealth of the new world. Perhaps the most valuable single emerald found in modern times is the one in that famous collection of gems owned by the duke of Devonshire.

It is said to be a perfect hexagonal crystal, weighing eight ounces and 18 pennyweights, and two inches long. It came from the mines of Colombia, and it is this South American republic that furnishes the greatest supply of fine emeralds known to the world today.

Not that Colombia is the only country that has emerald mines. Ecuador and Peru have contributed their share to the world's supply, and in the former country the city of Esmeraldas (Spanish for emeralds) takes its name from the precious stones found in the vicinity. Among the Aztec treasures of Mexico were found emeralds as fine as those of the Peruvian Incas, and it is reported that Cortez was offered 40,000 ducats for one of the gems he gathered from the hoard of Montezuma.

In some areas of the United States limited quantities of the precious stones are found, but the gems of greatest beauty and value are to be had from the Muzo and Cosquez deposits near Bogota, the capital of Colombia.

ENTERPRISING.

"You want my consent to marry my daughter?" said Mr. Cumrox.

"I do," replied the young man.

"But my daughter says she wouldn't think of marrying you."

"Still your consent would be a good recommendation for me with some other family."

NO CHEAP GIRL.

"I'll bring you a box of candy the next time I call," he said.

"But there are so many kinds of candy," replied the sweet young thing.

"What kind would you like?"

"The dollar kind."

WHAT MAKES GOOD HOSTESS

Ability to Entertain Lavishly Is a Very Small Part of Her Qualifications.

A talent for originality is not sufficient to make a good hostess—that goes without saying. It is not the mountebank who wins the genuine praise of the initiated, but the real wit who has the gift of magnetism—that is, of sympathy with what is human and lasting—and can touch the heart of an audience. Is it not the drama that can move to tears that remains on the boards the longest? And is it not the woman who loves her kind who keeps their affection, who draws people to her whether she is rich in this world's goods or fortune turns its back and leaves her little resource beyond her delightful personality?

Mme. Recamier received her friends with the same grace in her shabby, brick-floored little room—all that reverses allowed her—as when she had queened it in her almost royal mansion in the Faubourg Saint-Germaine. Nor did they gather less eagerly there than in her beautiful home, because she retained in her poverty the same charm, the same qualities that had made her the most sought woman in Paris.

The essential thing to successful entertaining is that instinctive knowledge of and sympathy with human nature which enables one to put people at their ease and make them happy.—From "Novel Ways of Entertaining," by Florence Hall Winterburn.

Makes Trouble for Berlin.

The father of unrest, as Bal Gangadhar Tilak, a Chitpavan Brahman, and at one time a member of the Bombay Legislative council, has been styled, has lately been released from prison. In 1908 he was prosecuted on a charge of seditious incitement in connection with articles in the Kesari, a newspaper owned and conducted by himself. This was just after the Muzafferpur outrage, when two English ladies were killed by the explosion of a bomb, and in the articles which formed the basis of the charge assassination by such means was spoken of with approval. A high court jury found Tilak guilty and he was sentenced by Mr. Justice Davur to six years' transportation. In view of his age and health this was commuted to simple imprisonment at Mandalay.

No Help for It.

At one of the New York restaurants a willowy cabaret young person was doing the latest steps. The room was crowded, and most of the patrons stood in order to get a better view. One old gentleman, a Kentuckian, remained in his chair, playing idly with his glass, though the other members of his party were on tip-toe with interest. Finally one of them, a young girl, caught the old gentleman's sleeve and pulled it impatiently.

"Oh, come on, major!" she said. "Be modern!"

PRIZE FOOD.
Palatable, Economical, Nourishing.

A Nebr. woman has outlined the prize food in a few words, and that from personal experience. She writes:

"After our long experience with Grape-Nuts, I cannot say enough in its favor. We have used this food almost continually for seven years.

"We sometimes tried other advertised breakfast foods but we invariably returned to Grape-Nuts as the most palatable, economical and nourishing of all.

"When I quit tea and coffee and began to use Postum and Grape-Nuts, I was almost a nervous wreck. I was so irritable I could not sleep nights, had no interest in life.

"After using Grape-Nuts a short time I began to improve and all these ailments have disappeared and now I am a well woman. My two children have been almost raised on Grape-Nuts, which they eat three times a day.

"They are pictures of health and have never had the least symptom of stomach trouble, even through the most severe siege of whooping cough they could retain Grape-Nuts when all else failed.

"Grape-Nuts food has saved doctor bills, and has been, therefore, a most economical food for us."

Hero of War of 1812.

One hundred years ago Capt. David Porter, one of the naval heroes of the War of 1812, was given a great popular ovation by the people of Philadelphia. Ten days previously Captain Porter had reached New York after a long and hazardous voyage from Volparaiso, where on March 28, he had commanded the frigate Essex in her gallant, but unsuccessful fight against the British ships Phoebe and Cherub. Upon their arrival in New York, the surviving officers and members of the crew of the Essex were given an enthusiastic welcome. From New York, Captain Porter proceeded to Philadelphia, where another popular ovation awaited him. On his arrival in the suburbs of the city the horses were taken from his carriage and it was drawn to the hotel by the populace.

"Oh, mamma," she wailed, "you've spoilt everything! You never kiss the man in the real store."

Human Documents of Married Life

By Virginia T. Van de Water

Intimate and Human, Intensely Alive, Each Story Presenting a Problem Which Might Occur to Any One of Us at Any Time

WHY I LEFT MY WIFE

I can say truthfully that Doris and I loved each other when we married. Heaven knows there was no need for either of us to marry if we did not want to. Doris could have had any one of several eligibles whom she kept dangling after her—never quite refusing a man until he insisted upon her taking him or leaving him; while I was very well satisfied with my life as a bachelor physician with enough money to keep me comfortable until I made a success of my practice. And, as to him that hath is usually given, so, as I was not dependent for bread and butter upon the practise of medicine, I was soon earning enough from my profession to put jam on my bread and to buy the "gilt-edged" quality of butter. To drop the metaphor, I had a handsomely furnished office, and lived with my mother. I spent many evenings at my club, and had a goodly number of friends. Altogether, my life was a comfortable one in every way—until I fell in love. Then I thought I could never be happy until Doris married me. Perhaps I would not have been. Who knows?

I do not mean to be frivolous; but in contemplating the follies in one's life one must laugh—or curse.

All married people have their little squabbles, their little differences of opinion, I suppose, and I regarded the arguments and disputes that my wife and I had as part and parcel of every wedded life. For the first year or two we were very well satisfied with each other, and with our new surroundings.

As a physician I had, of course, a right and a duty to keep professional business to myself, but as I did not mention this fact to Doris until an issue was raised, she did not know how much or how little I told her of my private affairs. When we had been married about eighteen months, however, I had occasion to express my views upon the subject. A patient sent me a letter which came when I was out. This patient chanced also to be a friend of my wife, and when Doris saw her hand-writing on the envelope she jumped to the conclusion that the writer had made a mistake and that the letter was meant for her. So she opened it. In doing this she did not tear the envelope, as the flap did not adhere tightly, and came unfastened easily, without marring the paper. When Doris had read the letter, which was a request that I call, professionally, the following evening, she simply touched the envelope-flap with a drop of mucilage, and closed it, putting the letter with other mail on my office table. Naturally I did not mention the matter of her friend's indisposition to Doris. In fact, I knew that the patient was averse to having anyone know of it. So when, at dinner the next evening, Doris remarked, "I suppose you are going over to the Clarksons' tonight?" I started slightly, then recovered myself.

"Ah! Mrs. Clarkson told you she had sent for me, did she?" I commented.

My wife smiled and said nothing. Later when I referred to the matter in talking to Mrs. Clarkson, saying that, of course, I had not felt at liberty to mention her illness to my wife until I learned that she had heard of it from the patient herself, I was informed that I was mistaken, and that nobody but the patient and her husband knew that she was not perfectly well.

Suspecting that my wife had opened my mail, I reproached her with having done so. She reminded me that, not knowing I was the Clarksons' physician, it was quite natural that she should have made the mistake thinking that the letter addressed in her friend's handwriting was meant for her, and that the "Dr." on the envelope had been written in error.

"Why didn't you tell me what you had done?" I demanded sharply.

She tossed her head. "Well, if you must know, because I was afraid you would scold—as you are doing now. You see, I was right in my fears."

A week later I chanced to see lying at my wife's plate one morning a letter addressed to her in the handwriting of a man whom I knew, and who was an occasional caller at our home. I supposed that when Doris came down to breakfast she would explain the letter to me. Instead, she opened it, glanced over it, refolded it, returned it to its envelope, and opened and read the rest of her correspondence. As I was leaving the house, she remarked carelessly:

"Shall you be at home to luncheon?"

I replied that I expected to be. "Why?" I asked.

"Katie will take care of you," she informed me, "for I shall not be in."

"Ah!" I said, "I did not know that you had anything on hand for this morning."

"I am lunching down-town with a friend," she replied briefly.

The next day one of my patients mentioned, carelessly and innocently, that she had seen my "pretty wife lunching with Mr. Moore yesterday." I did not betray my surprise, but when I reached home I asked Doris why she had gone to luncheon with a man without asking my permission. She looked at me with a triumphant half-smile.

"And do you ask my permission before you make appointments with women?" she queried sarcastically.

I strove to speak calmly. "Do try to be sensible, Doris! You know that professional engagements are very different from social affairs."

I did not ask her not to go to luncheon again with men, for I was sure that if I did she would go when she chose, only would say nothing to me about it.

My wife and my mother were never intimate. I am sure that my mother tried to think of Doris as a daughter, but they had little in common, except their love for me—and that is not often a bond of union between a man's wife and his mother.

Of course I went to see my mother whenever I could, and soon I learned not to mention many of these calls, for Doris had a nagging way of objecting to them. Each afternoon, after my round visits, as I returned toward home, I would glance at my watch as I neared my mother's house, and if I had time I would run in and chat for a while. A week after the conversation just recorded I was warming my chilled hands at my mother's cheery grate-fire when the telephone in her hall rang sharply. I was wanted on the wire.

It was my wife who was speaking. She had reached home ten minutes before, expecting to find me there, as my office hours had already begun. The maid had told her that I had been called up three times by one person, as I was wanted on an urgent case.

"It just occurred to me," added Doris, "that perhaps you were at your mother's, although I could hardly believe it, as you called there only yesterday afternoon."

Perhaps the fact that the telephone was between us made it easier for me to say, "I am here many afternoons."

That evening, over our coffee, she remarked:

"Tom, I wish you would pay more attention to business."

I looked my amazement.

"Yes," she continued, "I do! This afternoon you might have missed a good big consultation fee just by stopping to see your mother."

"There are some things I care more for than money," I remarked illogically.

"I know it!" she exclaimed. "And I think it's pretty hard on me that you do not earn all the money that you might. Don't you suppose that I would like to have the things that rich doctor's wives have?"

I set down my cup and gazed at her incredulously.

"Oh, yes," she went on, "I mean what I say! You think just because I don't speak of such things that I never wish I had a motor car, and trained servants, and a private house, and lots of handsome clothes! I tell you, Tom, those are the things that make life worth while."

"And is not your life worth while?" I asked.

"Of course you think it is because I am married to you!" she burst forth. "But what have I? An apartment, when I want a house; two servants, when I want a half-dozen—as other women have; a trolley car or a taxicab to ride in, when I want my own motor; one new dress where I really need a half-dozen!"

"Perhaps," I said coldly, "you may some day have all these things, but it will not be until I am an older man. If you loved me you would be willing to wait and be patient."

I pushed my chair back and left the table. I simply did not dare remain longer in the room with my wife. My temper is quick and hot, and the only way in which I can control it is to get away alone with it. I had had time to become calm when, an hour later, Doris opened the door of the library where I sat reading.

"Dear Tom," she said softly, "I was very horrid, and cross, and piggy tonight, and I am sorry. Won't you please forgive me? For I love you, Tom, and even if you were as poor as—a newspaper man"—with a gurgling laugh—"I would love you just as much as I do now."

I gathered her into my arms and kissed her.

She perched contentedly on my knee and talked, running her fingers through my hair. "Really, Tom, I think one thing that makes me so horrid and fretful is because I am worried. I need some new clothes dreadfully."

"Many of them?" I asked, remembering sundry obligations I must meet the first of the month.

"Well, several," she laughed. "And now that I am trying to be good I think I ought to make a confession to you, Tom."

"Go ahead!" I said.

"Well, I really need a new street-dress and a reception-gown, and, besides that, an evening gown, but I did not want to bother you about all this when you have so much on your mind, so I just ordered one of them—the reception-gown—without saying anything to you about it. It is made so handsomely that it will do for an evening gown, too, except upon very swell occasions. And, Tom, it is really a beauty!"

"Well, dear," I said gently, "your old husband is not so poor that he can't pay for a really pretty dress for you, especially when you have come to him of your own accord and 'fessed up' your extravagance."

The above episode was still fresh in my mind when, a few evenings later, as I was starting out to attend a dinner of my medical club, I knocked at the door of my wife's room to bid her good-by. Before she could reply I turned the knob and entered. She stood, fully dressed, before her long mirror, surveying herself approvingly. She wore a costume which I had never seen before, a gorgeous affair, cut low in the neck, and with filmy lace veiling the upper part of her shapely arms.

"My new reception-gown, the one I told you of," she said in reply to my inquiring look.

"Oh, are you going out this evening?" I asked, in surprise.

"No. I've invited a friend to dinner," she replied hastily, as she hurried from the room to give her maid some forgotten directions. She was gone before I could ask for further particulars, and she lingered so long in the kitchen or dining room that I could not wait until her return without being late for my engagement. As I stepped from the elevator of our apartment house I came face to face with Richard Clarkson, the husband of the patient whom I have already mentioned. A vague wonder crossed my mind as I nodded to him as to whom he was going to visit in our building. He wore, I also noted, his evening clothes. Then the matter passed from my mind.

Nor did I think of it again until I stepped into my wife's room when I came home at twelve o'clock that night. She lay in bed, propped among her pillows; the electric bulb above her threw a strong light upon the French novel she was reading and upon her unnaturally flushed face. She had been eating marrons glaces from a huge box of these sweetmeats that stood on the table by her bed. Glancing at them, I remembered that they cost a dollar and a half a pound, and noted that the box before me must hold easily four pounds.

"Who has been spreading chestnuts at your feet in lieu of roses?" I asked teasingly, thinking, first of all, of one or two women friends who had an abundance of money and were fond of humoring my wife's love for sweets.

"Oh, a friend of mine," she said lightly, and straightway began asking me about what kind of an evening I had had, who was at the dinner, etc. It was not until I rose from the easy chair into which I had thrown myself that it occurred to me to inquire.

"By the way, who dined with you tonight?"

For a moment she hesitated, then made an effort and said frankly, "Mr. Clarkson."

"Clarkson!" I gasped.

"Pray, why not?" asked my wife defiantly.

"But how does he happen to dine with you, and how do you happen to let him, a married man, dine alone with you?"

Her face hardened. "And how," she asked, imitating my manner, "do you happen to dine with Mrs. Clarkson, and how does she, a married woman, happen to let you dine alone with her?"

"Don't be a fool!" I exclaimed. "I should think that even you, with your shallow comprehension, would see, when I have explained it to you dozens of times, that there is a difference between a physician accepting an invitation to remain to dinner at a house at which he is calling and his wife deliberately asking a married man to dine with her when she knows her husband is going to be out until nearly midnight! Did he bring you these bonbons?" I asked suspiciously, as my eyes rested for a moment on the box beside her.

"Yes."

I stood looking down at her. The white light over her bed showed me that, although when angry or frightened Doris usually became pale, the vivid rose in her cheks had not faded. Before she could suspect my intention I turned quickly to her dressing table, poured some violet toilet water upon my handkerchief, and, as quickly, bent over my wife and wiped her cheek with it. The handkerchief was stained with pink. I showed it to her and sneered:

"Painting, eh? I suppose that the complexion you wear for your husband is not quite strong and vivid enough for one of your men friends? How long since you adopted the 'making-up' business?"

She sat up in bed, her eyes flashing. "You are rude and unjust!" she exclaimed. "How long is it since you qualified as a censor of morals?"

My anger left me as suddenly as it had come. I sat on the side of the bed and tried to make the excited woman listen to reason. "Child," I said, "are you miserable, really, or are you only angry when you say these things? I want you to be happy, and I do not want to be hard upon you." I saw that she was listening, and I, continued, "I give you all that I can afford to give you. I wish I could let you have everything that money can buy; but, you see, I am not a rich man."

"There are other things that money won't buy that you might give me, and don't!" she exclaimed.

"What do you mean?"

"That you can always find time to go to your medical club, and to see your mother, and to go here, there, and everywhere, while I must amuse myself. You know as well as I do that I want you to make as many calls as you can, for they mean business. But there are lots of other places you go, and, I warrant, have a good time, too, while I can stay at home, and then get scolded if I have a nice man friend here to dinner."

It was useless to try to make her understand.

All during that winter Mrs. Clarkson suffered with a nervous trouble that made it necessary for her to consult me often. One of the exciting causes of her condition, I shrewdly suspected, was the fact that she and her husband were growing steadily apart. Perhaps he did not understand a woman of her sensitive nature, perhaps her mercurial temperament irritated him, for he was calm and unimaginative. All doctors know his type—the well, strong, robust man who is angered by tears and exasperated by a woman's nervous fancies. Once or twice I had attempted to make him see that his wife's health was in danger, but as long as she was up and about he attributed her depression and excitability to "whims." When her nervous attacks would threaten her, the sufferer would send for me to give her some quieting prescription or to reason her out of the "horrors" that were symptomatic of her nervous condition. She was very young, and I was heartily sorry for her. She had no relative in our large city, and was too proud to take ordinary friends into her confidence. Some one—possibly Clarkson himself—mentioned to my wife that this one of my patients was very dependent upon me. Of course Doris spoke to me of it.

"To my way of thinking," she said, "a popular young physician should be very careful not to get himself talked about."

"If people are looking for evil they will find it everywhere," I affirmed. "And the physician in the discharge of his duties should be above the fear of such gossip."

Her lips quivered, and, seeing that she was unhappy, I explained to her the situation as dispassionately and fully as I could.

"You know, Doris," I assured her, "that I am always, and everywhere, faithful to you."

That she doubted me to the extent of watching me was proved one day when I came suddenly upon her reading a letter which I had left, inadvertently, upon the hall table. She started and tried to conceal her action.

"What are you doing?" I demanded.

"I found this letter here, on the hall table, instead of on your desk where you usually leave your mail, and I though you had left it here for me to read, but as soon as I began it I saw my mistake, and did not read more than the first line," she said, avoiding my eyes.

I knew that she lied, but a man does not tell his wife a truth of that kind—unless he is very angry.

When I was alone, I glanced again over the letter. It was from Mrs. Clarkson, saying that she was worried about a matter that concerned her closely, and would call at my office at six o'clock that evening.

By the time she came the fact that Doris must know of the appointment had slipped from my mind, but away down in my inner consciousness was a feeling of resentment that she had read my letter. Man is a complex being, and it may be that the contrast between her scheming and uncandid ways and the frank, open manner of my patient made me especially gentle to the latter when she called. She had come to confide to me that she felt she must get away from town for a while, and to ask me to suggest to her a quiet resort. We talked the matter over, and she had risen to leave when she said:

"I hate to go on a journey alone, yet my husband has not the time to accompany me, even if he wanted to. Then, too, he thinks me so silly, as I suppose I am. He can't comprehend why I have such foolish notions, and I try to control them; but, oh, I get so frightened!"

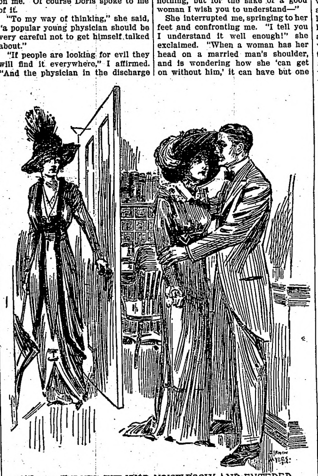
"Poor child!" I said, "you poor girl!"

She dropped her head on my shoulder with a sob. She seemed so young and so helpless that, instinctively, I laid my hand on her bowed head.

"I know it is hard, dear," I whispered. "I know all about it."

"Yes," she sobbed. "Thank God you do! If I go away, how shall I get on without you!"

A rustle at the door made me look up. My wife stood there. She had turned the knob noiselessly and entered the room. Before I could speak she was gone.



SHE HAD TURNED THE KNOB NOISELESSLY AND ENTERED

When the last patient for that evening had left my office my wife asked me if she might see me alone. Her manner was cold, her eyes hard. She sat down in my desk chair, and I stood in front of her. I was angry; so was she. I waited for her to speak.

"Tom," she began, "I wish to say to you that you will have to carry on—affairs—such as you have with Mrs. Clarkson somewhere else than in your own home. You know that I saw what took place this evening."

I held my temper in check, as I asked, "Do you think that scene requires an explanation?"

"No! Anyone can understand a scene like that, unless he has a purer mind than most people."

"Than you have, you mean?" I asked bitterly.

She flushed hotly, but went on, "As long as I am your wife I will not be insulted by having these things happen where the servants may come in upon them."

I tried to speak calmly. "You are laboring under a misapprehension, Doris. On my own account I care nothing, but for the sake of a good woman I wish you to understand—"

She interrupted me, springing to her feet and confronting me. "I tell you I understand it well enough!" she exclaimed. "When a woman has her head on a married man's shoulder, and is wondering how she 'can get on without him,' it can have but one meaning. And I will not stand it. Oh, I am no fool! I know what such scenes mean!"

I clenched my hands to keep from touching her. Even in my rage I remembered that she was a woman, and my wife. "You ought to know what such scenes mean!" I retorted. "Since you make demands, so shall I. I have made them before, however, without enforcing them. Now I repeat that you are to accept no more favors from Jack Moore. Do you hear? Don't you suppose your maids gossip about that affair? Don't you suppose that one or the other of them saw, as I did, his card lying on your dressing table with the box that had contained the orchids he sent you? Moreover—listen to me!—Moore has a reputation that ought to keep a decent woman from wanting to speak to him, much less accept his favors."

She looked at me for a moment, wide eyed, then burst into tears. "That is the way with you men!" she exclaimed. "You can do as you please! But we women must not take a step outside of the narrow path you, our owners, mark out for us! I won't believe anything against Jack Moore. He is my friend, and I like him. You are jealous, that's all!"

"You have heard what I said!" I warned her. "See that you do as I tell you in this matter!"

"I'll do as I like!" she flashed out vehemently. "You do!"

"For God's sake," I exclaimed "shut up!"

She caught her breath and gazed at me aghast.

"Yes!" I went on, my voice breaking shrilly in spite of all my efforts to steady it. "I mean it! Are you trying to drive me insane? I tell you I can't stand much more of this damnable nagging! And I won't stand it!"

Again she gasped, but I continued:

"Listen to me! You misunderstood entirely and, I believe, wilfully, the scene between Mrs. Clarkson and me. If you hadn't been dishonorable enough to read my letter you wouldn't have been here eavesdropping. But since you were, I have the right to tell you that I don't lie to you and that I'm innocent. I declare it on my honor! You can believe it or not, as you like!"

She was standing near the door, watching me, startled, but, at these words, she threw back her head and laughed harshly. "As you make the assertion on your honor, I do not believe it!" And she was gone.

I slammed the door behind her, locked it, buried my face in my hands and, to my own horror, burst into hysterical sobs.

I had expected to go to my club that evening, and had told my wife so earlier in the day, adding that I would not get home before midnight. After the scene through which I had just passed I was too much shaken, my nerves were too raw, for me to want to chat with a crowd of men, and I went instead to spend a couple of quiet, restful hours with my mother. I told her nothing of what had happened, but her very presence calmed me. Leaving her at ten o'clock, I came home and let myself into the apartment noiselessly, supposing that Doris had gone to her room and, possibly, to sleep. With no other thought in mind, I pushed open the door of a little room which we called "the den." As I entered, I saw that the room was lighted only by the glow from the grate-fire. At right angles to the fireplace was a couch heaped with cushions. Seated on this, leaning back among the cushions, was my wife. She wore a new evening gown, and, even in that moment, I remembered with a sensation akin to ironical amusement that only today I had sent her dressmaker a check for it. Bending over her, and gazing down at her, was Jack Moore. His hand held hers, and she smiled up into his face. The look in his eyes made me want to kill him. I stepped forward and touched an electric button, flooding the room with light. In a glance, I saw on the table by the couch two glasses, siphon, and a bottle half full of Scotch whiskey. Before I could collect my wits, Moore laughed lightly.

"I was just saying good night to this fair lady," he said, relinquishing the hand he pretended to have been shaking. "And now I bid you good night, doctor."

Ignoring his outstretched hand, I strode to the door and flung it wide open, pointing to it with a quivering finger. "Get out of here, you cur!" I exclaimed.

He justified my use of the epithet by obeying silently, and so quickly that in less than thirty seconds I heard the front door close behind him.

Without a word I caught my wife by the arm and dragged her to her feet. As I did so I felt my fingers sink into her flesh. I saw her wince, and I was glad. She gazed at me as if fascinated. I heard myself speaking as though I were another man—all the while holding her firm, cool arm. I told her that this was the end of things between us; that I could no longer endure her and her lies; that she could go her way and I mine; that I would support her, but I would never live with her again—never! She made no protest, only stood there and looked at me with a half-sneer on her lips.

"What have you got to say?" I asked her at last, in a hoarse voice which I scarcely recognized as my own. I let go of her arm and waited for her to speak. She must answer me, I thought, but she was silent.

"What have you got to say?" I repeated, more loudly. Once more I heard my voice rise to a querulous falsetto. My teeth chattered as though I had a hard chill. I gripped my wife by both shoulders, seizing her so tightly that I thought she must cry out that I was hurting her. I hoped she would, as I felt my fingers sink again into her flesh. But this time she did not wince. She looked me straight in the eyes, and her reply slowly and distinctly.

"That you are a cad, and I hate you!" she hissed.

My hands dropped. I saw on her bare shoulders the prints of my strong fingers and the livid dents my nails had made. I watched the finger-marks as they changed from white to angry crimson.

Then I went out of the house, and left her standing there.

Three months after my wife and I had parted, I chanced one Sunday noon to be passing the fashionable church of which Doris had been a member before our marriage. A throng of people were pouring out after the morning service. A whim seized me to enter. Of late years I had attended church but seldom. I remembered that after the service just ended there would be the celebration of the communion, to which only a small part of the congregation would remain. Entering, I went into a pew in a shadowed corner and listened to the service, until, looking up suddenly, I saw Doris passing up the aisle toward the chancel. A wave of regret, compunction and compassion swept over me—a desire to be at peace with her—and, obeying an inexplicable impulse, I followed her up the aisle. As she knelt at the altar-rail, I knelt down beside her. As I did so, she raised her bowed head and glanced at me, then quietly arose, walked down the aisle, and out of the church. Kneeling there, dazed, I remembered that it was at this altar we had been married.

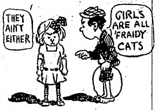
INTERESTING ITEMS FROM THE CITIES

Girl Became a Burglar on Her Brother's Dare

DETROIT, MICH.—Mary is only nine years old, but already there have developed in her little head certain definite ideas regarding feminine rights and privileges. It was these ideas, brought out by a practical demonstration, that landed Mary and her eleven-year-old brother, Frank, in juvenile court the other day.



THEY AIN'T EITHER
GIRLS ARE ALL 'FRAIDY CATS

Mary was playing with her brother and several other boys when they informed her she couldn't play with them, "'cause she's a girl, and girls are 'fraidy cats.'" This hurt Mary, and after dinner she insisted with her brother that she was as good as he was and that she could do anything that he could.

"No, you can't," replied Frank. "I'm going over and rob the house next door. I'm going to be a burglar, but you girls can't be burglars. You've got to stay home."

If girls couldn't be burglars, Mary would have to become a boy, for she insisted that she held the same rights. She hurried into the house and donned her brother's best suit.

"Now I can be a burglar," she told her brother, when she joined him a few minutes later. "And I can be a better burglar than you can. I ain't scared of the policemen. Come on and I'll show you I ain't scared."

Together the two youngsters crawled through the hole in the back fence and sneaked up to the house next door. A window opening into the coal bin in the cellar was found unlocked, and the pair squeezed through the opening, covering themselves from head to foot with coal dust. Clambering up the cellar stairs into the kitchen they found no one in the house, and for the next half hour they busied themselves collecting quantities of jam, cookies, silverware and kitchen utensils.

They toted their booty downstairs to the cellar window and escaped, but the next day the cruel hand of the law scattered all their youthful visions.

Why a Pet "Biddie" Cost Its Owner a $25 Fine

KANSAS CITY, MO.—Sunday. Time to dig in the garden. Emerged from the back door of his home at 1400 Hardesty avenue, Frank J. Letellier, plasterer. Embryo weeds were wafted to weed heaven in short order. Letellier leaned on his hoe to contemplate and admire.

"Peck-peck-peck." He jumped in surprise, then looked down. A scrawny chicken was investigating the soil clinging to his shoe.

"Shoo," commanded Letellier. But the chicken wouldn't shoo.

Letellier looked back through his well-ordered garden. A trail of depredation, scraggly, irregular, leading back to a hole underneath the high board fence separating his from a neighbor's back yard, showed what way the chicken had come. He decided the necessity was for action, not words. So he and the chicken, pursued and pursuer, put action in the film. Then Letellier captured his quarry.

A heave, and the chicken went over the fence.

"Sa-ay," spluttered R. H. Mock, the neighbor, clambering up the fence.

"Keep your chickens at home," said Letellier truculently.

"That's my pet hen. She landed on my face," Mock returned.

Mock dropped back off the fence. He reappeared, clasping an ax, and vaulted over into Letellier's yard. Letellier beat retreat, but the ax was thrown, smiting a belated heel as he vanished through the kitchen door.

In the South side police court Mock was fined $25.

Boy Gets New "Front" to Help in Finding a Job

CHICAGO.—Assistant United States Attorney Stansbury had deferred business long enough to feed some pigeons on the ledge of his office window the other day at the Federal building. He was interrupted by a small boy, who walked into his office unannounced. The boy's clothes were ragged. But his hands and face showed from a recent scrubbing, and his hair was "plastered down."

"I'm John Pine, Mr. Stansbury. I've come to report," he said.

Stansbury remembered that he had prosecuted Johnny Pine two weeks before, after the sixteen-year-old boy's hunger had prompted him to steal a ham from a refrigerator car.

Judge Anderson, in the United States District court, had ordered him to report to Mr. Stansbury on the first Monday of every month.

"You look tired, Johnny. Sit down and tell me all about it," said the lawyer.

"Well, there isn't much," said the boy. "I been huntin' a job, but I didn't have any luck."

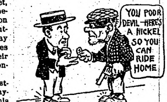
"Maybe it's your clothes. Stand up. Let's see how you look."

"Johnny" stood up. His tattered clothes explained his failure.

"Well, no wonder," said the lawyer. "Now you an' I'll go out and see if we can't fix things up." Johnny was fitted out with a new "front."

Highwayman Sympathized With a Victim of Corns

LOS ANGELES, CAL.—Probably the highwayman had corns, too. He was out skirmishing for prey the other night, when he met up with Joseph Kirkham, No. 4415 Pasadena avenue. Homeward bound was Mr. Kirkham, and he was walking along Aliso street, near Aliso place, very sore of foot, because a peevish and snarling corn on the little toe of his right foot was putting him to great distress. The day had been warm, Mr. Kirkham's shoes had tried to withdraw some of their surface from the heat, and the contraction set the corn into a rage.



YOU POOR DEVIL—HERE'S A NICKEL SO YOU CAN RIDE HOME

Under his breath he was protesting emphatically, when the highwayman stepped out and interrupted his progress. Then he forgot to limp. His corn suddenly grew painless. The usual amenities of such an occurrence were observed. Mr. Kirkham's hands went into the air. Mr. Kirkham's pockets were made to yield their treasure. It amounted to but 45 cents.

"Is that all the money you have?" asked the unknown.

"It is," quavered Mr. Kirkham.

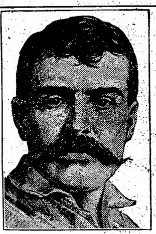
The highwayman grunted. Then he looked coldly at Mr. Kirkham. "Did you limp when you walked?" he asked.

"Yes, sir," said Mr. Kirkham, believing in the efficacy of politeness. "Yes, sir, I have a corn."

"You poor devil," the highwayman sympathized, "so have I. Here's a nickel so you can ride home."

And as the highway man walked off he favored his left foot.

EMILIANO ZAPATA, THE REBEL



Emiliano Zapata is the leader of the constitutionalist forces in southern Mexico. In describing this man, Francisco Urquidi, a constitutionalist agent, the other day said:

"Zapata is a peon of Morelos. He comes from a state in which the land is held in fee simple by less than two dozen landlords. He worked out in the fields with fellow peons. He is an uneducated man, because he had no opportunity to get learning. He can read and write, but he learned to do these after he was twenty-one years old. He is now thirty-eight years old and is a wiry, slim-built man slightly under six feet in height. He is a half-breed, but the Indian blood does not show as strong in him as it does in many of his followers. He is light-complexioned, energetic, and is a dreamer in that he sees things as they might be and is not contented with them as they are.

"Zapata stands for the peasant ownership of some of the lands the peon tills. He has worked for the big sugar companies for years. During that time he received the least possible pay the companies could give him and his fellow workers. He did not receive this pay in money, but in orders on the company's store for the simple food he ate and the cloth to make the clothes that partly cover his body. For six months of the year he worked hard and for the other six months he was forced to sit back and starve while he waited for another crop of the sugar cane so that he could get busy in the fields. His condition was the condition of the peons generally.

"Zapatism is an idea the peons think worth fighting for. They will not be content until they can get some of the land for their own. If Carranza does as he promises—and I am certain he will do so—the peasants will get land for their own. If he does not carry out the needed reforms and do it promptly he will be forced to fight Zapata and the Zapatists.

"These men have been fighting for years. They fought Diaz, they fought Madero and they fought Huerta."

MURRAY'S PLEA FOR MILEAGE

"Where do members of congress who come to Washington without their families spend their time at night?"

This question was discussed in the house the other day by Alfalfa Bill Murray of Oklahoma in connection with the mileage provision of the conference report on the legislative bill. Alfalfa Bill insisted that it was the duty of all members to bring their families to Washington with them, and he insisted that that was why it was desirable to make a liberal allowance for mileage.

The Oklahoma statesman declared that in the absence of a man's family time was likely to hang heavily on his hands and he would do more roaming around at night than was good for him. Alfalfa Bill wanted all members to have their families with them constantly throughout the sessions in order that they might not grow lonesome.

"Abraham Lincoln, Daniel Webster, James A. Garfield, William J. Bryan and others all took this allowance when they were in the house, and who would dare accuse any of them of being grafters," said Mr. Murray. The house rocked with applause as Alfalfa Bill concluded with this statement, "I believe in voting for mileage and taking it."

DOCTOR JORDAN HEADS EDUCATORS

Dr. David Starr Jordan of California, one of the most prominent of present-day educators, was unanimously elected president of the National Education association at the St. Paul convention. No other candidate was mentioned.

The resolutions committee endorsed woman's suffrage, equal pay for equal work without regard to sex, simplified spelling, social centers, larger playgrounds, increased salaries for teachers, pensions for teachers and the settlement of international differences by arbitration. President Wilson's "watchful waiting" policy was approved.

Physical inspection of children for health purposes secured endorsement. A plan for a national university was favored and it was recommended that congress appropriate annually $500,000 for use in improving educational conditions.

The association did not recommend sex hygiene in the schools, but recommended that "institutions preparing teachers give attention to such subjects as would qualify for instruction in the particular field of sex hygiene."

MRS. LONGWORTH'S LITTLE "BREAK"

Mrs. Nicholas Longworth, formerly Alice Roosevelt, made a little "break" at a smart dinner party in London the other night which has been the talk of the drawing rooms there ever since.

Sir Edward Carson, the "uncrowned king of Ulster," is one of the lions of the season. He has been much annoyed for some time by persistent statements that he will shortly marry a niece of Moreton Frewen, the well-known writer on political economy. This matter has never been mentioned in the presence of Sir Edward, but Mrs. Longworth cheerfully and in a loud voice asked him at the dinner: "When's the wedding going to be?"

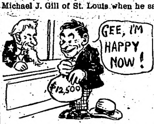
"There is not going to be any wedding," replied Sir Edward curtly and coldly.

Roswell Eldridge of New York, who is over there to buy horses and fancy cattle, is having many amusing experiences in being repeatedly mistaken for Lord Lonsdale, to whom he bears a great resemblance.

NATIONAL CAPITAL AFFAIRS

Lucky Congressman Receives $12,500 Back Salary

WASHINGTON.—There probably has never been a man who looked upon $12,500 with quite the same emotions as those which filled the breast of Michael J. Gill of St. Louis when he saw that amount chalked up to his credit in the office of the sergeant-at-arms of the house. Gill, be it known, is the man who journeyed here from St. Louis, and after months of desperate work succeeded in prying L. C. Dyer from his seat in the house.



The money is the salary due him as a congressman from the beginning of this congress. Dyer received the same amount in monthly payments, and the government loses by it.

Gill was a plumber, and all he had when he came here was a house and $3,500 in the bank. They cleaned him out before he got through with his case.

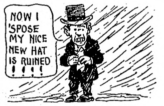
One of Gill's witnesses made a statement which resulted in a cross-examination which cost Gill just $200. It was the plainest refutation of that old lie "talk is cheap" that you could find in a day's journey. Talk wasn't cheap to Gill, who would sit there and see his $3,500 running out like the sand in an hour glass. He had the thing down so fine that he knew the very word which drained the last cent from his bank account and made him mortgage his home.

When that tragic word was spoken, Gill went out and got a job. The job was in a glass works in or near Alexandria. Also his son, Joe, went out and hooked a job playing a violin in a cheap theater.

That's why many of the men in the house voted for Gill. They knew about the glass works, the mortgaged home and the boy playing at 50 cents a throw in moving picture theaters. That's why that $12,500 looked like the pot of gold at the end of the rainbow to the elder Gill.

How a Western Senator "Ruined" His Silk Hat

A WESTERN senator, who is serving his first term in congress, came to Washington well-informed upon matters of politics and of general interest, but rather green when it came to questions of conventional attire. He visited a tailor and ordered a new outfit of clothes, which included a full dress suit and a dinner coat, both of them articles of apparel which up to that time had never graced his figure. The tailor fixed him up with a proper outfit, advised him as to the cut of the vests and coats and told him that with the full dress suit he must wear a silk hat.



NOW I 'SPOSE MY NICE NEW HAT IS RUINED !!!!

In the senator's home town a high silk hat worn on the main street would have excited widespread comment and probably would have served as the target for the town marksmen. But realizing that he must adapt himself to the new conditions and must uphold his dignity as a senator, he proudly added the hat to his wardrobe. At the next White House reception the senator appeared in full regalia. None of the deuce-spot statesmen from the effete East had anything on him when it came to conventional attire. It rained. The next day he told the tailor his troubles.

"Well, I ruined that fine silk hat last night," he said. "I went to the White House reception and on my way home the hat was entirely spoiled."

"What happened to it?" asked the tailor.

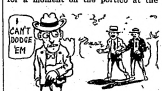
"It got wet," said the senator, "thoroughly drenched. It looks like the dickens and the fur is all rubbed the wrong way."

"Well, call up the hatter and have him send after it and iron it out, and it will be all right," said the tailor.

"Why, can it be fixed up? It can? I thought if it got wet it was gone for good. Sure, I'll have it fixed, for I want to get ready for the next reception." And the western statesman went away happy.

Wilson Dodges Sleuths to Go on Shopping Trip

SHORTLY after ten o'clock the other morning a distinguished looking person with a carefree expression came out of the White House and stood for a moment on the portico at the main entrance. He was attired in a linen suit and carried a small bundle of papers under his arm. Soon he swung into a brisk walk toward the east front gate, nodding pleasantly to those whom he met on the way. Many turned to watch him as he strode along, probably being impressed with the air of freedom which he seemed to breathe and his utter independence.



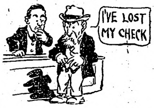
It was, of course, the president of the United States. But where were the secret service guards?

Suddenly there was sound of a commotion in the vicinity of the executive offices. Two husky men of the secret service ranks were then seen rushing across the lawn. The president quickened his pace, appeared to be about to run, and then gave up the race. As the men, out of breath, caught up with him, he said: "I came very near getting away that time."

The president was out on a little personally conducted shopping expedition. He stopped at his bank, inquired about his balance, just as many another American citizen might do, and looked over some summer clothing.

Senator Kern of Indiana Loses His Pay Check

SENATOR KERN of Indiana the other day called at the office of the senate disbursing clerk, there to cash his monthly pay-check. He reached into his right-hand, lower vest pocket, and the check was not there.



"Look in your other pockets," suggested the clerk.

"No use," groaned Mr. Kern. "I am deed fool enough to carry all my valuables in that pocket. Up to this time it has cost me $300 to carry my money and keys there, and now it has cost me $1,000."

"We can stop payment on this check—" began the clerk, but the senator did not hear him.

"I had to make a special trip to Indianapolis, costing $60, because I lost my safety vault key out of this pocket," continued the sorrowful Kern. "Then I lost $240 in bills and change out of it. Now my pay check—almost $700—is gone, too.

The clerk broke in here to assure the disconsolate senator that payment on the check could be stopped and a new voucher issued. Kern thanked him; the voucher was issued and the money pushed across the counter.

"Holy Moses!" said the disbursing clerk to his assistant. "Did you see that?"

"See what?"

"Where Senator Kern put all that money."

"Where'd he put it?"

"In his right-hand, lower vest pocket," replied the disbursing clerk.

GERMANY DECLARES WAR AGAINST RUSSIA; TROOPS INVADING FRANCE

KAISER'S FORCES MARCHING TOWARD FRENCH CAPITAL

PLAN TO VANGUISH FRANCE IN INTERVAL BEFORE RUSSIA CAN CREATE SERIOUS TROUBLE ON NORTHERN FRONTIER.

GERMANS ARE REPULSED AT CIREY WITH HEAVY LOSSES

Movement Made Without Formal Declaration of War—Kaiser Unable to Answer England as to Respecting Belgium's Neutrality.

London, Aug. 4. — German forces have begun the invasion of France without so far as is known, a declaration of war having been made. Two German detachments entered French territory moving in the direction of Paris.

Army Crosses Frontier.

One German force crossed the French frontier near the village of Cirey, between Nancy and Strassburg, and another German detachment, probably the Twenty-ninth infantry, Saturday night, invaded the Grand Duchy of Luxemburg, neutral territory between Belgium and Germany, and continued its march on the French fortified town of Longwy. A dispatch from Brussels said there was good reason to believe that this force, later in the day, entered France.

Germans Are Repulsed.

The German force which came into France near Cirey, which is 40 miles from Nancy, is reported to have been repulsed with heavy losses, but this has not yet been confirmed.

Apparently the Germany army is duplicating the first movement of the Franco-Prussian war. It was on Aug. 2, 1870, that the French and Garmans clashed in the first battle of that war at Saarbrucken where the Prince Imperial, under the orders of the emperor, received his famous "Baptism of fire."

It appears that Germany is taking the fullest possible advantage of her supposed superiority in rapid mobilization over France.

The plan of the German emperor, according to military observers here, is to vanguish or attempt to vanguish France in the interval before Russia will be able to create serious trouble on her northern frontier. It is supposed that Russian mobilization will take about three weeks.

All telegraphic and telephonic communication between Brussels and Luxemburg has been severed.

Invade Neutral Territory.

By the treaty of London, signed in 1867, the Grand Duchy of Luxemburg was declared neutral territory. Its integrity and independence were guaranteed.

Longwy is a fortified town of France on the Belgium frontier, 40 miles northwest of Metz in Germany.

A train full of German soldiers arrived at the station at Luxemburg during the night. The troops seized the station and the bridges on the Treves and Trois Vierges line in order to insure the regular passage of military trains across the Grand Duchy.

Encounter French Forces.

According to an evening newspaper published at Liege, 20,000 German troops crossed the French frontier this morning near Nancy. They encountered French forces and were repulsed with heavy losses. This news, however, lacks confirmation.

A telephone dispatch from Brussels says it was reported that Germany had declared war on France and that the French ambassador, Jules Cambon, had left the German capital. This report could not be confirmed.

France Issues Statement.

The French embassy yesterday issued the following statement:

"French territory has been invaded at Cirey and German troops are marching on the fort at Cirey. This act has been committed without a declaration of war. The German ambassador is at present in Paris."

Germany declared today that she was unable to answer the question put by the British ambassador at Berlin as to whether she is prepared to respect the neutrality of Belgium.

This statement appeared in a communication issued by the French embassy.

The neutrality of Belgium has been guaranteed by Great Britain and she is bound to protect Belgium for her own safety as Belgium under German rule would be a never ending menace to England.

War Was Result Expected.

London, Aug. 4.—Events in the European crisis developed with startling rapidity. The German ultimatum to Russia, demanding that Russia cease the mobilization of her army, expired and a few hours later the German emperor signed a mobilization order.

The German ambassador at St. Petersburg, Count Von Pourtales, delivered a declaration of war in the name of his government to the Russian government and the entire staff of the embassy immediately left St. Petersburg.

After the warlike speeches delivered by the German emperor and the imperial chancellor at Berlin, no other result could be expected. Hopes that the dreaded event might be averted had been raised by the intervention of King George in St. Petersburg and the fact that the German reichstag was not to be convened until Tuesday. Hence the actual declaration of war had not been expected for another day or two.

Now the die is cast and Europe is to be plunged into a general war which has been the apprehension of European statesmen for generations.

Placards were posted in Paris calling for general mobilization and the German ambassador, although he had not been handed his passports, was preparing to leave the French capital.

Germans and Russians Clash.

The first shots in the Russo-German war were exchanged between patrols yesterday afternoon near Prostken, 120 miles to the southeast of Konigsberg.

The only redeeming feature of the darkest prospect with which Europe has been faced for half a century, is that Italy has declared her neutrality. But how long that neutrality can be maintained is an exceedingly debatable question.

Great Britain's position already has been defined by Premier Asquith in the British parliament. He declared that she is under no formal obligation to go to the assistance of France in the event of an European war.

American Tourists Trapped.

London, Aug. 4.—Hundreds of marooned Americans are arriving tonight from the continent. All are anxious to get home, but few have been able to secure accommodations. They report hundreds of Americans still in France and Germany and absolutely unable to get away from these nations. According to the stories told by the Americans arriving here the Europeans have taken advantage of their plight to gouge out of them every possible dollar.

Barbaric Warfare in Servia.

Washington, Aug. 4.—If the experience of the recent past is any guide to the immediate future, the war between Austria-Hungary and Servia will produce revolting scenes of barbarity and savagery. During the Balkan wars the Carnegie Peace endowment sent an international commission to the countries engaged in conflict. This commission's report pictured ghastly conditions and condemned the conduct of Bulgarians, Greeks and Servians, to say nothing of the Turks.

Bankers Would Avert War.

London, Aug. 3.—That the powerful financial interests both here and on the continent, are bringing into play every possible line of persuasion to prevent the general war, has developed.

England Mobilizing Forces.

Washington, Aug. 4.—Official dispatches received here report England mobilizing forces along the North sea.

HOLLAND MOBILIZING ARMY

Queen Wilhelmina's Order Arouses Dutch Cities—Signs of Military Preparations on All Sides.

Amsterdam, Aug. 4.—That Holland is in the midst of war is evident here. On all sides there are signs of military preparation.

The mobilization ordered by Queen Wilhelmina was so readily answered that the operation was soon completed. The peaceful streets of the sleepy Dutch cities presented an unwonted aspect. Troops are constantly moving and are being lodged in the public buildings.

The mobilization decree caused a panic among the poorer classes. There was a frantic run on savings banks; crows beseiged the shops for food supplies and the excitement increased when the postoffice, railways and commercial houses refused to give coin for notes.

A bill has been presented to parliament authorizing the mayors in the various towns to seize supplies and sell them to the public and thus avoid their being held up and prices raised.

AMERICAN BANKS PREPARED

Secretary McAdoo Plans to Minimize Financial Burden Caused by European War.

Washington, Aug. 4.—The machinery of the federal government has been turned toward fortifying the American banking system so that this nation's share in the financial burden of European war will be distributed on many shoulders and its direct effects minimized.

Conferences at the White House and treasury department, culminated late yesterday in the departure for New York of Secretary McAdoo and Comptroller of the Currency Williams. These two men have authority to put in operation the plan which congress designed years ago for such situations as the present by which the national banks of the country can obtain $500,000,000 in currency under the Aldrich-Vreeland act with which to face any condition and meet any obligation.

Other Steamers Suspend Service.

New York, Aug. 3.—The transatlantic service between New York and continental Europe was suspended by the Cunard line and the International Mercantile Marine Company, which controls the White Star, Red Star, American, Leyland, Dominion and Atlantic transport lines. Sailings for British ports via these lines were not interrupted. Hundreds of persons had engaged passage via these lines for Mediterranean and Sandinavian ports

Chicago 'Change Stays Open.

Chicago, Aug. 3.—Armour's millions rescued the wheat trade from panic. Instead of chaos resulting from a settlement day in the midst of a war market, with possibly scores of firms embarrassed, and a virtual certainty that bankruptcies, few or many, would ensue, the Chicago Board of Trade was enabled to maintain the record of never having closed. The chief reason was that 75 entangled firms and individuals on 'change were freely given aid by Armour & Co.

Want Wilson to Settle War.

Brussels, Aug. 3.—The international bureau of peace sent an appeal to President Wilson to offer his mediation in the European conflict. The bureau also asked the German emperor to use his efforts to settle the controversy, reminding him that the twenty-fifth anniversary of his reign had been celebrated amid peace. President Poincare of France, Emperor Nicholas of Russia and Pope Pius were among others appealed to in the interest of peace.

LONDON REMAINS CALM IN FACE OF IMPENDING WAR

DECISION OF BRITISH CABINET IN INTERNATIONAL CRISIS IS ANXIOUSLY AWAITED BY GREAT CROWD.

POSITION OF THE COUNTRY WILL BE ANNOUNCED TODAY

That War Party Is Now in the Ascendency Is the General Opinion—Throngs Wonder Whether Great Britain Will "Fight or Flunk."

London, Aug. 4.—The Daily Chronicle publishes a rumor that Emperor Francis Joseph of Austria has been assassinated. This has not been confirmed.

London, Aug. 3.—London is maintaining her calm to the last moment. A great crowd assembled around the government offices at Whitehall awaiting the decision of the cabinet as to whether Great Britain would take part in the war, but when it was found no statement was to be made, the crowd melted away, only a few groups remaining to discuss whether the cabinet, as some put it, "had decided to flunk or fight."

To Announce Position Today.

Premier Asquith will announce Great Britain's position in the house of commons today. Prior to this announcement another cabinet meeting will be held.

The general impression is that the war party in the cabinet is in the ascendency, but not a ward was allowed to leak out of the cabinet chamber concerning the proceedings. It was said that Viscount Morley, lord president of council and Viscount Haldane, lord high chancellor, led the peace party and that Winston Spencer Churchill, first lord of the admiralty, threatened to resign if the government did not stand by its unwritten agreement to support France against German attack.

t is known that the Lancashire Liberals are putting strong pressure on the government to keep out of the conflict at all costs, and it is said that Premier Asquith is somewhat influenced by this. But the average Englishman is saying that the government had no alternative, after the neutrality of Luxemburg has been disregarded by Germany and after Germany's refusal to say what her attitude would be with regard to Belgium.

Socialists Are Protesting.

The Socialists held a big meeting in Trafalgar square last night to protest against war. James Keir Hardie, independent labor and Socialist member of parliament, who was the chief speaker, declared that Italy, although bound by treaty, remained neutral and there was no reason why Great Britain should not do likewise. He announced his intention of calling a national strike against the war.

The railway stations are crowded with German, French and other reservists returning to their respective countries.

The board of agriculture has issued a statement that there is sufficient wheat in the country to supply the whole population for four months, allowing for normal consumption, irrespective of imports.

Many Americans in London.

Not even at the height of the tourist season were there more Americans in London than last night. In addition to those who are spending a holiday here and the crowds coming from the continent to get away from the inconveniences of war, there is another contingent which arrived yesterday, consisting of tourists who, armed with passports from the American embassy, started for the continent in the last few days but found it impossible to get further than Calais, Dieppe and other coast towns. As a consequence steamers from France and Belgium are crowded with what might be termed refugees.

A dispatch from Amsterdam says a report has reached there that the Russian ambassador to Berlin has demanded his passports.

Fleeing From Paris.

The flight from Paris has become almost a panic. One of the Americans who arrived from the French capital yesterday said the train which left Paris at 9 o'clock Saturday night was jammed with Americans. Many of them went to the station as early as 3 o'clock in the afternoon and stood for hours waiting for a chance to get aboard. The heat was intense and there was much suffering among the women and children, but nobody would give up his place.

When the train was drawn up there was a frantic rush for the cars and what is described as almost a pitched battle took place, the strongest gaining the victory and climbing into the cars. Baggage was abandoned in the rush and some of the passengers arrived in London without even a change of linen.

To Postpone Cup Race.

London, Aug. 3.—Sir Thomas Lipton declared he had definitely decided not to race at Sandy Hook next September for the America's cup if England becomes engaged in war.

HOPES TO AVERT RAIL STRIKE

PRESIDENT BRINGING ENGINEMEN AND MANAGERS TOGETHER.

Latter Are Warned of Calamity That Walkout Might Bring to the Nation.

Washington, Aug. 3.—Unofficial reports that the managers of the 98 western railroads involved in the threatened strike of 55,000 engineers and firemen will heed President Wilson's plea for peace are current among men in close touch with the situation. The president is understood to be confident that a strike will be unnecessary.

Appeals to Managers.

The committee of managers to whom the president appealed is to tell Mr. Wilson whether they will accept the settlement proposed by the federal board of mediation, which suggested the arbitration of wage differences.

The president called in Charles P. Neill, former commissioner of labor, and had him take a message to the railroad managers again urging on them the necessity for adopting the proposed plan of settlement.

Might Bring Great Calamity.

The railroad managers were asked to remember that a great calamity might come to the country if a strike is declared by the engineers and firemen, thus holding up the movement of the crops of the West.

DISCUSS POSITION OF JAPAN

Washington Diplomats Talk Over Possibilities of Such a Move.

Washington, Aug. 1.—The possibility that Japan might become involved in a general war should her ally, England, be drawn into the threatened vortex in Europe, was discussed in diplomatic circles here. The treaty of alliance between Great Britain and Japan, signed in 1905 and renewed in 1911, provides that the countries shall support each other in the event of an attack or aggressive action against either in eastern Asia or India by another power.

From time to time there have been rumors of secret clauses, greatly extending the scope of the convention and making it apply to hostilities conducted outside of the Far East, but the existence of any such extra provisions is unknown to the state department or to the Japanese embassy here.

Japan's being drawn into any war that might involve Great Britain with Germany or Austria or Italy is believed to hinge entirely upon naval developments in the Far East.

HALF MILLION SEATTLE FIRE

Grand Trunk Pacific Pier and Coleman Dock Destroyed in Heart of Water Front.

Seattle, Wash., Aug. 1.—Fire destroyed the Grand Trunk Pacific pier and damaged the Coleman dock, two of the largest passenger wharves in the heart of the Seattle water front, causing a loss estimated at $500,000, mostly covered by insurance. Eight persons were injured, four seriously, but all will recover.

The greatest loss was sustained by the Grand Trunk Pacific Steamship company, owners of the Grand Trunk pier, which was valued at $350,000. The damage to the Coleman deck is estimated at $50,000. The rest of the loss is distributed among occupants of the Grand Trunk pier and included several hundred tons of freight stored in the warehouse.

NOTED SOCIALIST CHIEF SHOT

Jean Leon Jaures Is Assassinated in Paris While Seated at Table in Restaurant.

Paris, Aug. 3.—Jean Leon Jaures, the noted Socialist leader, was assassinated while dining in a small restaurant near the Bourse. The assassin was arrested, but refused to disclose his identity.

Later he was identified as Raoul Villan, 29 years old, and said to be the son of a clerk of the civil court at Rheims.

The minister of the interior, Louis Malvy, on learning of the crime, left the meeting of the council and ordered precautions to be taken to prevent demonstrations.

The reports of the shots startled the diners and passersby and the assassin was seized. In his pocket was another loaded revolver. The police rescued him from the crowd, which shouted, "Assassin—Death to the assassin!" The body of the noted deputy was placed in a city conveyance which, surrounded by weeping comrades and friends, proceeded to his home, followed by a detachment of Republican guards.

Odessa Bourse Is Closed.

Odessa, Aug. 1.—The bourse has been closed for three days. The greatest activity prevails in the corn market.

Carranza And Carvajal Agreeing.

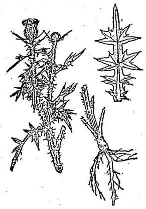
Washington, July 30.—General Carranza and Provisional President Carbajal have agreed on a base for the arrangement of peace in Mexico, according to a message receivd here by Jose Castellot, personal representative of Carbajal. With respect to amnesty and guarantees, General Carranza, it is understood, will promise immunity to all except those directly responsible for the overthrow of Madero. Practically all those said to be guilty fled Mexico, and that exception will not be opposed.

TAKEN FOR CANADA THISTLE

Bull Thistle Not Generally Troublesome and May Be Eradicated by Good Rotation Systems.

Weeds may be classified in different ways. One of the most useful classifications is based on the length of time the weeds live. This gives three classes: Annual, biennial, and perennial. An annual weed is one that starts from the seed in the spring, develops into a plant which flowers and seeds the same year, and then dies; or, in other words, an annual weed is one that lives but one growing season. Most of our weeds belong to this class.

A biennial weed is one that lives for two years. The first year it starts from the seed and develops a large tap root below the ground and a dosette of leaves above ground, but does not flower or seed. The large tap root is stored full of food which gives the plant an early start the following spring. From the center of the rosette of leaves a stalk is sent up which bears flowers and, later, seeds. At the end of the second year the plant dies. Two good illustration of this class of weeds are the bull thistle and the burdock.



Bull Thistle—Showing Flowers, Separate Leaf and Roots.

The bull thistle is often mistaken for Canada thistle. It is, however, much larger and more rugged. This weed may be eradicated by preventing the plants from going to seed for two years. Cutting once or twice in a season will usually suffice. It is not generally troublesome in well-tilled fields and disappears under good rotation systems.

DRESSING FOR SHEAR CUTS

Mixture of Turpentine, Tar and Oil Is Recommended for Healing and Keeping Flies Away.

The following dressing is recommended by the Shepherd's Journal for sheep wounds:

For clean cuts a good dressing, to prevent the fly from settling on the wound, is a mixture of one part turpentine, one part Stockholm tar and two parts salad or olive oil. The turpentine is cleansing and its strong smell keeps the flies off, but being very volatile it would soon evaporate if used alone.

Tar is healing, and being strong smelling is objectionable to the fly. It also adheres to the wool and flesh and assists to retain the turpentine. Salad or olive oil tends to soften the severe effects of the tar and turpentine, also to a great extent prevents the tar from injuring the wool.

The same mixture is very effective also in destroying the maggots after the sheep are blown, and in healing wounds made by them. Any lubricating oil or ordinary fat will serve as a substitute to mix with the tar and turpentine.

Infertile Eggs Keep Longer.

Some people still think that hens which run with the rooster lay more eggs than hens that are kept separate. This is not the true state of the case at all, as anyone can test by experiment. But eggs laid by hens with no male mate—infertile eggs, they are called—will keep much longer and at a higher temperature than will fertile eggs. It is really much better for the hens, for the roosters and for eggs that the sexes be separated and kept separate after the hatch season is over.

Manure the Garden.

One place on the farm where it pays to manure the land often and liberally is the garden and truck patch. This should receive a liberal application every year, for from this acre properly managed and cultivated, more than half the living for the family may be produced.

Hogs as Soil Improvers.

We know of no cheaper, easier and more profitable way to bring up the soil than by making a field into a hog pasture for two or three years. It will help matters along also if the grain is fed to the hogs all over the field instead of in one corner.

Make a Creep for the Pigs.

By all means make a creep for the little pigs, a place where they can get in to be fed where the larger hogs cannot come. And while we are speaking of feeding young pigs let us not forget that too much sloppy feed is not good for them.

Food for Growing Chicks.

Do not depend on too much mash food for young growing chicks. Give the growing and developing gizzards something to do, some grist to grind, or they will not develop as they should.

CRAZED; KILLS DAUGHTERS

Virginia Man Driven Insane by Grief Over Son's Death—Attempts Suicide.

Virginia.—Crazed by grief over the drowning of his son a year ago, and brooding over financial troubles, Henry Wuori, 47 years old, a Finnish homesteader near here, shot to death his daughters, Amelia, aged 11, and Mary, aged 9.

He made an unsuccessful attempt to shoot his daughter, Sarah, aged 16, and then turned the gun upon himself. He failed in his attempt at suicide and escaped to the woods, badly wounded.

A man hunt was immediately begun and the county bloodhounds were put on the trail. Wuori was a temperance man, never indulging in liquor.

He was apparently in his normal mind. His wife and little daughter went to the edge of the homestead clearing to pick berries. They heard shots and ran back to the house. The elder child had been shot once through the heart and had died instantly.

Mary, the younger child, was playing on the floor with two dolls when Wuori fired at her. She received only a superficial wound at the first shot and clasping the dolls in her arms and shielding them with her body, she jumped on a bed, where she was shot a second time through the heart and instantly killed.

Wuori then went outside the house and fired twice at his older daughter. She ran into a barn and hid herself, while his wife fled screaming from the clearing.

Wuori then turned the rifle on himself. The shot carried away several teeth and a piece of his jawbone, which were found at the spot where he stood when he attempted his life. Wuori fled to the woods with the rifle. The gun was empty.

WED SEVENTY-FIVE YEARS

Mr. and Mrs. Charles Rendall of Delavan Celebrate—Relatives Make Old Couple Happy.

Delavan.—Mr. and Mrs. Charles Rendall were carried back seventy-five years to their wedding day when they celebrated the diamond anniversary surrounded by children, grandchildren, great grandchildren and a few close friends, at the little homestead near here where they have lived since 1864.

All of the nine children attended. They are: Mrs. James Young, Lynn Haven, Fla; E. J. Rendall, Portland, Ore.; J. B. Rendall, Pine City, Minn.; Mrs. Thomas Cook, Mrs. Robert Moore and Charles Rendall, Blue Earth, Minn.; Robert Rendall, Winnebago, Minn.; J. F. Rendall and Mrs. Ella Lewis, Delavan.

Despite their advanced age the couple entered actively into the day's festivities. Mr. Rendall is 97 years old and his wife is 93. An anniversary dinner was served.

The children presented them with seventy-five American Beauty roses and two chairs were the gift of grandchildren. A grandson in New York presented Mrs. Rendall with a diamond necklace. There are thirty-eight grandchildren and forty great grandchildren.

Telegrams from friends in Ohio and a cablegram from England brought congratulations.

Miss Anna Apsey and Charles Rendall were married in Chardstock, England, July 30, 1839. They came to America in 1841 and lived at Gravesend, Long Island, for a number of years. Later they went to Wisconsin. In May, 1864, they settled on the homestead near Delavan.

Couple Face Fraud Charge.

Mankato.—United States Deputy Marshal Charles Kittleson brought Burt Rentz and wife of Wells, to Mankato on a warrant charging them with attempting to defraud the government under the bankruptcy law. They pleaded not guilty and were held to the grand jury. They were released on their own recognizance. It is charged that Mr. and Mrs. Rentz were in an alleged conspiracy to defraud certain wholesale jewelry firms throughout the United States by going into assumed bankruptcy and concealing the goods purchased.

Wilson Honors Woodrow Baby.

Brainerd.—In a letter to Mrs. V. C. Francis, mother of the first baby born in Woodrow, a mining town on the south Cuyuna range named after President Woodrow Wilson, the president felicitates the parents on the honor of having the first baby in the town and wishes little Dorothy Lucille Francis a long and happy life. The baby was given a lot by the townsite company, and other friends gave it a baby cab and a purse of money.

Ten Years' Average Crop.

Minneapolis.—Eastern and central portions of South Dakota will harvest about a 10-years' average crop of small grains, according to a letter received by the Security National bank from G. W. Hart, president of the Merchants National bank of Bryant, S. D. Mr. Hart has had investigators out in the fields of nearly 20 counties in his neighborhood. The wheat crop, he reports, will be considerably under that expected two weeks ago. Corn and hay are in excellent condition. Alfalfa especially is a good crop.

OLD PRISON ABOUT DONE FOR

New State Institution Slowly Absorbing Army of Convicts at Stillwater.

Stillwater.—So slowly and methodically that the change is hardly noticeable, even in the big kitchen of the institution the last of the state's Stillwater wards are being removed from the old prison into the new. Within a day or two it is expected the remaining 300 convicts now occupying cells in the old prison will have been moved to their new home, and the life dream of Warden Henry Wolfer, that Minnesota's convicts would one day be housed in the most modern, complete and best appointed penal institution in the world, will have become a reality.

Complete transfer of the convicts cannot be made until Stillwater annexes the territory occupied by the new prison. The state constitution provides that the state prison shall be "in Stillwater." When the constitution was adopted St. Paul drew the capitol, Minneapolis the university and Stillwater the prison. The new prison is now outside the corporation line, but it is expected the Stillwater city council will annex the territory. Until it does the old prison cannot be fully abandoned. It will be necessary to keep some prisoners in the old place and maintain the actual administration headquarters.

WILL PUSH SEED CORN WEEK

Phone Girls to Call Farmers Urging Them to Pick Best Ears Before Frost.

St. Paul.—Some time late in August or early in September the farmers of Minnesota will be called to their phones by operators on rural lines to answer the question, "Have you selected your seed corn yet?" If the reply is in the negative they will be asked to get busy. Others will receive the same advice in letters from their bankers.

These are means by which the extension division of the college of agriculture intends to aid the farmers in keeping their record of the highest yield to the acre of any state in the Union.

The college of agriculture will wait until the first killing frost can be predicted and then get in touch with the farmers, so that they can beat the weather by selecting the best in their fields.

Word will also be sent to the principals of all agricultural high schools in the state to keep the farmers informed of the approach of Seed Corn week, supplementing the direct information of the bankers and telephone operators on the rural lines.

FIVE "HOBOES" ARE KILLED

Lose Lives When Train Is Wrecked—Were "Beating Their Way."

Waterville.—Five men were killed when a special coal train on the Minneapolis & St. Louis railroad was wrecked by a broken journal Wednesday. Trainmen were uninjured, but five men who were "beating their way" to the harvest fields were buried under the coal when the cars were piled up in a cut a mile north of here.

Two bodies, those of Orlando and Floyd Martz of Monroe, Ind., were recovered. They were identified by life insurance policies. Searchers are working to uncover the bodies of the three men still buried in the wreck.

Three others, who also were traveling on brakebeams, were pulled out of the wreck unharmed.

Find Drowned Man's Relatives.

Hastings.—Chief of Police William Nolan has received a telegram from Police Superintendent S. W. Perrot of Indianapolis, Ind., stating that J. C. Bledsoe, the man drowned after a dive from the spiral bridge here, has a brother on the police force in that city, who informed the mother of the accident.

Bledsoe and his companion, C. F. Sanders, were employed in Indiana as street car conductors, but went out at the time of the big strike. The body has not been recovered. Sanders is serving a ten-day sentence for running away with Bledsoe's clothes.

Currie Saloons Ruled Out.

Pipestone.—Because the village of Currie has never been incorporated it is among the "dry" towns of the state. Currie is a part of Murray township, Murray county, and under a recent decision of the supreme court the saloons were closed on the ground that the township of which the village is a part, has never voted in favor of saloons. It is said that efforts will be made to incorporate the village so that the saloons may be reopened.

Bit Off Wife's Nose; Captured.

Duluth.—Posing as his wife's cousin and with his mustache shaved off, John Marobita, who on July 18 bit off the end of his wife's nose during a quarrel, was captured by Deputy Sheriff O'Dea at the detention hospital in Virginia. When placed under arrest Marobita confessed that he has visited his wife daily since she was received at the Virginia institution. The woman is in a serious condition as blood poisoning has developed.

MINNESOTA TO SEND EXHIBITS

State Will Be Represented at Five Big Fairs This Season.

St. Paul.—Commissioner Fred D. Sherman was instructed to arrange for Minnesota exhibits at the Indiana and Illinois state fairs and at the district fairs at Sterling, Ill., and Waterloo, Iowa, at the annual meeting of the state board of immigration at the Capitol, in addition to the display at the Minnesota fair.

Mr. Sherman submitted his annual report showing the work done by the department during the last fiscal year. He said he believed that at least 5,000 families, or 25,000 persons, estimating five to a family, moved into Minnesota during the year and says that the bumper corn crop of 1913 did more to advertise the resources of the North Star state than any other one thing.

The commissioner also reported that he has a balance of $1,700 from the appropriation for the fiscal year ending August 1. There was $35,000 available for the year beginning August 1 and the board decided to use the funds as for the present year. The advertising campaign will be extended and it is planned to start the exhibit car into the adjoining states to the south and west early in December for five months. Heretofore this car has been sent out in January for only four months.

Those who attended the meeting were A. D. Stephens, Crookston; J. A. Nichols, Minneapolis; Secretary of State Julius A. Schmahl, George F. Authier, representing Governor Eberhart, and Deputy Auditor C. S. Brown representing State Auditor Samuel G. Iverson.

SOUTHERN EDITORS TO MEET

Second District Association Will Hold Unusual Midsummer Session Aug. 8.

Mankato.—The Second District Editorial association is to enjoy an unusual session at its midsummer meeting at New Ulm, Aug. 8. The day's doings will commence with an automobile ride tendered to the visitors by the New Ulm Commercial club, which has charge of the arrangements for the meeting. The business session will be held late in the day and the following will be among the topics discussed: "Political Advertising," "Postal Laws and Regulation," "How to Induce Merchants to Advertise," and "Making the Job Department Pay."

A banquet will be served in the evening in Turner hall, and a short program of toasts will be given, among which will be one on the "Value of a Newspaper to a Community," by John D. Deets of Mankato, secretary of the Southern Minnesota Better Development league. The Second Regiment band of New Ulm will give a concert, and later an exhibition of physical culture will be given by a class under the direction of Professor Herman Hine.

Philip Seymour Is Dead.

Duluth.—Philip Seymour, one of Duluth's most prominent land attorneys, died here suddenly of heart disease. Mr. Seymour was an important figure in the early days of litigation over timber and mine lands in Minnesota. He came here in 1891 from Washington, D. C., to take part in the famous section 30 lawsuit, and remained. He was an attorney in the land department in Washington and was considered one of the best land experts in the United States. He was a member of the Scottish Rite Masonic order, and was 57 years old.

"Blue Sky" Law Invoked.

Duluth.—Brokers of Calgary oil stocks ran up against the Wisconsin "blue sky" law when they opened an office here. J. Schlitz, who had been left in charge of the Superior office, was arrested charged with selling stock without a state license. He will be tried under the new law. F. W. Ferckle, who conducted an oil stock office in Duluth for several weeks, left Schlitz in charge in Superior while he went to Minneapolis to open a shop. Ferckle was under bonds in Duluth to keep the peace after an altercation with a stock broker who attacked him in newspaper advertisements.

Fine Crops Near Winona.

Winona.—Early threshing reports from the territory in Eastern South Dakota and Southern Minnesota reveal favorable conditions in the yields of the cereal grains. The general outlook is good and above the average. With favorable weather for the remainder of the summer, corn will be the best crop harvested. The growth of this crop has been remarkable, it is declared, during the last week. Much of it already is well eared out.

Injured at Circus; Dies.

Mankato.—William Boswell, a prominent resident of St. Clair, who was injured by a falling tent pole at Ringling's circus, is dead. Employes were taking down the supports of the large tent as the audience was leaving when one of the large poles fell. Mr. Boswell's spine was injured. He was 57 years old and leaves a family. Miss Margaret Scott of Artesian, S. D., also was struck by tht pole, and is still in a local hospital. One or two others received slight injuries.

MEN AND ISSUES THAT FIGURE IN WAR SITUATION

To Count Leopold Berchtold, Austrain Foreign Minister, Must Be Given First Place

BROUGHT ABOUT CONTEST

It Is Understood He Believed the Time Ripe for Favorable Action—Career of Nikola Pashitch, Servian Premier—Russia's Part in Embroglio.

Count Leopold Berchtold, a quiet man, with English manners, sitting at a desk in the foreign office in Vienna—such is the unimposing presence of the Austro-Hungarian statesman who precipitated a situation more serious to Europe than any that has arisen since the events that immediately preceded the Franco-Prussian war. And the most extraordinary feature of the crisis is that it should have arisen directly out of the assassination, by a Servian, of Francis Ferdinand, the archduke who in his life time was regarded as the firebrand of Europe. Thus the archduke, after death, as he was in life, remains the great menacing factor in the affairs of European Christendom.

Count Berchtold assumed the portfolio of foreign affairs at Vienna upon the retirement of Count von Aehrenthal, who put through the act of annexation of Bosnia-Herzegovina, which set in motion the wild passions that culminated in the assassination of the Austrian heir to the throne.

Russia Back of Servia.

When he took office as the director of the foreign office, Berchtold found a situation full of portent. Servia, incensed by Austria's absorption of territories which formerly had belonged to Turkey and to which Servia considered itself the heir, because they are populated largely by a people of Serb race, was clamoring for the undoing of that which had been accomplished by the decree of annextion. Behind the clamor at Belgrade could be heard the sinister undertone of the growl of the Russian bear.

Berchtold set himself to work to reduce relations to a normal basis. Behind him were the two other members of the triple alliance—Germany and Italy—and opposing him were Russia, the self-imposed protector of all the Slavic nations, including Servia, and the two other members of the triple entente, Great Britain and France.

Broke Up Balkan League.

Then came the Balkan war in 1912, in which the Bulgarian and Servian Slavs crushed the power of Turkey in Europe. The formation of the Balkan alliance and the utter defeat of Turkey were startling events which caught Berchtold napping. His next move was to break up the Balkan league by stimulating the land hunger of Servia and Greece, with their ally, Montenegro, and turning them against Bulgaria, which was the predominant military factor in the war of 1912.

The Graeco-Servian success, though, were another development for which Berchtold was unprepared. After Bulgaria had been defeated by the combination of five nations, including Turkey, the clamor at Belgrade against the annexation of Bosnia-Herzegovina by Austria was resumed with redoubled vituperativeness and noisy rancor.

This agitation, it has been pointed out by Berchtold, was the direct cause of the tragedy at Sarajevo, when the archduke and his morganatic wife fell by bullets fired by a Servian. The Austrian minister of foreign affairs demonstrated in the judicial inquiry that followed the crime, that Servian officials, civil and military, had been involved in the events that led to the assassination.

Deemed Time for Action.

The moment for action had come. Berchtold surveyed the international horizon.

He observed that Russia was involved in a big strike which had a revolutionary tinge.

That France was in a turmoil of political uncertainty.

That Great Britain was facing an internal convulsion as a result of the Ulster situation.

The Austrian ultimatum to Servia, demanding an apology for Servia's part in the tragedy of Sarajevo and a suppression of the anti-Austrian agitation in Belgrade, followed promptly in the midst of the preoccupation of the triple entente.

Berchtold realizes more clearly than anybody else that he has challenged the entire Slav world, with the exception of Bulgaria; that his quarrel is not with Servia, but with Russia, which has stood back of Servia in her attacks upon Austria.

Nikola Pashitch, Servian Premier.

Nikola Pashitch, premier and minister of foreign affairs of Servia, has twice before been the dominant figure in Servian politics in the course of his 40 years in the public affairs of his country. His policy always has been bitterly hostile to Austria-Hungary, and the present crisis in the relations of the two countries is largely the outcome of his provocative attitude.

Pashitch throughout his career has conducted a vigorous fight for the economic freedom of Servia from Austria. By means of railway tariffs and inspection regulations on the frontier of Austria, Servia's natural road to the markets of western Europe, the Austrian government has been able to control Servian trade in pigs and poultry, the staple products of Servia.

Clamor Against Austria.

But the chief grievance of the Servians has been the continued domination of Austria-Hungary over a large population across the frontier which the Servians maintain is of Serb blood. Although a considerable part of this population has contested the claims of the Servian jingoes and has repeatedly demonstrated its preference for Austrain rule, the campaign for liberating the Servian brothers from the Austrian yoke has been kept up with frequent outbursts of anti-Austrian clamor in Belgrade. To this clamor Russia, always jealous of Austria, has lent her secret and sometimes her open support.

The annexation of Bosnia-Herzegovina by Austria in 1909 produced a wild demand in Servia for immediate war to liberate the Bosnian brothers from Austrian rule. At that time, however, Russia was not ready for action against Austria, so the clamor spent itself in torrid speeches and fervid press declarations.

Occupied Adriatic Ports.

Pashitch was premier of Servia in 1912, at the outbreak of the Balkan war. He saw an opportunity to block Austria's long-sought road to the Aegean sea. The first objective points of the Servian armies in the first war were the ports of the Adriatic, in what is now Albania. These, with the help of Montenegro, Servia occupied in the first stages of the struggle.

At this stage, however, Pashitch's calculations were upset by Austria. Acting in conjunction with Italy, which also had pretensions to the country inhabited by the aboriginal stock of the Balkan peninsula, the Austrian government succeeded in inducing Europe to order Servia, Greece and Montenegro out of the Adriatic territory occupied by them, and set aside this region as an independent state, to be called Albania.

Servians Nursed Their Wrath.

The negotiations which Pashitch conducted in this phase of the Balkan struggle were protracted and delicate, but eventually the Austro-Italian demand was carried out, and the Servians nursed their wrath.

For the success of his defiant attitude toward Austria, Pashitch depended almost entirely upon Russia. It was realized clearly by General Putnik, the Servian chief of staff, that resistance to Austria upon the field of battle would be unthinkable, so far as an ultimate triumph for Servian arms is concerned.

In the course of the past score of years Servia has been conducting an active agitation among the Slavic population of southern Austria, and Pashitch undoubtedly counts upon internal disorders in the rear of an advancing Austrian army to embarrass the enemy in a campaign into Servia.

Of the success of this plan there is grave doubt, however, as the Catholic and Moslem Serbs of Austria have no hankering for Servian rule.

THE SUNBEAM.

BY W. G. HUNT.

Published every Friday, at Sunbeam, Pennington County, Minnesota.

Entered as Second-class matter August 30 1905, at the post office at Sunbeam Minn. under the Act of Congress of March 3,1879

While war is "hell," yet our american producers will profit by the great European war that is now on tap. The only way to profit by it, is to be a producer, and the actual producer is the one that will get the actual benefit out of a long continued war.

We publish in another column the platform of John. A. Duffy candidate for Representative from this District. Read it over carefully, and do not be sidetracked by "Roarbacks" sent out a few days before election to deceive the people, into voting for an unknown man for this important position.

WHY WE WILL NOT SUPPORT O'NEIL.

We sent out copies of the last session laws to all of our subscribers, but a portion of them did not read them, so we will quote part of Sec. 15, Chapter 568, House File No. 308, part of the drainage law that Brown fixed up and O'Neil passed:

Section 15 of Chapter 230 of the General Laws of Minnesota for 1905, providing for hearings on extension of contracts relating to drainage.

Be it enacted by the Legislature of the State of Minnesota:

That Section 15 of Chapter 230 of the General Laws of Minnesota for 1905 be amended so as to read as follows:

Sec. 15. The bond and contract shall be attached to each other and the contract shall contain the specific description of the work to be done, either expressly or by reference to plans and specifications, and refer to the number of the section or setcions, as provided for in the preceeding section, and shall provide that the work shall be done and completed as provided for in the report of the engineer, and subject to his approval and that of the auditor, or auditors as the case may be.

Such contract shall be drawn to the satisfaction of the engineer and county attorney. Every such contract shall embrace all the provisions provided by law for the giving of bond by contractors for public works and improvements and for the better security of the contracting county or counties and of the parties performing labor and furnishing material in and about the performance of such contracts, and shall provide that time shall be of the essence of the contract, in that if there should be any failure to perform the work according to the terms of said contract within the time limited therein, originally or by extension, the contractors shall forfeit and pay to the county in which the portion of the work in default shall be located, a certain sum, to be named therein and which shall be fixed by the county auditor, or auditors, as the case may be, for each day that such failure shall continue. No extension of time shall be granted unless applied for in writing to the auditor, or auditors as case may be, stating to his or their SATISFACTION good and sufficient reasons therefor, nor shall any extension affect the right to enforce such forfeiture, if any, as shall occur after the time originally limited and before such extension, or occuring after the limit of the extension.

O'Neil passed the law and Fasel has inforced it, "nit." But where do you farmers who pay ditch taxes come in? Those of you who read the law as introduced by Representative Marschalk can readily see where the farmers would come in, but when our great farmer Representative got it fixed up, he kicked out the farmers and tax payers, and opened the gate wide for the County Auditor to walk in. Is it any wonder he is starting banks? Why if you farmers elect O'Neil for Senator and Fasel for Auditor for the next four years, they will have banks in every village in northern Minnesota, and when you call to pay your taxes you will find that there has been additional assessments levied to pay additional expence of CONSTRUCTION, while the ditch contractors explains to the Auditor to his satisfaction that an extension of time was necessary

BACK ON THE TRACK.

The Farmer's Promotive Club of the town of Leon, Clearwater County, is back on the road again. For a time it wandered around in the byways, having lost its bearings. We notice in this week's issue of the Clearbrook Journal a note from the club indorsing the principles set forth by C. L. Hansen in a speech delivered in the school house in Leon township last week. Give us your hand Rydeen and give your bunch of farmers a shake for us. We always did think you were good at heart even if you did kind of lose the track for a time! —T. R. Falls Times.

Rydeen was always on the right track and is to-day. Where The Times thought he was off the track was when he refused to support Stenvick for Representative, but that was the time that Edward was right on the right track and had on a full head of steam.

POLITICAL ANNOUNCEMET.

To the Voters of the new 65th District, composed of the Counties of Pennington, Clearwater and Red Lake:

I hereby announce myself as a candidate for Representative for the said district. I solicit your support and votes at the election to be held November 3rd, 1914.

I have been a resident of the District for the past thirty-two years and have, I believe, grown to know the wants and needs of the citizens of the District, and as political platforms have been eliminated by the Non-Partisan Election Law, I therefore hold it to be the duty of all persons seeking legislative honors to declare themselves upon public questions affecting the welfare, health and morals of the people of the State.

If nominated and elected I pledge myself to use my best efforts and ability to work for the following legislation:

Legislation for economy and efficiency in State Administration of business affairs for the purpose of lightening the burdens of the tax payers of the state.

I favor putting the telephones of the state under the supervision of the Railroad and Warehouse Commission and compelling physical connection of lines and regulations of rates.

I shall encourage the adoption of the Revolving Fund Amendment known as House File No. 1242. Also the Iniative Referendum Amendment.

Equal suffrage for women.

I favor the sale of foreign bonds held by the State of Minnesota, and the investment of the permanent funds of the state in improving our own, instead of loaning them to other states at a low rate of interest. The money should be used to finance our Counties, Cities, Drainage Projects, School Districts and Loans on Resident Farm Property.

I favor the increase in the royalities paid the State when the present mineral leases expire.

I favor Consolidation and Reduction of the State Board Commissions in the interests of economy.

I favor the submission of the liquor question to the vote of the people, to the end that communities where they are of the opinion that right living and higher morals may be attained by the elimination of liquor, may at least have an opportunity of putting their views to the test, that is, I favor County Option and if elected will vote for its adoption.

I also favor liberal allowances for advertising the resources of the State with a view of inducing immigration.

I firmly believe in the rule of the people and if elected shall support every measure which may tend to increase the power of the State government and all measures which may tend to the betterment of the condition in the rural communities.

Hoping you will give my platform due consideration and favor me with your franchise, I am most

SENSITIVE SEISMOGRAPHS.

They Serve Other Purposes Than Recording Earthquakes.

Contrary to popular belief, earthquakes are by no means rare occurrences. As a matter of fact practically all places on the surface of the earth experience some kind of tremor or shake at least once an hour, and lesser tremblings are even more frequent. This fact has been established since the opening throughout the world of stations where seismographs record the slightest movement of this earth of ours.

The seismographs can be made to serve several other useful purposes besides the recording of earthquakes. Some of them are so delicate that a railroad train running a mile away will affect them.

Seismograph records have frequently been produced in court to show that the operation of heavy machinery produced sufficient vibration in near by buildings to make the owners of the factory liable for damages.

Probably the most unusual purpose to which the seismograph has ever been put is that of determining the amount of vibration in a locomotive as a result of unbalanced driving wheels. Engineers have devised some ingenious methods of cutting down this vibration, which means a greatly decreased consumption of coal.—New York American.

The Highlanding ferry is now in good condition for crossing.

Wm. Causin drove down to Plummer, Sunday, after a new binder, returning Monday evening.

Some of the farmers will begin cutting barley this week, and harvest will be in full swing next week.

The Pennington county fair comes at a bad time of the year for the farmers to attend.

The late sown grain and flax is badly in need of rain, and late planted potatoes will be a very light crop.

Farmers should get their binder twine and have it ready for harvest, for if that railroad strike comes twine will be scarce.

Prairie chickens seems to be a light crop this year. The cold spring rains must have rotted the eggs during the hatching season.

That Electric Railroad will be sure to make cash market for hay this fall and winter.so do not be afraid of getting to much hay on hand this year.

Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Vaughan, Mr. and Mrs. T.S.Jacobson, Mr. Mrs. C.L.Clark, and Sigrud and Julia Sigurdson visited the County fair this week.

Mrs. W. G. Hunt and daughter Myrtle, visited the County Fair Wednesday and Thursday, returning Friday evening, while we did a little old fashioned batching for a couple of days.

The new townsite of Goodridge six miles north of Highlanding is certainly booming. Well let them "boom," but they will discover that it will be a some time before they get a creamery and newspaper.

Any man that has got a disposition to work, can easily make a good start in eastern Pennington county with very little capital to start with. Now is the time for the man of moderate means to make the start. while realestate is cheap.

About all the farmers will finish haying this week, and there is a large amount of hay put up this year, but it looks to bad to see the thousands of tons of fine hay that is going to waste in eastern Pennington county, and yet people continue to flock to the cities and kick about the high prices of beef.

W. H. Wilde seems to have lots of visits from sportsmen now days, who auto out to see if their hunting dogs will be ready for the chicken season. Mr. Wilde has about four acres of dogs that belong to owners from St.Paul to Plummer, that he boards and trains during the closed game season.

Automobile politicians should be a little careful about rushing up to a farmer's team that is hitched to a binder with a boy driver, and make them run away. If this happens to you, my friend be sure to get out of that entire territory without making yourself known, for you are likely to corner the entire vote of the neighborhood—against you.

Bernhard Knudsen has returned home from his Norway visit, and will get into the campaign for County Treasurer in earnest from now on. Mr. Knudsen is an old resident of Thief River Falls. and has a large acquaintance among the farmers, who have made the Central Hotel their headquarters since the Eleven Towns was opened. As chairman of the Republican Committee two years ago Mr. Knudsen made an enviable record for honor and integrity in politics, and we predict that the bread cast upon the waters at that time, will return next November.

HOLDUP MEN JAILED.

There is a big attendance at the County fair this week and it will be a good advertisement for the County. The usual number of the tough element, that always attend County fairs and circuses, was present and four of them heldup and robbed two farmers, and in just abut 40 minutes Sheriff J. W. LaBree had the four of them safe behind the bars of the county jail. Pennington county extends the the hand of welcome to strangers and invites them to join us and make their home here, but holdup men will find it an unprofitable field to operate in, as long as "Jess" is in that sheriff's office.

One of the Sights of Paris.

The Paris department stores are worse jumbles even than the English department stores. When there is a special sale under way the bargain counters are rigged up on the sidewalks. There, in the open air, buyer and seller will chaffer and bicker and wrangle and quarrel and kiss and make up again for all the world to see. One of the free sights of Paris is a frugal Frenchman with his face extensively haired over pawing like a Skye terrier through a heap of marked down lingerie, picking out things for the female members of his household to wear, now testing some material with his tongue, now holding a personal article up in the sunlight to examine the fabric—while his wife stands humbly, dumbly by, waiting for him to complete his selections.—Irving S. Cobb in Saturday Evening Post.

The minister studied a moment, glanced at the bride and hastily replied:

CHAPTER I.

Introducing a Pair of Scoundrels.

(In which I sail to see the Coronation and, incidentally, discover that I am a much-advertised-for person.)

"But, goodness gracious, Anne, you aren't going to England, are you? Wait till school closes in June, and we'll make up a party."

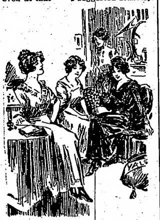
My room-mate, Mary Jenner, is meek enough when she is alone with me, but company lends her a fictitious persuasiveness. Besides, all the rest of the girls curled up among our cushions agreed with her—I could see it in their faces.

"If his sacred majesty, King George the Fifth, will consent to put off his coronation until July, I shall be glad to wait for you," I answered, with some asperity. "But I don't think it's likely, do you?"

"Well, but, Anne—" Mary was beginning, when Agnes Pomeroy broke in. Agnes is a plump girl with a vein of common sense amounting almost to genius.

"Look here," she said, "what's the use? You won't see a thing except the street processions. You might just as well stay in Winnipeg and read all about it in the illustrated London papers. Nobody can get into the Abbey without carrying a peer."

I put my nose in the air. "Well, even at that—" I suggested brazenly.



I Put My Nose in the Air. "Well, Even at That—"

The girls laughed, and Agnes shied a chocolate cream at me, missing me by about three feet.

"I don't believe even having red hair and being a mascot would accomplish a peer by coronation time, my dear," she said. "But by all means go ahead if you've set your heart on it. After school is out we'll join you."

"You let my red hair alone, Pomeroy Sec." I retorted wrathfully. "I'm twenty-two years old, and I guess I know how to take care of myself. And if you've got a determined temperament, and want something badly and all your friends put stupid obstacles in your way—why, it's enough to make a plaster angel feel annoyed."

Agnes only laughed, and ate another chocolate, though she knows they make her fatter, and my decision was accepted as an established fact, which I thought was another proof of my determined temperament.

It seems strange to look back on that kimono party now. I felt so old and capable and assured that nothing could possibly happen to me. If I had dreamed of the mad adventures that were so soon to begin—ah, well, perhaps I would have gone forward just the same. It is hardly twelve months since we sat by that crackling fire, but I feel as if it had been a thousand years. After all, twenty-two is very young.

But, at any rate, I had a perfectly good reason for leaving school two months before the end of the term. The doctor, who is an old friend of mine—I used to pull his mustaches when I wore pinafores—told me I had been working too hard, and was on the verge of a complete breakdown if I didn't at once have complete rest and change of scene. So I asked him if the air of any particular place would benefit me especially, and he pulled a curl for me and said he felt sure English air was the one thing for my ailment.

"Are you going to visit your ancestral castle?" asked Mary as I was packing. "It doesn't really seem polite to go so near and never say 'Bon jour.'"

"Of course," I answered, though really I hadn't thought about it before. "I'm going to see the Chateau Clichy, and also I'm going to try to recover my ancestral property. I've a bundle of bonds stacked up in a romantic old vault in Paris. Maybe I'll come back an heiress, or something extra nice about this adventure.

I haven't mentioned anything about my castle in France, have I? One doesn't talk about one's family, of course, but really, mine was very interesting. My grandfather is the Comte d'Yves, and owns a large feudal property in Clichy, which is in Normandy. My father was his son by his first marriage, and when father was hardly more than a boy, he quarreled with grandfather, who turned him out. Father came to Canada to make his fortune, drifted to the coast, and finally married an American girl in San Francisco. I was born there, my mother dying when I was only a baby, and my father when I was seventeen. After that I came to Winnipeg and taught for a living. Of course, things were hard sometimes, but father had a worse time than I, and for his sake I never could forgive grandfather for turning him out of doors.

"Some day, Anne," my father used to say laughingly, "you'll go back to France and be adopted and become heiress of Clichy."

"I guess the rest of them won't leave much for me to be heiress of," I answered usually, and the subject dropped. Save for a fluent knowledge of French I had nothing about me to betray the fact of my foreign extraction, and I never wished to meet any of my father's relatives—never! Sometimes my father would speak about the property in the strong box. It was all in bonds—worthless ones, too—which had been left my father by his mother, whose dowry had been invested in the old Panama canal, that glorious enterprise that went down to ruin twenty odd years ago, carrying with it thousands of prosperous families in a general wreck. My grandmother had always had a pathetic belief that some day the bonds would be worth something. She left them to my father, placing them in the strong box which she held in the vaults of Magniff & Co., bankers, of Paris and London. When she was dying she sent him the key.

"Well, Anne, they won't do any harm where they are," my father would say. "Some day, when we're all rich, we'll go to Paris and take them out and sell them for old paper."

So now I think I have explained how I came to sail for England on the thirty-first of May, with five $100 and one $50 bill in my purse and the key to the ancestral strong box. Mary wanted me to sew by bills into the lining of my dress. But I felt safer with the money in my purse, for, as I told her, I'd either have to wear the same dress all the time or keep running into my room to see whether it had been ripped open or not. If I had taken her advice I should never have had my adventure with the Man in the Buff Boots—but that comes later.

Mary, of course, was at the train in tears, waiting to bid me adieu. And who else should be there but that odious Mr. Spratt, who had once been enamored of me, half hidden behind an enormous bouquet. I've heard that his boys call him "The Sprat," which isn't a nice name to give a professor of civic and international law. He pressed the bouquet into one of my hands and then put something else into the other in a mysterious and portentous manner.

"My volume of the Code Napoleon, Miss Ives," he said, whispering cautiously. "The only complete English commentary on modern French law. I've written your name on the fly-leaf. Don't lose it; you'll need it when you get to Paris!"

I could not but feel affected by the little man's kindness in presenting me with a copy of his epoch-making work. I introduced him to Mary, and we three chatted for a few moments until the conductor called "All aboard!" I stayed a day or two in Montreal, sightseeing, and finally, owing to a last minute excursion to Mount Royal, nearly missed the steamer. But just as the whistles blew, I plunged hastily up the gangway, colliding at the top with a couple of foreign-looking men who stared at me for several minutes, apparently deeply interested.

I am usually quick to form my judgments of people. I did not like either of these fellow-passengers at all In a very short time I had discovered that they were master and servant, or stood in some such relation. The one bore the hall-marks of wealth without refinement; the other was a coarse and villainous-looking Greek or Armenian, as I judged. I was relieved when I saw him betake himself to the steerage. But judge my disgust when I discovered that I had been seated next to his master at the dinner table!

He did not lose any time striking up an acquaintance with me. "May I pass you the mustard, Miss Howard?" were his first words. He had evidently been looking me up and made a mistake in the name. I was about to disillusion him when his next words checked the words on my lips.

"Allow me to introduce myself, since we are to see so much of each other during our voyage," he continued, with an odious smirk. "My name is Magniff—Leopold Magniff—a name tolerably well known in Paris and elsewhere."

"The—the banker?" I managed to gasp.

"The son of the banker," he corrected, much gratified at my ready recognition. "The old boy's my father. We now control the second largest combination of capital in France, and the fourth largest in Europe," he added complacently. "Not that I'll step into the old donkey's shoes, though. He hates me like poison. I grieve to say that my father has a mind purely commercial and utterly incapable of appreciating any of the refinements of life."

It isn't often that I wish I were a man, but that's what I did just then, so that I might have had the pleasure of kicking him. But I smothered my rage and struggled with my surprise. It seemed like the opening of some wonderful melodrama, my chance encounter, with this man while on my way to Europe, to take my securities out of his father's safety deposit box. I murmured something and fled up to the deck. Later, Mr. Magniff appeared and engaged me in conversation for about an hour, until I found some excuse to dismiss him and go to bed.

During the next few days he made himself my constant companion. He seemed to time his appearances at the table so that we should sit down together. When I paced the deck I was sure to encounter him, whereupon, altering the direction of his walk, he would keep step with me. At evening, no sooner had I drawn up my chair in a comfortable and secluded place than he would discover me and immediately seat himself at my side. I made few acquaintances on the boat, so that my name was never mentioned in his presence, and it was characteristic of his complacency that he did not discover it.

When, by chance, I obtained a few minutes' respite from his odious presence, as sure as fate I would see him upon the lower deck in lengthy, and stealthy conference with the villainous Greek—for such I had discovered his nationality to be. There was a cross-eyed woman, apparently the servant's wife, whom I had observed with him, and after the first day, when Mr. Magniff would bring his servant up on our deck and keep him near while he engaged me in conversation, I began to notice that the woman would post herself below and watch my face with somber, never-winking eyes.

My curiosity became so great that I questioned Mr. Magniff about this strange pair of dependents. He burst into loud laughter.

"Poor Zeuxis is unhappily married," he chuckled when he could speak. "I took the fellow over to America with me, and his wife, who is insanely jealous of the scamp, followed on the next boat. Ever since that she has stuck to him closer than a leech. I fancy she imagines that he's trying to leave her."

"But why does she stare at me?" I demanded.

He hemmed and hawed a little.

"You're a good sport, Miss Howard," he confided at length. "I'll let you in. She's jealous of you. She thinks he's planning to elope with you. Ho, ho, ho!"

The cur collapsed into my chair and laughed. I started away indignantly, but he sprang to his feet and grasped me by the sleeve.

"Don't go," he begged. "I'll stop the fellow's insolence if you say the word. But Zeuxis has been useful to me in many ways, and just now we are planning to pull off a little coup in England which is going to net us a few thousands. Our last one failed, unfortunately."

"What was it?" I asked, my curiosity stimulated.

He looked at me leeringly. I believe that, for some occult reason, the rascal considered that he had made a conquest of me. At any rate, he began blabbing his story quite proudly into my eager ears.

"It's a long tale," he said. "To tell it I've got to go back to my father, and he ain't a pleasant subject."

"O, please go on," I said, as enticingly as I could. Somehow the idea had entered my head that this rogue in some way was bound up with the success or failure of my enterprise. Try as I might, I could not rid myself of the thought.

"Well," he began, drawing up a chair close to me, "you wouldn't think, to look at me, that my father started life as a humble horse-meat vendor in the Rue Strasbourg, would you?"

"I could believe it by a wild stretch of the imagination," I answered.

"Quite so," he answered, flattered. "Well, to do him justice, the old donkey has one of the shrewdest brains in France. Somehow he got in on the ground floor of the De Lesseps Panama concession and made millions out of it before it went to pieces. Then nothing would content him but that he become a country gentleman. With this end in view he bought a magnificent estate near Clichy, in Normandy, remodeled the castle in a ghastly manner, and laid out a deer park. But it didn't get him anywhere. Clichy is still a feudal province, and the old bounder's manners are such that the nobles of the locality had no use for him. Our presence there was completely ignored. For several years father and mother struggled to obtain social recognition, until at last they gave up the attempt, sold the estate and went back to Paris to live. But you can't stand up against the old man with impunity. He resolved to be revenged, and the man he most blamed for his troubles was the Comte d'Yves, a poverty-stricken old noble of Clichy—just a baggardly proud rat, Miss Howard—who thought himself too good to breathe the air that father did."

I was glad that it had grown too dark for Magniff to see my face.

"My father singled out the comte to feel the full weight of his hatred," he went on blandly. "The comte had been badly hit in the Panama bubble. He'd had some shares, but they disappeared in a mysterious manner. From that time onward my father bent all his endeavors toward bankrupting the comte and taking over his property. He's heavily mortgaged, and it seems only a matter of a few months now before father gets even with the old fool. He'd have done it long ago, only he was bringing off a coup of his own which meant millions to him."

My heart was hammering so hard it scarcely seemed possible that I could control my emotion. The plot was thickening—and I was in the very heart of it!

"Yes,' he continued, putting up his feet on the ship's rail, "there's only three of them alive in the direct line today; the comte, a very old man now, a daughter by a second marriage, and her son, the comte's grandson, a young fellow of twenty-five. There was a son by an earlier marriage, but he went to America and died there. I traced him to California and lost him there. The burning of San Francisco had destroyed all the records. I advertised in all the Pacific coast papers without result. There had been a marriage, and I believe there was one daughter. But she has vanished completely."

The uneven glow of his words, and a sudden suspicious odor on the night air, convinced me that the scoundrel had been drinking—not enough to render him tipsy, but just sufficient to unlock the doors of his secrets.

"So I told the old donkey"—by that phrase I interpreted him to mean Magniff, Sr.—"'you'd better hurry up with that revenge of yours,' I said, 'or they'll all be dead.' He'd cut my allowance to a beggarly ten thousand a year. He told me I was a bad egg, as he elegantly phrased it, and had disappointed all his hopes of having me succeed him in the banking business. 'All right, old boy,' I thought, 'I'll show you something original in the financial field.' You see, Miss Howard," he continued, lurching toward me. "I knew the secret of the bonds."

"Yes, what was it?" I cried.

He sobered immediately. "Now you'd like to know, wouldn't you?" he drawled. "You tantalizing little devil—"

I rose with great dignity and walked away, leaving him calling "Miss Howard! Miss Howard!" in desperate apology.

Thereafter, although my curiosity was burning, I avoided him sedulously, cutting him directly when we met and ignoring his advances at the dinner table. But he was so persistent that I was driven to all sorts of expedients to avoid him, and, when my need of a walk became urgent, I resorted to the long deck of the steerage, which was practically deserted, since few steerage passengers were returning to Europe at that season of the year.

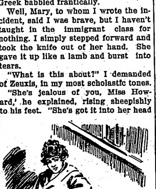
It must have been on the third night after when, while pacing the steerage deck after successfully eluding my pursuer, I became aware of a stir in the shadows of the sailors' fore-cabin, under the stern. Then a black shape came flying toward me, clasped me by the arm, and fell on its knees behind me, whirling me round to shield it against its pursuer, who came, cat-like, out of the darkness. Before I had time to be afraid I recognized that it was Zeuxis clutching me, Zeuxis in desperate fear, while, like a panther, his wife followed him, a knife in her hand, crouching for a spring.

"Safe me, safe me, Miss!" the Greek babbled frantically.

Well, Mary, to whom I wrote the incident, said I was brave, but I haven't taught in the immigrant class for nothing. I simply stepped forward and took the knife out of her hand. She gave it up like a lamb and burst into tears.

"What is this about?" I demanded of Zeuxis, in my most scholastic tones.

"She's jealous of you, Miss Howard,' he explained, rising sheepishly to his feet. "She's got it into her head that you're a rival of hers," he continued, caressing his long mustache proudly, as though he were a hero.



"Safe Me, Safe Me, Miss!" the Greek Babbled Frantically.

"Bah!" I exclaimed, in unutterable disgust.

"Quite so, quite so," said the Greek hurriedly. "If you would pretend to hate me miss, if you'd show your pretended contempt a little more openly, miss, you might convince her."

"Pretended?" I cried in fury. "You—you—"

"Say it, miss, say it," he whispered eagerly.

"I can't find words vile enough to characterize you," I answered, and turned upon my heel.

Later that evening he came creeping up to me.

"You've done it, miss," he whispered. "And if you ever want a friend, call upon me and I'll protect you."

"Done what?" I ejaculated.

"Convinced her, miss. You see, miss, Mr. Magniff, he's a joker, and he pretended that you was in love with me, just to torment her. But I've made her think I've jilted you, and I'm grateful, miss, indeed—"

Really, I could be angry no longer. Stifling a hysterical peal of laughter, I ran up to my deck and flung myself breathlessly into my chair.

I had escaped from the frying pan into the fire, however. For out of the dark another shadow arose—an unsteady shadow that quickly merged into a more substantial but still unsteady form. Magniff sat down beside me.

"You cruel little girl," he began inanely, "why have you fled from me all this time? Was it because you read my secret in my eyes? Miss Mary—"

He tried to seize my hand. The reception which I gave him seemed to sober him.

"Don't go, Miss Howard," he begged in maudlin tones. "Forgive me. I guess I'm a bad egg after all, as the old asinine party characterized me. I've knocked about the world and never found a friend but you. Stay with me, Miss Howard, and I'll tell you a secret. There's millions in it if we can locate the party."

"Well?" I said coldly, my curiosity getting the better of my judgment.

"It's a girl," he babbled. "And she's got some Panama bonds and don't know the value of them. If we can trace her—"

"Yes, Mr. Magniff?" I answered artlessly.

"Why, we can hold a club over the asinine party and extract a cool half million. You see, if she were to meet the old comte and he adopted her and took the bonds—what am I saying about the comte? I mean a certain elderly party—" he explained craftily—"why, he could pay off the mortgage that the asinine party holds over him. That would mean an end to the asinine party's schemes of revenge. Now, Miss Mary, if we can locate this girl and get the bonds from her at a trifling cost, pretending that they are worthless, we can threaten the asinine party that we'll deliver them to the other old party unless he pays us what we demand. See the point? Two birds in the hand; a fortune for you and me, and a club for the asinine person."

"And why do you make this proposition to me?" I asked.

"Because I love you, Mary," he cried, seizing my hand. "That's nothing to the next trick Zeuxis and I have up our sleeves. There's millions for all of us. I think you're an angel. What do you think of me?"

"I think you are a miserable scoundrel," I answered furiously, rising out of my chair.

To my astonishment he received my outburst with a peal of laughter.

"That's what I like," he cried, trying to seize my hand again. "Give me a girl with some spirit in her. Miss Mary! You can't imagine how much I've been thinking of you since we met aboard this old boat. Let's make a date in London. Want to see the coronation? Maybe I can get you a seat and show you round. Let's go—"

I turned on him, my eyes flashing, my anger so furious that for a few moments I could hardly find my tongue. I think I must have overawed him, for he seemed to wilt away under the blast of my rage, and waited dumbly.

"Listen to me, Mr. Magniff," I cried, shaking my finger at him. "Some of my friends have been good enough to tell me that I am a mascot and bring people good luck. I've brought good luck to you, better than you deserve, at any rate, because I am the woman whom you and your servant have been looking for. My name is not 'Miss Howard.' I am Anne Ives, and my father was Jules d'Yves, born at Clichy, in Normandy."

I saw him stagger at that; the blow went home.

"Here," I cried, snatching it from my purse and holding it up to him, "This is the key to the box which contains my bonds, and I am going to Paris to redeem my property. It is mine, and I shall dispose of it to suit my inclinations."

He started toward me incredulously. He made a desperate clutch at the key. But, with a hysterical laugh, I withdrew it from his outstretched hand and fled along the deck, down the stairs and locked myself in my stateroom.

I did not leave it until we docked at Plymouth. But once, lying upon my bunk, I saw a shadow fall upon the wall, and looking out, saw him pacing the lower deck beside his hawk-eyed, eagle-beaked servitor, and an involuntary shudder came over me.

He was waiting to accost me at Plymouth, but I eluded him in the crowd. I ran the length of the station platform, dashed into the train and out the opposite side, and had the pleasure of seeing him start for London without me, under the firm conviction that I was in the train.

CHAPTER II.

The Mascot of the Monoplane.

(In which I venture an ascension into the ether and nearly lose my dignity.)

I found a nice little boarding-house in one of those large, quiet, old squares near the British museum, and was very comfortable there. I made several friends, notably a Mrs. Christie, an American widow about ten years older than myself and twice as eager for amusement. One thing I soon discovered: It was impossible to get into the Abbey to see the coronation.

Mrs. Christie was greatly distressed.

"I must see it, Anne," she confided to me, as we sat together in her little room in the boarding-house. "Don't you suppose that the lord chamberlain would let me in if he knew that I represent the city of Cedar Plank, Ia?"

It appeared that the inhabitants of her native town had held a voting contest for the purpose of sending their most popular society member to represent them at the coronation, and Mrs. Christie had been elected by a very large majority—I think of seventy-five.

"Which was enormous, my dear Anne," Estelle Christie confided, "when you reflect that the adult voting population of Cedar Plank numbers only four hundred and fifty, or thereabouts."

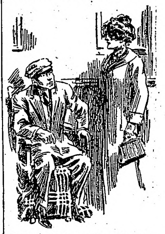
She had drafted a letter to the lord chamberlain embodying her request. I feared that it would elicit an unsatisfactory response, and in order to divert her thoughts, I picked up the newspaper and said:

"In the meantime, Estelle, why shouldn't we go to see the great aeroplane contest at South Norwood?"

She sprang up, clapping her hands. Estelle had a very volatile mind, and my little scheme had succeeded admirably.

"I dote on aeroplanes, Anne," she cried. "When is it?"

"This afternoon," I answered. "Listen, Estelle, 'Eight competitors, representing England, America, France, Italy and Germany, will enter their machines in the soaring and speed tests. A novel feature will be the soaring with one passenger and descending with the motor cut off, a prize of five hundred pounds being offered to the aviator making the highest record.'"



"I Think You Are a Miserable Scoundrel."

"Have you ever been in an aeroplane, Anne?" asked Estelle, already putting on her hat.

"Indeed I have," I said. "I even know how to manage a monoplane a little. One of the men I know is an enthusiast, and has given me several lessons."

"How perfectly wonderful!" she exclaimed, searching vainly for a veil. "O, Anne, just think! There may be a terrible accident."

All thought of the coronation had already left her mind. I could hardly keep pace with her as we hurried along the streets towards the railway station. And all the way down in the train she talked incessantly of the spectacle in prospect and asked me countless questions. We arrived at the grounds just as the competition opened and obtained seats in the very first row of the grand stand. The clerk wanted to put us somewhere at the back, but when I pleaded with him he changed his mind.

"However did you get such perfect seats?" asked Estelle as we found ourselves with an unobstructed view of the field.

I laughed. "Did I never tell you that I am everybody's mascot?" I answered lightly.

"What's that?" she said.

"O, it means a bringer of luck," I told her. "All my friends know that. I bring success to everybody—except myself."

Estelle did not reply. She was looking intently at the great machines which were being carried out of their sheds and placed at various starting points upon the field. There was a huge monoplane in front of us, which we could see quite plainly. Its driver, a tall, good-looking man in gray and blue, with a pair of intensely penetrating eyes and a calm smile, was seating himself in the machine, ready for flight, and looking as quiet and collected as though his enterprise were a thing of no consequence. While I watched him, breathless with excitement, somebody must have given a signal, for suddenly I saw his huge machine run a little way along the course and then, with a swift, gliding movement, suddenly rise into the air and wing its way around the field.

"O," gasped Estelle, clutching my arm. "O!"—as the driver made a circuit and whirled past us, the wind from the pinions almost sweeping our faces—"isn't he handsome!"

Her words made me quite cross.

"Don't be so silly, Estelle," I answered. Then, inspired by some malicious spirit, I asked:

"Do you still hope that there will be an accident?"

"No, no," she cried terrified. "O, Anne, he musn't fall."

"Do be quiet," I urged. "People are looking at us."

Lew Dockstader, the minstrel, was introduced recently to a man who owned a place in New Hampshire.

"Lots of good fishing up your way?" asked Dockstader. "I hear you own a farm up the White mountain way."

"Good fishing!" cried the other, enthusiastically. "Well, Mr. Dockstader, I went out one morning recently and brought back 17 trout for breakfast. Got 'em in a half hour's time, too. We had guests at the cottage and they thought that quite remarkable."

"Glad I met you, sir," said Dockstader, holding out his hand with a look of admiration. "I'm a professional myself."

"A professional!" exclaimed the other. "What, fisherman?"

"No," was the answer, "no—orator."—Green Book Magazine.

A German princeling went to pay a visit of ceremony to a small but ancient and honorable city situated upon a branch line of railway. His serene highness had just stepped from his private car upon the bunting-bedecked station platform. Greetings had been exchanged with the local receiving party.

"And what," said the prince to the burgomaster, "are those children doing there on the tracks?"

"Serene highness," replied the burgomaster, bowing low, "those are the young maidens of the city who ran before and scattered flowers in front of the locomotive of your highness' train."

VOICE OF CONSCIENCE DEAD

All the Fault of Nurse That Small Girl Could Not Walk in the Straight Path.

Maria had been naughty and mother, seriously remonstrating with her, thought to press home a needed suggestion.

"I can't think why you persist in doing wrong, my dear," she said, solemnly. "It always makes us unhappy when we do wrong."

"But—but I often don't know it's wrong till I've done it," sighed the small culprit.

"But," mother urged again, "you should know, my darling. Your conscience will tell you if you listen."

"What is my conscience and how will it tell me?" wide-eyed and eager.

"Your conscience is the little voice inside you that says 'No!' when you shouldn't do things and makes you feel sorry when you've made mistakes."

"Oh, then I'll never be good!" mourned the troubled sinner. "I had a voice like that once, but nurse said it was indigestion and she gave me some medicine and it died."

UNSIGHTLY PIMPLES ON FACE

New Sharon, Iowa.—"Two or three years ago pimples began to come on my face and I had dandruff. The pimples made a very unsightly appearance. They were red and numerous, some came to a head and festered and the itching caused me to scratch them. The dandruff on my head could be plainly seen.

"I tried several remedies but they only temporarily relieved me. I had been bothered with the trouble two or three years when I decided to try Cuticura Soap and Ointment. So I sent for a free sample and I noticed relief from them, and I bought more. I used two cakes of Cuticura Soap and two boxes of Cuticura Ointment and am now free from pimples and dandruff." Some Headline.

At the time of the Volturno disaster a literary critic for a certain New York newspaper was acting as substitute for a copy reader who was ill. It fell to him to write a head for the story of the disaster. The story was full of thrills, of course, and he was told to condense them all in a big black line to extend across the page, leading the paper.

He thought for some time, tore up several attempts, and finally submitted this: "O Restless Sea!"

CONTROL OF THE CORN SMUT

Disease Cannot Be Restrained by Treating Seed—One-Year Rotation Is One Recommendation.

(By W. W. ROBBINS, Colorado Agricultural College.)

The question is frequently asked: Can corn smut be controlled by treating the seed? It cannot. For the most part, corn smut spores rest over the winter in the soil or in the manure pile. Infection of the corn plant may take place at any time during its life, although usually not until it has attained a height of two or three feet. Furthermore, infection may take place in any part of the plant where there is fresh growing tissue.

Corn should never be planted on soil that grew a smutted crop the previous year. A one-year rotation is usually sufficient to destroy a large number of smut spores resting over in the soil. Remove and burn the smutted masses on the young plants. Corn smut spores pass through the alimentary canal of stock without having their germinating power destroyed. This probably explains the fact that fields heavily manured often suffer more from corn smut than those lightly manured or not manured at all. The spores, however, do not live long in the manure. Hence old manure is better than fresh to spread on a cornfield. It is known that some varieties of corn are more susceptible to smut than others and it is also very probable that a variety that is not acclimated is more subject to smut than one well acclimated.

ATTENTION TO YOUNG FOALS

Within an Hour After Arrival of Colt It Should Be Standing and Getting First Milk.

(By L. C. BARNES, Colorado Experiment Station.)

If the mare foals in barn, one should provide her with a roomy box stall with plenty of straw. Within an hour after the arrival of the colt it should be standing and getting its first nourishment. If it cannot stand give it help, as the first milk is valuable not only as a food but also as a natural purge which rids the intestines of the meconium.

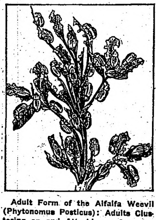
It is well to put a wide bandage around the body of the colt and protect the navel from becoming infected from the stable. Some use a dusting powder of equal parts tannic and boric acid on the navel before applying the bandage. The navel should be kept protected until it becomes dry.

If the colt strains considerably soon after birth one should relieve this suffering by warm water injections. If the first feces are very hard a dose of raw linseed oil will be advisable.

DAMAGE BY ALFALFA WEEVIL

Insect Has Proved Most Destructive Pest in Western States—Measures for Eradication.

The insect known as the alfalfa weevil (Phytonomus posticus Gyll.) is about the size of a grain of wheat, brown in color, with a long slender snout, much like the plum curculio. Imported from the eastern hemisphere it has become established in the region of country near Great Salt Lake, Utah, whence it has spread into Idaho and Wyoming. It has proved a most destructive pest of alfalfa and the production of seed has been impossible in the localities where it has occurred. It is being investigated by the United States department of agriculture in order to find some means of preventing or reducing its ravages. These measures have consisted of the application of mechanical devices for destroying the young weevils in the fields, destroying the adults in their hibernating places, and the introduction of its natural enemies into this country from Europe, where they seem to effectually prevent serious injuries from its attacks on alfalfa.



Adult Form of the Alfalfa Weevil (Phytonomus Posticus): Adults Clustering on and Attacking a Spray of Alfalfa. (Slightly Enlarged.)

Care in Covering Seeds.

Too much care cannot be exercised in covering seed properly. The tendency is to cover too deeply. Such crops as onions, squash, parsnips and lima beans push up the shells of the seed itself and find it difficult to force their way through a very great depth of earth after it is packed down by rains.

Essentials Overlooked.

Particular stress has been put upon the value of lime in all soils growing clover and alfalfa, with the result that many overlook other essentials and seem to think they will have clear sailing when soil acidity is corrected.

NEW EXPERIENCE FOR BARBER

First Time He Had Shaved Man Whose Face Had an Unequal Growth of Hair.

Capt. W. V. Lucas, who was an officer in the Fourteenth Iowa regiment, tells an amusing story of an incident that occurred during General Price's raid into Missouri in the last year of the Civil war. The story appears in "Pilot Knob," by Messrs. C. A. Peterson and J. M. Hanson.

"On arriving at Pilot Knob the afternoon before the engagement of the Twenty-seventh, I went into a barber shop to be shaved. Suddenly, when the barber had shaved only one-half of my face, the long roll was beaten. I left my chair instantly, and reached my company, half a block away, with one side of my face shaved smooth, whereas the other displayed a two weeks' growth of beard. I did not complete the shave until six days afterward, when a colored barber did the job at Rolla, 75 miles away. While working the dirt and sand out of the 'long side,' the fellow's curiosity was excited, until he could no longer refrain from comments.

"'I nevah see a face befo', sah,' said he, 'dat one side was richer dan de odder; but yo's is, suah!'

"My explanation seemed to afford him great relief."—Youth's Companion.

Nothing New.

Apropos of certain fresh revelations of corruption in the realms of high finance, Thomas W. Lawson said at a dinner in Boston:

"Columbus found out that the world was round. But surely lots of investors before him must have found out that it was anything but square."

After reaching the pinnacle of fame, many a climber has found it an uncomfortable roost.

NEW IDEA

Helped Wisconsin Couple.

It doesn't pay to stick too closely to old notions of things. New ideas often lead to better health, success and happiness.

A Wis. couple examined an idea new to them and stepped up several rounds on the health ladder. The husband writes:

"Several years ago we suffered from coffee drinking, were sleepless, nervous, sallow, weak and irritable. My wife and I both loved coffee and thought it was a bracer." (Delusion.)

"Finally, after years of suffering, we read of Postum and the harmfulness of coffee, and believing that to grow we should give some attention to new ideas, we decided to test Postum.

"When we made it right we liked it and were free of ills caused by coffee. Our friends noticed the change—fresher skin, sturdier nerves, better temper, etc.

"These changes were not sudden, but increased as we continued to drink and enjoy Postum, and we lost the desire for coffee.

"Many of our friends did not like Postum at first, because they did not make it right. But when they made Postum according to directions on pkg., they liked it better than coffee and were benefited by the change."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Postum now comes in two forms:

Regular Postum—must be well boiled. 15c and 25c packages.

Instant Postum—is a soluble powder. Made in the cup with hot water—no boiling. 30c and 50c tins.

The cost per cup of both kinds is about the same.

Aladdin Looks for Beauty.

Aladdin rubbed his lamp. Almost immediately there was a sound at the door and the slave entered.

"Bring me the prettiest girl in New York," said Aladdin, "and get a move on you, too."

The slave vanished, and almost in an instant the door opened, and the slave, bearing in his arms the prettiest girl in New York, entered and put her down in a chair. Aladdin looked at her in astonishment. She had on a shabby dress. Her hair was tousled. Evidently she was from the East side.

"What are you trying to do?" he said to the slave. "Why don't you fill your order correctly? I asked for the prettiest girl in New York."

"Here she is, your honor."

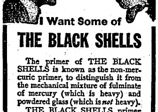
"Impossible!"

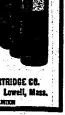
"I never make a mistake."—Life.

The Other Side of It.

"The early bird catches the worm," observed the sage.

"Yes," replied the fool, "but look how much longer he has to wait for dinner time."





I Want Some of THE BLACK SHELLS

The primer of THE BLACK SHELLS is known as the non-mercuric primer, to distinguish it from the mechanical mixture of fulminate of mercury (which is heavy) and powdered glass (which is not heavy).

THE BLACK SHELLS primer is a strictly chemical combination and so is sure, quick and uniform—always uniform.

Our flash passage is double the usual size, allowing all of the fiercely hot primer flame to rush into the main charge. This develops the very utmost force from the powder and gives a long-distance killing power that will amaze you.

At the traps, and in the stubble-field, the man who begins to shoot THE BLACK SHELLS finds that he has become a better shot.

These shells are waterproof—really waterproof. They won't swell in foggy weather. They eject with a snap on the meanest days. THE BLACK SHELLS have a solid brass head which gives the gases of explosion no "battery-cup" crevices through which to leap backward.

THE BLACK SHELLS are loaded with the celebrated Tatham shot.

Send for our free book and learn why so many men are saying, "I want some of THE BLACK SHELLS." Ask for it on a post card.

Human Documents of Married Life

By Virginia T. Van de Water

Intimate and Human, Intensely Alive, Each Story Presenting a Problem Which Might Occur to Any One of Us at Any Time

WHY WE ARE LIVING TOGETHER

SOME persons express surprise that one marriage out of every dozen ends in divorce or separation. To my way of thinking, the marvel is that the percentage is so small. I have wondered at it times without number. Yet John Wallace and I still live together. Perhaps other couples have reasons as cogent as ours for not separating, reasons which, so far as the world can see, have kept us a united pair for all these years.

Marriage without love is a crime, say good people. How about a marriage in which the parties to the contract have ceased to love each other? Is life together under such circumstances sin? That is a question which I ask myself often. Up to the present date it has remained unanswered.

I was twenty-five years old when I married. I had been a teacher in a public school in a suburban town to which John Wallace came one spring to superintend the erection of a house for which he had drawn the plans. The wife of the owner of the house had been kind to me, and, through her, I met the successful young architect. At the end of three months we were engaged; at the end of a year we were married.

That I was in love with him I did no doubt.

I know that he loved me, for, if not, why he did marry me?

Of course, when we married, John and I went to the city to live. I loved the metropolis and the busy, rushing life there, and I doubt if any bride was ever happier in her new home than I was at first.

John was older than I. He was thirty-three when we were married. During his bachelor days he had made many friends, some of whom I liked, and others of whom I did not admire. He insisted that I be nice to them all. I did not fancy this idea. Now that I was independent of the need of propitiating members of a board of education, or the wives of school trustees, I wanted to enjoy this freedom. To me, it seemed insincere to be especially nice to rich people in the hope that they might, as John said, "give him a job." I told him this when he regretted that I had not made myself more agreeable to a man by whom I had chanced to sit at a dinner party the night before.

"He has influence, and can get me a great deal of work," explained my husband.

"How?" asked I.

"He owns a lot of property that is increasing in value and as he sells to men whom he knows and with whom his word goes, he could, naturally, mention my name as a good fellow to make plans for the buildings they expect to put up. Moreover, he is interested in city affairs, and, by advising managers of public institutions to engage my services, can throw thousands of dollars in my way. So you should have been nice to him. And you weren't. I kept an eye on you, and you scarcely talked to him at all."

"I know it," I said, irritated at this criticism of my manners. "He talked of nothing but himself and his money. That kind of thing is not good form."

He renewed the subject the next morning. "Isabel," he began, "you remember that we were talking of Jacob Welch yesterday. You may recall that I took his wife in to dinner the same night on which you snubbed her husband. Well, she is a nice little thing. I told her you would be glad to have her call on you, for she said she would like to know you better."

"But, dear," I protested, "they're such ordinary people—she and her husband!"

John laughed good-naturedly. "But, dear," he mocked, "they're such influential people—she and her husband! So be nice when Mrs. Welch calls."

She came, and I was as pleasant as I could be to a woman with whom I had nothing in common. The next week she wrote, asking us to dine with her ten days later.

"I don't care to accept," I told my husband. "The dinner is going to be one of those big, formal affairs to which we have not been invited before because we are not in the rich set. I've heard enough about them not to want to go."

"Well, I do want to go," insisted John. "At least, while I do not expect to derive any particular pleasure from the function, I know that it may mean business. So write a letter accepting."

On the night of the big dinner I dressed with great care. I thought I was still enough of a girl to look well in the dainty white China crepe gown I wore.

As I removed my wraps in the dressing room of the great house, assisted by a supercilious maid, I glanced at another woman who had just entered. Solomon in all his glory would have looked like a Friar of Orders Gray by comparison with her.

Later I found that the costume I had just beheld was but one of many—all gorgeous, all with long trains, all cut low—some to the point of indecency. Jewels sparkled from necks, breasts, and coiffures, and when the guests removed their gloves at table they revealed fingers loaded with rings. I felt like a meek and short-tailed white Leghorn hen in a poultry yard full of peacocks.

With this thought in mind I looked across the table to where John sat next his hostess, chatting as if he had been brought up in this set. The sight irritated me. I shook myself mentally, reminded myself that I was better born than these people, and, meeting John's warning glance, turned to the man by whom I sat and talked to him as fast and as thoughtlessly as my tongue would permit.

What a dreary evening it was! And yet, as men came in from the dining-room, and I suggested to John that it was time to leave, he looked genuinely disappointed and expressed surprise at the lateness of the hour. In the cab on our way home he asked:

"Well, did you have a good time?"

"I can't remember," I said slowly, "that in all my life before I ever had such a dreadful evening. Those women were the greatest bores I ever knew. They think that life consists in buying clothes and jewelry. Both the men and women are common, through and through."

"I noticed," returned my husband, with a vexed laugh, "that you managed to enjoy their champagne pretty thoroughly, and you did not seem much bored as long as you had a man next to you to whom to talk."

And this was his appreciation of my sacrifice! I thought it over that night and wondered if any man was ever grateful. A few days later when John told me of an order he received from Mr. Welch to submit to him plans for a new country place, I only remarked that I was "glad some good came out of so much discomfort."

John looked at me for a moment, then said, sarcastically: "Wifely sympathy in one's work is delightful. In your case it is conspicious by its absence."

I have dwelt at such length upon the above incident because in looking back at our married life it seems that, until this time, my husband and myself had never really had any hard feeling, or any serious difference of opinion. I always felt that the Welch episode was the entering wedge that split the unseasoned wood of our married life.

John's plans for the Welch country place were approved, and, that he might keep an eye on the work as it progressed, it was decided that we take a furnished cottage in the vicinity the following summer. I was willing to do this, for I liked the outdoor life and preferred having our own home to going to a summer hotel. I decided to have Sarah, my sister, spend her vacation with us. A distant cousin was to visit my parents for a few months, and suggested that Sarah take a needed rest during this period. So my young and attractive sister came to us.

I did not appreciate how young and attractive she really was until I saw John's eyes light with pleasure when she came down the cottage stairs to dinner the night of her arrival.

My husband sprang to his feet and met her at the foot of the stairs with outstretched hands. To my astonishment, and, I think, to hers also, he bent and kissed her.

The presence of a pretty girl in one's home precludes the possibility of a quiet time. I learned this soon after Sarah's arrival, as the young people in the neighborhood, after meeting her once, wanted to know her better. What were called in the country community "the summer folks," formed a jolly colony. Sarah was almost as popular with the girls as with the men. She was what is known as "a man's woman," yet her own sex liked her, too. She seemed so naive that the only persons who suspected her of not being an ingenue were the matrons whose husbands admired her.

I confess that I was one of these. That my husband found in my pretty sister a charming companion was somewhat of a surprise to me, for I had never seen him really attentive to any woman but myself. I said nothing about it until one afternoon when the express-wagon, delivering parcels that had come out from the city, left at our door a superb hamper of fruit, addressed to Sarah.

"From one of your admirers!" I said jokingly.

I did not for a moment associate the arrival of the fruit with the fact that John had gone into town that morning on an early train.

"I really believe it is from Brother John," she said eagerly. "Last night I told him that I thought the farmers about here supply us with the meanest peaches and plums I ever ate, and that I would like to go into town long enough to get all the fruit I wanted."

"Don't flatter yourself," I remarked dryly. "John has not the habit of remembering that kind of hint. I have asked him three times lately to bring out some fruit from the city, and he has forgotten the request before he reached the front gate."

By this time Sarah's fingers had torn off the stout paper wrappings, and the hamper stood uncovered. Beneath the lid which she lifted was a mass of plums—yellow, purple, and crimson—rows of luscious peaches and clusters of golden pears. An envelope lay on top of the fruit. I glanced over Sarah's shoulder as she drew forth the card it enclosed. The words leaped up to me:

For the dearest of little sisters—from "Brother John."

I turned away abruptly and entered the house. Sarah ran after me.

"Isabel!" she exclaimed, "you are not angry, are you?"

"Of course not," I asserted, trying to speak indifferently. "Only, it is amusing to see how John remembers your hints for fruit, and forgets my requests for it."

"But, dear, this is for you, too—all that you want of it. You know"—with a laugh—"that I could not eat all of that stuff in a month. And I know John would want you to have some."

Her words angered me. That my sister was telling me what my own husband would wish irritated me unspeakably. I jerked myself away from her detaining hand.

"When I want you to interpret John's wishes so far as I am concerned I will tell you, Sarah. I am aware that had you not almost asked for the fruit he would never have sent it to you. As you are our guest, he could hardly refuse to comply with your suggestion, especially when you prefaced it by the information that in our home you missed the delicacies you craved."

Sarah's temper, too, rose at this slur. "And yet you suggested a few minutes ago that John had gratified my desires and slighted yours!" she retorted. "You are a trifle inconsistent, my dear sister!"

A guest coming up the walk interrupted our altercation, and, leaving Sarah to greet him, I ran up-stairs. Alone, I tried to face the situation. How should I meet it? I could not deny that I had put myself in the wrong by showing my sister that my husband's action had angered me. But, since I recognized this, I could be on my guard not to let John suspect that I was hurt. I called on my pride to help me, and, at dinner that night, it stood me in good stead, for I chatted and laughed gaily with two young men, Sarah's friends, who were dining with us. More young people called in the evening, and, after a while, Mr. and Mrs. Welch came by in their automobile and sat with us for a half-hour. When they left, I lingered to talk for a moment with the girls and their escorts, who, in hammocks and rockers, half filled our veranda; then, explaining that, as I had a slight headache, I would ask to be excused and leave my husband to chaperon the party, I went up-stairs. There the depression of the afternoon returned, and I went miserably to bed and lay listening to the sounds of merry voices below until I fell asleep. I awoke with a start, conscious that all was still. Sitting up in bed, I listened. Had the young people gone home? Where was John?

Slipping my feet into my bed-shoes, and throwing a wrapper around me, I stole down-stairs. The front door stood wide open, and the veranda was flooded with moonlight. I heard two voices in low conversation—my sister's and my husband's. Creeping into the living-room, outside the window of which the pair sat, I stood and strained my ears. Sarah was speaking in plaintive tones:

"It spoiled my pleasure in your beautiful gift, brother. Perhaps you ought not to have sent it, since Isabel feels as she does."

John's feet moved impatiently on the floor. "Isabel is ridiculously jealous!" he exclaimed. "Pay no attention to it. My giving you fruit takes nothing from her. She has her place, and she knows it. Don't be a foolish child, but let me make believe that I am a real brother. And a real brother would have the right to kiss you and tell you to cheer up. Which I shall now proceed to do."

I watched him as he carried out his threat, and I saw Sarah's white hand steal up and caress his cheek before he straightened himself with a sigh of weariness or repression.

"Come!" he said abruptly. "This is too lovely a night to go in yet. Let us take a turn down to the gate and back, and look at the moon."

As they passed beyond earshot I went back to my room and, crouching at my own window, saw the two stroll up and down, chatting with apparent lightness, for Sarah's laugh rang out more than once. At last they entered the house, and Sarah started up-stairs. I sprang into bed and pretended to be asleep when she passed my door. As she went into her own room I heard the clock strike one. Glancing at my watch to be sure I was not mistaken, I went into my husband's room and was waiting for him as he entered. He was whistling softly under his breath when I addressed him from where I stood in the darkness.

"Lord!" he exclaimed, and, even in the dim light, I could see him start. "You come creeping upon one like a ghost, Isabel! I thought you were in bed long ago."

"I was," I replied sullenly. "And where have you been?"

"Down on the veranda, smoking," he answered calmly, turning on his light and proceeding to take off his coat. I looked at him as he stood there, nonchalantly winding his watch, the picture of a man at peace with himself and the world at large. I longed to disturb his equanimity.

"With whom have you been talking all this time?" I asked accusingly.

His reply was in the same unconcerned tone, "With some half-dozen guests whom you left to my tender mercies when you went off to your room some two hours ago."

"Some three hours ago, you mean!" I exclaimed. "Since when you have been tete-a-tete with Sarah."

"I wish I had!" he asserted, still coolly. "But the last of her admirers, except myself"—with a little bow and smile—"did not leave until a few minutes before twelve. She is, apparently, a most attractive maiden if the length of her visitors' calls is any criterion."

"You seem to find her so," I sneered, "if one may judge by the time you have been sitting alone with her after decent people should be in bed."

"I note that you are not there," he said, also sneeringly.

"Because I cannot sleep when I know that my husband and sister are violating all proprieties by making love until the small hours of morning!"

He turned suddenly toward me. "Be careful what you say!" he exclaimed. "Jealousy is bad enough, but such insults as that are vile. You wrong your sister and me, and you know it!"

"I know," I declared, beginning to cry, "that you have been sitting outside talking to Sarah for the past hour, that you often kiss her, that you send her fruit, and Lord knows what else you do!"

"Fortunately he does know," burst forth John, "and I wish that he would put some sense into your head. I do kiss your sister, as if she were my own sister; I do sit and chat of innocent matters with her; I did send her fruit—and all of these things I do in an open frank manner. And for them I am insulted as if I were the veriest rascal that ever lived. For Heaven's sake, stop that sniveling!"

Without another word my husband took me by the shoulders and, as if I had been a child, walked me in front of him into my room, and, leaving me standing there, still convulsed with sobs, went deliberately back into his own room, and I heard the key turn in the door of communication.

After this the fact that I doubted my husband seemed to make him less careful than he used to be, and I observed that he was attentive to a number of pleasant women, treating each of them with a devoted manner that implied that she was the one person in the world with whom he wished to talk. I mentioned this to him one day, saying that it was strange how many more pleasant times he had with women than I had with men.

"Men pay me little attention," I remarked, adding spitefully, "That kind of thing is not in my line."

"That is your misfortune, not my fault," he replied tersely.

Again I felt the angry tears come to my eyes. "If you consider it a misfortune, I will try to remedy it!" I declared.

"Good luck to you!" said John with an easy laugh.

I was as good as my word, and, setting aside my prim ideas, I made myself as agreeable to the men of the summer colony as I could. I was surprised that I found it easy to talk nonsense when I had once acquired the habit. But, contrary to my desires, I did not succeed in making my husband jealous, nor did my conduct call forth a single protest from him until just before our return to town.

It was a lovely day in early September, the last week of Sarah's sojourn with us. John announced at the breakfast-table that he would like to go on a boating excursion that afternoon, and invited Sarah and myself to accompany him. When the hour came to start I remained above-stairs until John came up to see what was detaining me, as he and Sarah were waiting.

"Aren't you ready?" he asked pleasantly.

"Is Sarah going?" I inquired.

"You know she is," he said.

"I shall not go if she goes," I said firmly. "You must choose between us this time." I tried to speak steadily, but failed.

"Isabel, she is your sister and your guest!" John reminded me.

"And she is, apparently, your owner and your best beloved!" I exclaimed.

As usual, the tears came to my eyes and rolled down my cheeks. My husband sprang forward and dropped his hands heavily on my shoulders.

"Stop that!" he ordered, and I thought that he was going to shake me. "Will you go with us or will you not?"

"I won't go if Sarah does," I whimpered, "and you can go down and tell her so!"

He turned away abruptly. "Then we will go without you!" he declared.

The sound of an automobile horn drew me to the window. Mr. Welch was coming, driving his own car. A reckless impulse sent me running down-stairs. I was dressed for the outing which I had refused. I had stopped crying some time ago, so my eyes were no longer red. I flattered myself that my pallor was rather becoming.

"Well!" exclaimed Mr. Welch as I appeared on the veranda. "Where is your husband!"

"Out sailing," I replied lightly.

"Alone?"

"No," I answered, trying to speak unconcernedly, "my sister is with him. They wanted me to go, but I had a slight headache, and I feared the glare on the water."

"Oh, I see," he said musingly, and I felt that he saw more than I had told him. I found myself blushing under his steady gaze, and, involuntarily, I dropped my eyes.

"I have a plan!" he declared. "I ran over to ask your husband to take a ride with me, but since he is not here I will take some one I would rather have; namely, his dear little wife!"

"Where's Mrs. Welch?" I asked falteringly.

"Away on a visit to her sister, so I am, for a few days, an old bachelor whose comings and goings concern nobody but himself—and, in this case, your ladyship."

We were soon rolling along briskly between green fields and up and down wooded hills.

When we had been riding for an hour and a half we drew up at the door of an attractive inn, and Mr. Welch insisted on seating me at one of the tables on the broad, vine-shaded veranda.

The sun was low in the west when we started toward home. At the end of a half-hour something about the machine gave out, and we came to a standstill. Then I saw how good and kind the man I had once snubbed could be. There we left the automobile and strolled over to a country store where there was a telephone. He rang up my house, then handed me the receiver, saying:

"Perhaps you would like to talk with your husband yourself."

It was John's voice that answered my "Hello!"

"I have been on an automobile ride," I said, " and hope to get home some time this evening. Don't wait dinner for me."

"Where are you?" asked my husband.

"I don't know," I replied laughingly.

"Who's with you?"

"Mr. Welch."

"Nobody else?"

"No—why should there be?"

"A third person improves appearances in such cases," he said harshly.

"So I thought when you went out this afternoon," I remarked.

When the repaired machine was ready, Mr. Welch proposed that, as we would reach home too late for dinner, we run over to a good inn about five miles distant and dine. I agreed. Why should I not?

Our house was dark and quiet as the car drew up at the veranda steps. Mr. Welch helped me out and I thanked him warmly for the pleasure he had given me. For a moment he held my hand and looked down into my eyes. I had a sudden fear that he might kiss me, but he didn't.

Saying again and hurriedly that the excursion had been perfect I bade my escort good night and entered the house, closing softly behind me the door which my husband had left open for me. He was sitting by his bedroom window smoking when I went up-stairs.

"Well?" he said as I entered.

"Well?" I replied.

"Did you have an accident?"

"Yes, the automobile broke down." And, hastening through the recital, I explained, as briefly as possible, what had happened, adding that I remembered that he had told me to cultivate Mr. Welch, and that I had today carried out his commands.

"That was months ago," he reminded me. "I no longer need your help so far as he is concerned, for he knows my work now, and that speaks for itself. You did not trouble yourself to make friends with him until you, not I, would benefit by it."

I shrugged my shoulders. "Really," I said, "men are ungrateful creatures! I supposed that your patrons could still as you once phrased it, throw work in your way."

"I would prefer to have less of his patronage and a more careful wife," he asserted roughly.

"What do you mean?"

"You know what I mean. You went off with a man whose wife was absent, and rode with him for hours, then dined with him, and came home at midnight. What do you think people will say?"

"Just what they say when they see you and Sarah off on the lake alone, and sitting on the veranda together at all hours of the day and night!"

When we returned to town my sister went back to her home. A day or two after her departure she wrote to me telling me of her engagement to a Western man. They had been engaged when she came to us in June, but she had not told me, as she wanted to have "one more jolly time" before her marriage.

Her letter came as we sat at our breakfast-table in our town house. As I finished reading Sarah's news I looked across at my husband. He was reading the sporting page of the morning paper.

"Pardon me for interrupting your reading," I said stiffly, "but Sarah tells me that you have known for weeks of her engagement."

"Yes," he said, laying aside the paper with an impatient sigh, "I have. By the way, I see that the Cubs were beaten again yesterday."

I ignored his bungling attempt to change the subject. "You did not tell me of Sarah's engagement—why not?"

"Because she asked me not to."

I uttered an angry exclamation. "And you would consult her wishes before my rights in this matter?" I demanded.

"The secret was hers, not mine," he answered.

As usual, I felt the tears rising to my eyes. "You and Sarah have made a fool of me!" I exclaimed. "To think that my own sister was engaged to be married for months, and was staying right in my house, and she never told me! That was bad enough; but to know that my husband was as dishonorable as she is a bit too much!"

John's face flushed darkly. "Look out!" he warned me. "All those tears that you pump up so easily won't wash that word out, do you understand?"

"I don't care!" I burst forth. "It was dishonorable!"

"I hardly think," said John, in a low voice, although I saw that he was trembling with wrath, "that you are a judge of honor."

Our misery culminated one afternoon when John told me that he wished I would postpone a trip I was planning to my old home, and would give a dinner to some of his rich commonplace patrons who, in spite of my tardy liking for Mr. Welch, were still abhorrent to me. I refused to change my plans.

"Under the circumstances," he said meaningly, "I think you might occasionally sacrifice your whims to help me."

"What circumstances?"

"That I have never denied you the use of money I make from such people, and that your life is more luxurious because of the orders I get through them. I say that, such being the case, you might do all in your power to assist me."

"I do not consider that you are doing me such a kindness in providing me with money for my wants!" I retorted. "You could not put another woman in my place and pay her less than you pay me!"

"So that is the way you regard your marriage, is it?" he burst forth. "If that is your idea of it I have a right to demand that you do as I say. You will entertain my friends when I wish, and as I wish, in this, my house!"

"Your house!" I mocked.

"Yes," he roared. "My money bought it!"

"Yes," I panted, "and your money bought me, too!"

Two hours later I was on my way to my old home. I had thrown into a trunk a few necessities, and had left a note for John, saying that I doubted if I would ever return to him. I meant what I wrote. I also meant it when, the next day, I told my parents the truth. I had expected their sympathy. To my astonishment, my mother burst into tears. (Perhaps I got my habit of crying easily from my mother.) My father treated me with stern severity. He called my attention to the fact that as I had left my husband of my own accord, I could claim no support from him; that I had disgraced my parents' name; that I was bringing unhappiness on my mother and himself in their old age.

"It is not," he said, "as if your husband were cruel to you. Nor can you prove that he has been unfaithful. He has maintained you in luxury. He has given you money enough to make frequent presents to your mother and myself. Not that I care for that," he added hastily, "but I do care that you are, on account of your temper, throwing away home and position. I wish you had children, for then you might not be so foolish."

I was aghast. I had supposed that my father would pity me. I told him so. He spoke more gently, but still firmly.

"If your temper were under better control, and if you were more willing to make compromises, your life might be more useful," remarked my blunt parent.

"But, father," I pleaded, "I cannot make any compromises with John! I tell you we don't love each other any longer!"

"That does not alter the fact that you are bound to each other," he stated with a narrowness that maddened me.

For six weeks no word came from John. Then, one morning, the village carrier brought me a letter in my husband's handwriting.

I went up-stairs to my cold room and read John's letter. It was a plain statement of facts. He reminded me that I had left him without sufficient provocation, and in a fit of temper, and that, as this was the case, I would never have any right while I remained apart from him to demand his financial help, even if my pride would allow me to do so. In the first heat of anger he had told himself that he was glad I was gone. Later, as he grew saner, he had hoped that I would come to my senses and return home without making any public scandal.

"I acknowledge," he wrote, "that I hope you will see that it is to your interest and mine that you return. I do not deny that I have often been in fault. Indeed we have both gotten on each other's nerves until it would be ridiculous for either to lay all the blame on the other.

"But let me drop bygones and get down to hard facts. If you choose to come back and behave yourself, I will try to behave myself. I have offered to meet you half-way. Let me know your decision at once."

I answered the letter by return mail. The next morning I took the train back to my husband and his home.

A brilliant writer has said that if matches are made in heaven they light the fires of hell very effectually. But has heaven anything to do with such matches as John's and mine?

There Are Many Bomb Enthusiasts in New York

NEW YORK.—When in Rome do as the Romans do. When in New York throw bombs. That is the only way to keep even with the game. A New Yorker must get acclimated to bombs and bomb throwing, bomb factories and premature bomb explosions. You may not believe this because you don't live in New York, but let me remark right here that the center of the bomb zone hereabouts is the marble and gilt police headquarters, home of a thousand anti-bomb enthusiasts, at Centre and Broome streets, and there is no palace so exalted nor home so humble that the bomb like the useless Christmas gift, is unknown.

Your correspondent lives in an elevator apartment much better than he can afford on Washington Heights and the altitude was said to be too great for bombs. But it isn't.

One of the most highly amusing institutions of apartment houses is the purchase of ice. Ice is like chewing gum and almond chocolate bars in Manhattan, dispensed everywhere. Some one has spoken of an "ice trust." I could never find this beneficent institution. If it is still struggling along it has my moral support. But all the ice I could ever locate was in the possession of certain Calabrians and Sicilians with wide grins and large earrings, who dwell in cellars and are uniformly named "Joe."

The "Joes" had a monopoly of our apartment. There was sharp rivalry between them, but it never took the form of price cutting.

Then something dreadful happened. Our superintendent—janitor is now obsolete—went about denouncing the "Joes" as thieves and all the tenants were so wrought up that they finally consented to take ice from "Mr. John." The "Joes" were barred from the basement

"Bang!"

Our dreams of being outside the New York bomb zone were shattered. Considerable smoke was issuing from the basement and scouting parties told us that Mr. John's department of ice was wrecked.

There were in the year 1913, according to the police records, slightly more than a hundred bombs exploded in Greater New York.

A City Farmer's Strenuous Day of Recreation

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.—After a busy week this Park avenue man thought he would slip out to his farm, early Sunday, and hang around the growing corn and chickens and things for his every-other week vacation. He did what he had always done—set his alarm clock for 5:30, and the old clock was faithful. But the man wasn't. He had spent a strenuous day, and thought he would turn over and sleep another dime's worth—and he knew that his wife would rouse him—yes indeed, he just knew she would. But his wife was tired of that sort of thing, and she let him sleep.

THREE MILES TOO FAR — DUGGUNNIT

At 6:15 the city farmer jumped out of bed and dressed himself on the way to the traction station. He caught his car by doing a marathon, and after he had recovered his wind he began to read. His farm is only six miles from the city, and he was so busy reading that he forgot to get off at Stop 3. He came to three miles beyond his getting-off place, and had the pleasure of walking back on the hot ties.

When he arrived at his farmhouse, all raveled out, he found that his tenants, too, had gone for an outing. This meant that he would not get his usual white meat and gravy dinner.

Youth Becomes a Huck Finn to Dodge Onion Bed

CHICAGO.—Huckleberry Finn is alive again. Right now Huck Finn is in danger of resuming the name of John Sopracki. Huck, or John, ran away the other day from his home at 8300 Mackinac avenue, South Chicago, and started on his career of adventure. He knew his mother wanted him to weed onions, so he started the story that he had been drowned.

JOHN'S DROWNED

Anthony Zabocki, thirteen years old, of 3325 Buffalo avenue, ran through the streets of South Chicago with tears in his eyes and told John's parents of the tragedy which had followed a swim in the Calumet river. He was a reincarnation of Tom Sawyer.

"Johnny's drownded," he cried, and John, hidden behind a fence near by, smiled in glee.

Having started parents and police on a hunt for the body, John started on his adventures. He slept in alleys, curling up in empty barrels, and for food stole bananas from the carts of fruit peddlers.

When the police failed to find John's clothing or any trace of the body they became suspicious. They wanted to question Tony.

Tony couldn't be found. The policeman at last went into the woodshed and heard sounds coming from under the floor.

And right there Huck Finn became plain John. Tony confessed that his friend wanted to take a vacation and had asked him to spread the tale of his drowning.

This Is One Way of Playing the Holdup Game

CLEVELAND, OHIO.—The "auto panhandler" is the latest. This species of the genus Man—and Woman—has become so prevalent and so bold the past few months that automobile owners are meekly asking each other:

"Why own an automobile?"

"That very question, by the way, is expressive of the "auto panhandler's" attitude toward life. It is his hallmark, his slogan and battle cry, his defense to all reproach.

Illustrating the advanced methods of the "auto panhandler" is the experience the other day of a banker who drives his own machine. This man was passing through the Square on his way to Lorain when a young man, carrying a suitcase and accompanied by a young woman, stepped out in front of the automobile and raised his hand impressively.

"Take us to the Detroit boat dock, please," said the young man, calmly. "We have only ten minutes."

Too astonished to speak and feeling greatly humbled, the banker did as ordered. At the dock he turned around and opened the door. The young man fumbled in his jeans.

"What's the matter—lost something?" asked the banker.

"Just hunting for a piece of change for you," he said. "I can't find anything but a nickel."

"That's all right, thank you," said the banker, relieved.

J. M. C. SMITH'S CAMPAIGN SPEECH

© HARRIS & EWING

When Representative J. M. C. Smith of Michigan was stumping his district in the last campaign several friends accompanied him. As is usual, he had a speech covering the issues of the day, and this he delivered, practically in the same form at each gathering.

To Mr. Smith, despite the monotony of the address, each fresh audience brought variety. But, as he observed his friends sitting day by day under that same old speech—

"Well, it began to get on my nerves,' he confided. "I couldn't but feel, as I saw them sitting there, that they were thinking: 'Now, he'll tell that dog story next' or 'I wish he'd get a new twist on that tramp joke for variety.' It must have been mighty flat to them!

"'Boys,' I said to them one night in pity, 'I feel for you, having to hear the same old things in the same old way every day, and I won't feel hurt if you do like the lumberman did who went down out of the north woods for his first visit to New York. Arriving late Saturday night, he inquired next morning for the most interesting place to spend the forenoon, and was told that a famous divine from foreign parts was going to preach at a neighboring church. So he attended the service and listened, with much interest and edification to a sermon on the text, "Peter's wife's mother lay sick of a fever."

"'That afternoon, being advised to go to another church, famous for its decorations, he found his preacher of the morning occupying the pulpit, and again heard his sermon from the text, "Peter's wife's mother lay sick of a fever." Though tempted to leave, he stuck it out.

"'That evening, as he strolled up the street in search of more frivolous entertainment, he was caught in a crowd pushing into a great edifice. He had hardly gotten himself comfortably seated when that same preacher climbed into the pulpit and announced as his text, "Peter's wife's mother lay sick of a fever!"

"'"Sufferin' sinners!" ejaculated the lumberman, "ain't that old lady dead yet?" and clumped disgustedly out of the temple.'"

MRS. J. W. KERN, FARMER

Although she is one of the most popular hostesses in Washington, society has small attraction for Mrs. John W. Kern, wife of Senator Kern of Indiana.

© HARRIS & EWING

The Kern farm, a tract of 1,500 acres, lies between the Blue Ridge and the Allegheny mountains not far from Roanoke, Va. There are 250 acres under cultivation.

Mounted on her horse, Mrs. Kern rides miles every day inspecting her farm, and personally supervising the sowing and harvesting of her crops. In time, she intends to make of the place a first-class cattle farm, conducted by efficient and up-to-date methods.

"When we decided, soon after my husband took his seat in the senate, to have a home there, I entered upon one of the most thrilling and delightful adventures that may befall a woman—that of housebuilding," says Mrs. Kern. "I was my own architect and contractor, which added to the fun of it. My carpenters were sturdy mountaineers with an instinctive sense of the beauty of line and proportion that go to making the ideal house."

MORGENTHAU VISITS PALESTINE

© HARRIS & EWING

Henry Morgenthau, American ambassador in Constantinople, has just made an extensive trip through Palestine and Syria. He long desired to see the land which once belonged to Israel, and felt that once having been through the Turkish provinces he could, in his official position, better handle problems which might present themselves.

He was accompanied by Mrs. Morgenthau and Miss Ruth Morgenthau, their daughter, as well as by the legal adviser to the embassy and a uniformed cavass as bodyguard. In Jerusalem the party was joined by Doctor Hoskins of the American mission in Beirut, Mr. Peet of the American mission in Constantinople, and later by President Bliss of the Beirut college. A reception at the United States consulate in Jerusalem in honor of Mr. Morgenthau was given by Samuel Edelman, the vice-consul in charge, and a dinner by the governor of Jerusalem. The ambassador himself later gave a large dinner.

SHE KNOWS AUTOMOBILES

© HARRIS & EWING

"Learn to run a motor car if you are nervous and I'll venture to say that you will be cured," says Mrs. Fred A. Britten, wife of Representative Britten of Chicago, Ill.

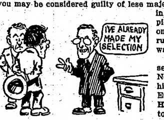
"The process of the cure is akin to that which develops personal responsibility in individuals. Impose responsibilities, and if a man or woman has any inherent stability of character at all an effort will be made to assume them conscientiously, if only for the sake of the responsibilities. In just the same way are nerves dispelled by handling an automobile.

"Emergencies without number are constantly arising and they must be met, and met quickly. Decisions made while running a high-horsepowered car admit of no revision afterward. One realizes that human life as well as the safety of the car is at stake and, for the sake of the responsibilities, one finds himself rising to meet them. Emergencies fade away as provocation for hysteria and one learns to steady his hand as well as his head because the obligation demands it. Nerves are forgotten in the stress of the experience."

WASHINGTON GOSSIP

Not Safe to Miss an Appointment With President

WASHINGTON.—If you have an appointment with the president at the White House and fail to keep it, you must have a mighty good excuse or you may be considered guilty of lese majeste, or, what would be more serious in this country, you may lose a good piece of federal patronage. Be there on the day, date and hour, is the rule, even though you may be kept waiting in the anteroom for a time.



I'VE ALREADY MADE MY SELECTION

On a certain Wednesday Representative Edward W. Townsend of New Jersey (Chimmie Fadden) and his colleague, Representative William E. Tuttle, Jr., called at the White House by appointment to recommend to the president a candidate for United States judge. They were cordially received and the president listened attentively to their argument in favor of their candidate. But he frankly told them that this particular judgeship matter was closed, that he already had made a selection, although he spoke very highly of the man recommended by Townsend and Tuttle.

"But, gentlemen," remarked the president, good naturedly, "are you not a little late in keeping your appointment? According to my engagement book you were to be here on Tuesday, and I am not aware that you called then."

It was up to Messrs. Townsend and Tuttle to explain, and they laid the cards upon the table. There was no use trying to fib out of it, so they confessed. Townsend said he went to the station to take a late train for Washington from his home in Newark Monday night, and fell asleep, only to be awakened by the station agent just as the tail lights of his train were disappearing in the west. He had to wait for a day train next morning.

Tuttle admitted that he had no excuse, except that the engagement had slipped his mind, due to the fact that the Fourth of July had intervened and mixed him up on his dates. The president listened to their excuses with interest and showed no annoyance over them.

Wanted to Know About George Washington Glick

A NEW statue has just been placed in Statuary hall at the capitol, it being a likeness in stone of George Washington Glick of Kansas. When the other occupants of the Hall of Fame had been jockeyed around to make room for Mr. Glick and the latest addition had been rolled into position, the question asked by those who had noticed the newcomer was, "Who was Glick?" A Kansan could have answered the query off-hand, but so fleeting is fame that the average citizen failed to identify George Washington Glick. However, Senator Thompson of Kansas threw the desired light upon the situation when he introduced in the senate a resolution providing for fitting exercises appropriate to the reception and acceptance of the statue. He said:

"Mr. President, there is being placed in Statuary hall today the statue of George Washington Glick. Under the law each state is entitled to place two statues of its distinguished men or women in that famous hall. About ten years ago Kansas selected from her citizens as one of the recipients of this honor John James Ingalls, who was formerly a celebrated member of this body. About one year ago Kansas chose another of her citizens, George Washington Glick, the only Democratic governor the state ever had until the present administration, to receive the same high honor.

"As everyone knows, Senator Ingalls was an uncompromising Republican. As is equally well known, Governor Glick was an uncompromising Democrat. These men lived and died in the same town, Atchison, Kansas, and are buried in the same cemetery. It is, therefore, very fitting that the statues of these eminent sons of Kansas, representing, respectively, two branches of political thought and the two great political parties of the country, should stand side by side in the Hall of Fame."

Some of the Cabinet Members Are Speed Fiends

SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY M'ADOO is an automobile enthusiast, and he is something of a speed fiend at that, though probably he would not admit it. He drives a gray roadster and when he gets out on the good country roads he lets it out and wrecks all the speed regulations made and provided by the state of Maryland. Frequently his bride, who was Miss Eleanor Wilson, the president's daughter, accompanies him on these spins, and she apparently is not alarmed when Secretary McAdoo opens up the gas throttle. So far as known none of the law officers have yet captured the secretary of the treasury when he is "burning up the road," but then getting "pinched" for speeding is not a serious matter for a cabinet officer. Generally the incident closes by the motorcycle cop apologizing for interrupting the burst of speed and telling the cabinet member to go ahead.

THAT MUST BE McADOO

Check Signing Device Is a Great Labor Saver

TWENTY miles of signature, half of the distance from here to Baltimore, is saved by J. S. Jones and William Adreon, two pension office clerks, every year because they sign checks by machinery.

About 820,000 checks, disbursing a total amount of $180,000,000, pass under the pens of these men during each year of pension office business. The money is, to all practical purposes, checked out over the signature of Guy O. Taylor, disbursing clerk of the bureau. Without the aid of machinery it would take ten years to finish the work. Every pension check that leaves the office bears the written signature of one of these clerks.

I'D NEVER GET THESE SIGNED WITHOUT THIS THING

The signatures of William Adreon when measured straight from the tip of the first "W" to the tail of the final "n," varies from two and a quarter to two and three-quarters inches in length.

If he signs half of the 820,200 checks, or 410,100 checks, he repeats his two-and-one-half-inch signature 410,100 times, which makes a total of 1,025,250 inches of signature—without the machine. There are 73,360 inches in one mile. By a simple process of division, we find that, were it not for the machine, Mr. Adreon would have to write within a tiny fraction of 14 miles of signature each year. That would be impossible and, besides, dire diseases like writers' cramp would kill him or paralyze his arm in a month.

But by the aid of the signagraph, the name is written with a wooden [illegible] ten fountain pens sign ten checks simultaneously.

AUSTRIAN AND GERMAN TROOPS MARCH ON ENEMY FRENCH AND ENGLISH ARMIES JOIN IN BELGIUM

GERMANS OCCUPY TOWN OF LIEGE; FORTS HOLD OUT

BRITISH AND FRENCH JOIN FORCES IN BELGIUM—KAISER'S TROOPS ADMIT AMMUNITON EXHAUSTED.

GERMANS THREATEN TO EXECUTE THE HOSTAGES

Governor and Bishop of Province of Liege Are Held Prisoners by Invaders—British Admiralty Reports Cruiser Squadron Attacked by Germans.

London, Aug. 11.—The admiralty has announced that one of the cruiser squadrons of the main fleet was attacked by German submarines. None of the British ships was damaged. One German submarine was sunk. No details were given as to the place at which the fighting took place.

Brussels, Aug. 10.—Via London.—It was admitted here that the town of Liege had been occupied by the Germans.

Brussels, Via London, Aug. 11.—The following statement has been issued by the general staff:

"The position of the German troops has hardly changed since Saturday. Their advance detachments are retreating under the irresistible pressure of the French troops, who are in considerable force in all the country south of the Meuse, which they are clearing of German troops.

"The enemy's offensive movement has been completely stopped. The French and Belgian troops will take the offensive simultaneously, in accordance with concerted plans."

The Russian emperor has telegraphed to King Albert his congratulations and best wishes for the continued success of the Belgian arms.

German Troops Pushed Back.

An official dispatched issued by the Belgian general staff said the advanced German troops were being pushed back and that the German offensive movement had ceased.

A junction of Belgian, British and French troops in Belgium is reported to have been effected, and a clash between German and French cavalry south of Namur is said to have taken place.

Athens dispatches say large Turkish forces are being concentrated on Bulgarian territory by agreement with Bulgaria.

Kaiser Joins Troops.

Emperor William is reported to have left for the Alsatian frontier to join the German general staff.

France has requested the Austrian ambassador to explain Austria's intentions in an alleged movement of Austrians across Germany to the French frontier.

Cholera is said to have broken out among the Austrian and Servian troops.

Paris dispatches say the Germans in Belgium are short of provisions.

A cablegram from Pekin says serious "conversations" are proceeding between the Tokio and London governments concerning whether Japan will participate in an attack on the German colony of Tsing-Tau.

The French and Belgian governments have directed that the resources of the two countries shall be the common property of France and Belgium.

Wires to Berlin Open.

London, Aug. 10.—Notwithstanding the fact that freer communication was permitted over land wires and cables, very little actual news of the war trickled through. Communication was restored between Berlin and the outside world, but while this permitted the German capital to receive proffers of mediation from the president of the United States and protests against the forcible detention and harsh treatment of Americans and other noncombatants, and against indiscriminate floating of mines in localities where they may destroy peaceful merchant vessels and their heavy loads of refugees, nothing of importance relating to the great clash of arms came out of Berlin.

Germans Occupy Liege.

Admission finally comes from Brussels that the Germans have occupied Liege, although the forts are still intact. The city was entered through a comparatively safe path between the Exignee and Fleron forts, 10,000 German troops of various arms getting inside the city. General Emmich, the German commander, immediately issued a proclamation warning civilians not to fire on his soldiers, announcing that if such offenses were reported he would bombard the city. The burgomaster has cautioned civilians not to carry arms and not to provoke the invaders in any way.

Ammunition About Exhausted.

For several hours the populace remained in hiding, but yesterday they began to come out and mingle with the Germans. The latter have taken up quarters in the university and other public buildings. They have not intruded into private dwellings and are conducting themselves very peaceably, paying well for everything they can buy in the few shops that are open. Communication with Liege is so open that many persons who went from Brussels were able to return before midnight. The Germans admit their ammunition was about exhausted and that they had fought two days without food.

Austrians Shoot Down Czechs.

Paris, Aug. 10.—Many Czech soldiers were lined up and shot by Austrians because they refused to go to the front, it was officially announced at the war office here. The Czechs were attached to Bohemian regiments which were ordered to the Russian border. They attempted a mutiny and were shot down in front of their regiments.

GERMAN DREADNAUGHTS IN BATTLE FORMATION

Here is a portion of Germany's powerful fleet of battleships steaming in battle formation in the North sea.

TERRIFIC CLASH IS IMMINENT ON SWISS FRONTIER

AUSTRIAN ARMY OF 40,000 CONCENTRATES NEAR BASEL, WHILE GERMANS EVACUATE SANKT LUDWIG.

STRONG AUSTRIAN FLEET IS NEAR POLA, AUSTRIA

Invasion of Lower Alsace by French Troops Under General Joseph Jaffro Arouses Enthusiasm —Battle Will Occur in German Territory.

London, Aug. 11.—A dispatch to the Times from Berne, Switzerland, says 40,000 Austrian troops have concentrated near Basel and that German and French troops also are near the Swiss frontier so that a big battle may occur at any moment.

The Daily Mail's Rome correspondent adds that according to dispatches from Basel, Switzerland, the Germans have evacuated Sankt Ludwig, in Alsace, four miles to the northwest of Basel and that a battle is imminent on the Franco-Swiss frontier.

The foreign office has received a telegram from the British vice consul at Venice, saying that the Austrian merchantman, Igzlad, which arrived at Venice Friday, reported a strong Austrian fleet off Pola, Austria, and that the lights in the lighthouse of the Austrian coast of the Adriatic had been extinguished.

Invasion Awakens Enthusiasm.

Paris, Aug. 11.—The invasion of lower Alsace by a French army under the command of Geenral Joseph Joffre, the French commander-in-chief, has awakened great enthusiasm throughout France.

French military authorities, while recognizing that the occupation of Altkirch and Muelhausen by the French troops is not of high strategical importance, believe that the successful advance of the French army far across the German frontier will have considerable moral effect. It is also unofficially reported that Kolmar, further to the north, has fallen into the hands of the French.

None of these three places was strongly fortified and all of them lie outside the line of real German defense, being regarded as outposts of the strongly fortified cities. Their German garrisons were numerically fairly strong, but it was understood that in case of attack they would merely have to hinder the French advance before falling back on to their supports.

Neu Breish, whither they are said to have retired, lies to the east of Kolmar and is strongly fortified, while Strassburg, situated some distance to the north, is the center of a great aggregation of German troops, is strongly fortified and supposed to be prepared for a long siege.

Official reports of the fighting between the French and German troops states that the French losses were "not excessive," while those of the Germans are declared by the French to have been "very severe."

The Alsatian inhabitants are said to have been so overjoyed at the appearance of the French army that they tore up the frontier posts.

Reports of the arrival of an Austrian army corps on the Swiss frontier, near Basel were the object of close attention by the French military authorities. It was said that several more Austrian army corps were being organized in the Tyrol whence they would later be sent toward the French frontier.

In view of this the French government asked the Austrian-Hungarian ambassador to France, who still remains at his post, to explain the intentions of Austria-Hungary in regard to France.

Before retreating from Muelhausen the German troops are said to have set fire to numerous buildings in that city, especially the warehouses where food and forage were stored and the forest of Hard, near Kolmar, is said to have been razed.

EUROPEAN WAR SPOTLIGHTS.

Official Belgian reports declare that 10,000 Germans entered the town of Liege Saturday morning but that the forts still hold out.

The Germans are said to be holding as hostages the bishop and governor of Liege province, declaring that they will be put to death if the forts resume firing. This is said to account for the cessation of hostilities for the past 24 hours.

The French troops continue their energetic campaign in the recapture after 44 years waiting of points in Alsace-Lorraine.

Cholera is reported to have broken out among Austrian and Servian troops.

German soldiers in Liege admit that their ammunition is about exhausted and that they fought for two days without food.

French and British troops who have been rushing to the aid of the Belgians have now effected a junction with them at or near Liege.

Naval battle reported in Adriatic sea between British fleet and German cruisers.

German and Austrian troops are expected to join in battle against French soldiers on the Swiss frontier within a day or two.

French and British troops have effected a junction with the Belgian army along the Belgian frontier, according to official Belgian reports.

A Brussels report says the greater part of Luxembourg has been cleared of German invaders by the advancing French army.

At Antwerp four German officers, wearing Belgian uniforms, were arrested yesterday.

Oscar S. Strauss of New York, now in London, sends message to American people declaring the present war will wipe out all European monarchies. He also says that the United States has a great opportunity to gather in the trade heretofore enjoyed by Germany and England.

War experts in London give several reasons why the present conflict must be of short duration. The experts claim that it will be impossible for Germany to withstand a long war as she will be unable to obtain foodstuffs and that her army and people will be literally starved out.

To Protect Canadian Ports.

Seattle, Wash., Aug. 10.—The Grand Trunk Pacific steamship, Prince George, was requisitioned by the Canadian government as a transport and left Seattle for Vancouver to enter the government service. It is supposed she will carry troops to Prince Rupert and other northern British Columbia ports which might be attacked by a roving German cruiser. The Prince Rupert, of the same line, will arrive here and tie up until needed by the British government as a transport.

FIRST LADY OF THE LAND DIES AT WASHINGTON

END COMES TO MRS. WOODROW WILSON WHILE FAMILY SURROUNDS BEDSIDE LATE IN THE AFTERNOON.

PRESIDENT COMPLETELY UNNERVED BY THE SHOCK

All Washington Silenced and Wheels of Government Cease for Awhile —Both Branches of Congress Adjourn — First Death at Mansion in 20 Years.

Washington, Aug. 7.—Mrs. Woodrow Wilson, wife of the president of the United States, died at the White House. Death came after a brave struggle of months against Bright's disease, with complications.

President's Grief Heartrending.

The president was completely unnerved by the shock and his grief was heartrending. He bore up well under the strain, however, and devoted himself to his daughters.

A Turn for the Worse.

The end came while Mrs. Wilson was unconscious. Her illness took a turn for the worse shortly before 1 o'clock in the afternoon and from then on she grew gradually weaker.

Kneeling at the bedside at the end were the president and their three daughters, Dr. Carey T. Grayson, U. S. N., and a nurse were in the room and just outside a door where Secretary McAdoo and Francis B. Sayre, Mr. Wilson's sons-in-law, and Mr. Tumulty, his secretary.

Mrs. Woodrow Wilson.

Houses of Congress Adjourn.

Both houses of congress adourned when Mrs. Wilson's death was announced and for a brief time the wheels of the government practically stopped while everyone paid respect to the loss of the president.

The beginning of the end came at 10 o'clock yesterday morning, when Dr. E. P. Davis of Philadelphia, who had been called in for consultation, realized that the time for hope had passed. He took the president into the Red room of the White House and there, in a broken voice, told him the truth. Mr. Wilson's face blanched, but he bore the shock well. He was informed the end was only a question of hours.

President Informs Family.

Mr. Wilson then took his daughters, Mrs. McAdoo, Mrs. Sayre and Miss Margaret Wilson, aside and told them of their mother's condition. Until then they had thought there was a chance for her recovery. From that time on the president and his daughters remained constantly at Mrs. Wilson's bedside. The president held his wife's hand and the three daughters were grouped nearby. Until she became unconscious, Mrs. Wilson frequently nodded to one or the other and smiled cheerfully.

"Promise me," she whispered faintly, "that if I go you will take care of my husband—" It was the same touch of devotion which she had so many times repeated—her constant anxiety having been that the president might not worry about her or be disturbed in his official tasks.

Many Telegraph Sympathy.

Three telegraph operators were kept busy at the White House last night receiving telegrams of sympathy from all parts of the country. The messages came from men prominent in politics, business, and official life and from many who had no personal acquaintance with the president or Mrs. Wilson, but wanted to express their sorrow over his bereavement.

News Kept From Public.

The news of the seriousness of her illness was kept from the public until Wednesday when it was admitted that her chances of recovery were slight. Her condition continued to grow worse. Dr. Grayson gave out a statement in which he described her illness as "alarming."

Dr. Grayson gave out another statement in which he said that Mr. Wilson had had two sinking spells during the morning and that she was unconscious but growing weaker. This was the last word to come before her death.

IS CRAZED BY WAR HORRORS

MRS. PECK OF MINNEAPOLIS OVERCOME IN LONDON.

Imagines She May Be Taken as a Spy—Placed in Hospital for Treatment.

London Aug. 8.—Mrs Katherine Peck, said to be from Minneapolis, was found by the police wandering about mentally deranged. She was hungry, although she had a large sum in paper and letters of credit in her purse. She is suffering from the effects of her journey across Germany where she said she saw spies dragged from the trains to be shot. She now imagines she may be taken as a spy. She has been placed in a hospital for treatment.

The woman found in London is believed to be Mrs. O. H. Peck, of Minneapolis, widow of the late O. H. Peck, dealer in photographic supplies.

She lived at Curtis Court until a year ago, when she left for Berlin. She said her address then would be 55 Charlott Strasse.

WHEAT CROP BREAKS RECORD

Estimate of Government for August is 675,000,000 Bushels—July Forecast Less.

Washington, Aug. 10.—The country's record-breaking crop of winter wheat amounts to 675,000,000 bushels, the department of agriculture announced in its preliminary estimate. This is 22,000,000 bushels more than was forecast in July.

Prospects of the spring wheat crop have decreased during August and that crop now is estimated at 236,000,000 bushels, or 38,000,000 bushels less than in July, making the total wheat production forecast of 911,000,000 bushels or 16,000,000 bushels less than indicated July 1.

Corn prospects decreased 283,000,000 bushels during July and a crop of 2,634,000,000 now is indicated, while oats decreased 44,000,000 bushels.

Potato prospects increased 9,000,000 bushels and a 370,000,000 harvest is indicated.

Weather conditions for the grain crops were not especially favorable.

"FLORIDA" GUARDS NEW YORK

Battleship Florida in Channel Prevents Ships Departing With Arms for Belligerents.

New York, Aug. 8.—The channel leading out of New York's upper harbor is guarded by the United States dreadnought Florida. No vessel headed for sea may pass by until an officer from the battleship has inspected her cargo.

The Washington government has taken this step to prevent foreign registered vessels from involving the United States in a possible neutrality entanglement with any one of the warring European nations.

The reason for the sudden coaling of the Florida in the Brooklyn Navy Yard Wednesday and her departure yesterday morning with destination unannounced became public when Dudley Field Malone, collector of the port, made known the government's plan to preserve neutrality in this harbor.

HOLLAND CALLS RESERVES

Three Hundred Leave Twin Cities to Take Up Arms—Pardon For Deserters.

Minneapolis, Aug. 10.—A. Enkema, vice-consul for the Netherlands, whose jurisdiction covers Minnesota, has received instructions to notify all Hollanders who belong to either the army, navy, militia, or reservists to answer the call to arms and report at the Consulate at once. He has been authorized to promise a pardon to all deserters who return to the colors. Three hundred Hollanders have already left the Twin Cities to answer the call.

Canadians Ready to Sail.

Welland, Ont., Aug. 10.—The Forty-fourth regiment of Niagara Falls, the Nineteenth of St. Catharines and the Second Dragoons of Hamilton, called out to guard the Welland canal, have been ordered to the Canadian mobilization camp at Val Cartier. The first contingent will sail for England or France within 10 days and will comprise 21,000 men. About 40,000 men will assemble at Val Cartier, those not sailing this month forming the nucleus of a second contingent.

Chileans to Aid England.

Ottawa, Aug. 10.—It is learned that when Canada acquired from Chile the two American-built submarines which are now in the harbor of Victoria, not only were the boats obtained, but also the crews. On each of the submarines there was a full complement of officers and men and these have all taken service with Canada.

Fall of Warsaw Denied.

St. Petersburg, Aug. 10.—The report that the Germans have occupied Warsaw is denied. Warsaw is strongly fortified, and has a large garrison in times of peace which has been augmented. Quite apart from outside aid Warsaw could stand a siege for many months. The small German airship Parsival of the unrigid type was riddled with shot and brought to the ground near Czestochova. Two German officers and two navigators were killed.

War Riot at Winnipeg.

Winnipeg, Man., Aug. 8.—Roused to a pitch of enthusiasm by the parading of troops and warlike speeches of street orators, a mob composed principally of young men, stoned the German and Austrian consulates and the German club here, shattering windows and doing considerable damage to interior furnishings. Police were called out and a guard placed about the Austrian consulate, but the German consulate and German club were closed indefinitely late last night.

Germans Die in in Amphion Disaster.

London, Aug. 8.—The admiralty has issued the following: "In the course of reconnoitering the cruiser Amphion struck a mine. The fore part of the British ship was shattered by the explosion, and practically all of the loss to the crew ensued from this cause. All not killed by the explosion were taken off by the boats of the destroyers before the Amphion went down. Twenty German prisoners of war who were confined in the fore part of the ship were killed."

Austrians Bombard Antivari.

Rome, Aug. 10.—Austrian cruisers bombarded Antivari, Montenegro, destroying the wireless station, according to advices brought to Bari, near Brindisi by steamer. Two Austrian cruiser, it was stated, were engaged in the bombardment and besides the wireless several factories and the port warehouse were destroyed. The cruisers also directed their fire at a mountain where Montenegrins had taken refuge. Later they departed toward Cattaro.

Canada Ousts German Consuls.

Ottawa, Ont., Aug 10.—As a means to prevent information of war preparations leaking out of the country, the Canadian government ordered German and Austrian consuls and aliens of their nationality to leave the dominion. German reservists in Canada are being placed under arrest. It is said they will be assembled under guard in a camp and held until the close of the war. Armed guards have been assigned for the protection of all the railroad bridges of the country.

State News of General Interest

TWIN CITIES GET SEVEN MILLIONS

U. S. TREASURY TO SHIP PART OF $25,000,000 AVAILABLE UNDER ALDRICH-VREELAND ACT.

BUSINESS ON NORMAL BASIS

Not the Slightest Indication That There Had Been Any Change From Usual Practices by Banks Apparent.

Minneapolis.—Minneapolis and St. Paul banks will receive from Washington in the next week or 10 days $7,183,188, that amount of currency being immediately available for shipment, Secretary of the Treasury McAdoo wired to President E. W. Decker of the Minneapolis clearing house. Twenty-five millions is the total that the Twin City banks can get from Washington, under the Aldrich-Vreeland act, and the figures first stated represent the package currency ready at the moment for forwarding.

The Clearing House association discussed the local situation, which is normal as to business volume, and the association's president stated that the tension is rapidly passing. Millers of Minneapolis were filing cables to foreign customers, notifying them that the industry here will take no risks at all of war losses, and that only upon deposit of funds in banks of the United States, or in foreign banks satisfactory to United States banks, will any Minneapolis flour be forwarded. Twenty prominent local and country millers met at the office of the Northwestern Miller and decided upon uniformity of action.

In addition to the $7,183,188 of currency available under the Aldrich-Vreeland act, for which the National Currency association of the Twin Cities formally applied, the Clearing House association applied to the treasury for $5,000,000 for Minneapolis, out of the $34,000,000 of government funds that Secretary McAdoo some time ago said he would deposit in banks of the west for crop-moving purposes. This raised the total money requisition of Minneapolis and St. Paul to $30,000,000, of which at least $7,187,188 can be obtained as rapidly as applications can travel to Washington and the money shipments come back.

Not the slightest indication that there had been any change from usual practices by the banks was apparent anywhere in the cities. Bank customers transacted all their business as usual. Country banks telephoned in to find if they could get any currency and were told by the Minneapolis banks they need not worry about harvest hand or railroad labor payrolls and that all requirements of that nature would be provided.

WAR MAY HALT PROFESSORS

Several Members of University of Minnesota Faculty in Germany Unable to Leave.

St. Paul.—German orders forbidding all foreigners to leave the country may prevent the return of professors of the University of Minnesota. At present there are three members of the university faculty in European countries on a year's leave of absence. Others are spending the summer vacation abroad.

Among those on leave of absence is Dr. Hardin Craig, professor of English, who has been studying at Oxford and Cambridge. It was his intention to include the German and Italian universities in his itinerary. With him were Henry and Fred Bruchholz, the former a Rhodes scholar from the university, the latter his brother, a senior at Minnesota, who are touring Europe. I. T. Jerrould, librarian at the university, also was at Oxford.

Dr. J. Burt Miner of the department of psychology, has been studying in England, France and Germany. Dr. Albert E. Jenks, professor of anthropology and sociology, who delivered a series of lectures in the Orient during the second semester of last year, now is in the Philippines studying sociological conditions.

Believe Wouri Drowned.

Virginia.—Four deputy sheriffs, with county bloodhounds scoured the country around Angora all day for Henry Wouri, murderer of his two children, and found only a piece of his jaw, which had been shot off, and a trail of blood. It is believed that the insane man drowned in a nearby lake.

Forestry Shown in Movies.

St. Paul.—The state forest service has enlisted the motion picture operator in the list of workers who seek to preserve Minnesota's forests. Reels showing various aspects of forestry will be placed on exhibition today in St. Paul motion picture theaters. The films will later go to every county fair in the state for exhibition. They show the lumberjack at work in the mills, on the drive and in camp, patroling of forests by foresters, trenching, backfiring and other activities of the forest ranger.

MAKES CHARGES OF GRAFT

Percy DeLaittre Before Grand Jury Admits He Bears Grudge Against Mayor.

Minneapolis.—First direct charges of irregularities in the city administration have been made before the grand jury. Percy DeLaittre, former city detective, was the witness who made the charges. He admitted that he bears a grudge against Mayor Nye.

DeLaittre was asked to resign from the detective force when the present mayor took office and has busied himself in collecting evidence against the administration.

DeLaittre named a downtown wholesale and retail liquor store which he said supplies beer to disorderly houses and "blind pigs." He said that he had been informed that 25 cents per case never reached the pockets of the proprietors of the store, but went to the administration.

DeLaittre offered no evidence in support of this charge, and his other charges were not so specific. He promised, however, to bring witnesses who could support his contentions. The jury, after gaining the admission that he bears the mayor a grudge since his discharge from the force, told him to bring in his witnesses and they all would be heard.

The jury searchlight was turned on the alibi furnished by Kenneth Leach, Fred Espenson and Frank McNevins. These three were arrested on suspicion of being implicated in the Clark box factory office robbery and numerous other holdups. The police said that they had confessed, but later they produced an alibi which the police detectives declared puncture-proof, and the cases were nolled and the men released.

MAY FEEL EFFECTS OF WAR

Blockade of German Ports Would Make Marked Difference in Customs Receipts at Capital.

St. Paul.—The effect of the war in Europe will soon become manifest in the custom house receipts at St. Paul, according to officials here. Goods arriving now in St. Paul were shipped quite a time before the war broke out and there has been no change from the average amount of receipts as yet.

"If a blockade of German ports should go into effect or if conditions at sea should hinder freight vessels from crossing," said A. W. Lyman, special deputy collector of customs, "there would be a marked difference in customs receipts here. The principal goods imported from Germany are linens and gloves."

TELLS OF RACE FOR SAFETY

Dr. Charles Mayo of Rochester Passenger on Mauretania During Record-Breaking Trip.

Rochester.—Dr. Charles H. Mayo of this city, new president of the Clinical Congress of North America, which met in London recently, one of the passengers on the Mauretania on her record-breaking race for safety in the harbor of Halifax, described in a telegram received here, the voyage as one of the most thrilling.

He said there was tremendous excitement among the passengers because officers of the liner would give no information concerning the ship's sudden change of course.

"We were escorted out of Queenstown by a British cruiser," he said. "There was nothing but rumors of impending capture ever since.

"We knew the ship's course was changed. We had been running with the moon on our starboard side. All at once we felt the ship keel over. She had swung around at an angle of fifty degrees and then began to roll heavily from side to side in the trough of the seas. Some of the passengers got on deck and reported that we were going due north.

"We ran for a little while, then stopped. When we started up again I should think that every record for passenger ships was broken, from the rate we made. We could feel the ship trembling with the vibration as she raced toward Halifax."

Red Wing Judge Dies.

Red Wing.—Axel Haller, judge of probate of Goodhue county for twenty years, died suddenly at his home here. Heart trouble was the cause. Judge Haller was born in Wermland, Sweden, in 1858, and came to America in 1867. He is survived by a widow and eight children.

Minneapolis.—Progressive party adherents will celebrate the anniversary of the founding of their party Saturday with a dinner at the West hotel, to which progressives from all over the state have been invited.

Miss Taft as Bridesmaid.

Although no announcement has been made of the bridesmaids who are to attend Miss Isabel Vincent, daughter of President George E. Vincent of the University of Minnesota, it was stated by a close friend of the Vincent family that among others will be Miss Helen Taft, daughter of former President William H. Taft. Miss Taft is to arrive in Minneapolis a few days before the wedding, on Aug. 29. The former chief executive himself will accompany his daughter and be present at the wedding.

MAY MOVE HEADQUARTERS

Republican Party Leaders Are Said to Protest Local in Minneapolis—St. Paul Favored.

St. Paul.—The Republican state central committee may move its headquarters frim the Dyckman hotel, Minneapolis, to St. Paul, because of protests which have been voiced by many of the nominees and party leaders against the Mill City location. Chairman Gunnar B. Bjornson admitted that the matter is being considered.

The headquarters maintained are those used by William E. Lee, nominee for governor, before the primaries. Mr. Lee centered his efforts in Hennepin county and naturally still desires to keep the party offices there if possible. All the other candidates, however, are located in St. Paul, and have found it inconvenient to make the trip to the Mill City to consult the party leaders. They want the headquarters here.

Mr. Bjornson said that it is possible that if the central offices are not moved to St. Paul a branch will be conducted here where the workers can meet and consult with the leaders. In such an event he would try to put in half of each day here. Mr. Bjornson admits that in some ways St. Paul has distinct advantages over Minneapolis as a place for party headquarters, because most of the politicians from outside come to the Capitol City.

Mr. Lee, however, is said to feel that he owes something to Minneapolis for having supported him in the primaries and for this reason does not want to make a change, despite the protests of the other candidates on the ticket with him. The Republican organization has little hope of carrying Ramsey county for its gubernatorial nominee, any way, and this is assigned as another reason why the state headquarters should not be moved here.

The meeting of the committee scheduled for August 19 probably will be held in Minneapolis. At that time the location of the permanent headquarters will be settled. It is understood that a majority of the country members favor St. Paul.

LAW STOPS FREE BANQUETS

Democratic as Well as Republican Candidates Will Have to Pay for Meals at Banquet.

St. Paul.—When the members of the Republican state central committee hold their first meeting, August 19, it is likely they will have to pay for their own banquet. Heretofore it has been the custom for the state committee to use its campaign fund to defray the cost of the dinner, but the question has been raised whether this is not a violation of the corrupt practices act.

Section 10 of this law makes it unlawful for any person or candidate to give away any "meat or drink or other entertainment" for political purposes.

The Democrats are, of course, in the same fix.

MINNESOTA CLAIMS VICTIM

Martin Kittleson Drowned While Trying to Swim River Near Mankato.

Mankato.—A very sad drowning occurred near the North Star Concrete company's plant on the Minnesota river, when Martin Kittleson, the 19-year-old son of Mrs. Martha Kittleson of North Mankato, lost his life while trying to swim the river in company with three other young men.

It appears that the young man was seized with cramps and sank before his companions could rescue him. Searching parties are now dragging the river endeavoring to recover the body.

Besides his mother, the deceased is survived by one brother and four sisters.

WILL CHARGE FOR STORAGE

Northwestern Railroad Announces New Rule Will Be Rigidly Enforced August 24.

Mankato.—Commencing August 24, the Northwestern road, in common with every other railway in Minnesota, will charge storage on less than car load shipments remaining in their freight houses beyond the free time of forty-eight hours.

The freight agents of the Northwestern road have given out this information and state that the rule will be rigidly enforced. In the past the privilege of allowing goods to remain an indefinite period in the local freight houses has been sadly abused and the decision to charge for storage was the natural consequence.

News Brings Near Panic.

Duluth.—There were conditions approaching a panic in the flax market here today and for the first time in the history of the Duluth Board of Trade it was announced no further trades would be cleared until further notice. Babel reigned in the pit at the opening. All operators had selling orders to execute and under the pressure and lacking support from crushers, prices crumbled from 10 to 16 cents during the first few minutes of business.

SERVIAN OFFICIALS IN CONFERENCE

Greater happenings have put Ser via in the background. This photograph was taken at the beginning of the war with Austria, and shows Prince Alexis of Servia, on the right, talking to M. Paschitch, the prime minister.

GERMAN AIRSHIPS SAID TO BE MAIN THING RELIED ON

Assertion Made That Nation Will Surprise the World in This Direction.

CAPITALS AT HER MERCY?

Dirigibles, Which Form the Fighting Air Fleet of the Kaiser, Said to Be the Deadliest Weapon of War That Has Been Devised.

(From the Chicago Tribune.)

This article is written by a man in the secret service of a great world power. Under the guise of a professional aviator he has flown over every capital in Europe, making photographs with a secret camera attached to his machine for the war ministry archives of his government. As a designer and operator of aeroplanes he is known the world over. His article, therefore, deals particularly with the air equipment of the various European nations for war.

Whatever the final outcome of the war, this is certain:

Germany is going to surprise the world by her mastery of the air.

For Germany and not France ranks first in war aviation. The ponderous dirigible, not the fleet aeroplane, is the most destructive machine that soars.

Ready to Attack London.

Germany stands ready to assail Paris, Warsaw, and even London by an attack from the air, and the odds are against the defenders.

While Frenchmen have been capturing the prizes in aerial contests, Germany has been far from idle. After experiments with every kind of engine that soars the air she has abandoned the newer, heavier than air creations for the dirigible of ancient origin. This she has made the deadliest machine that flies.

I have worked as an itinerant mechanic on the military air craft of every nation of Europe.

Germany and France represent two distinct and different types in air fighting. France stakes her all on the aeroplane. The Gnome motor is her foundation. Germans cannot duplicate it. The Russian air corps are a mere shadow of the French system. Austria patterns her weak air corps after Germany. England's system is a composite between the two without the perfections of either.

The dirigible is a fighting machine—a dreadnaught of the aid. And the aeroplane is a scout cruiser, and little else.

Why Dirigible Surpasses.

Here, in brief, is why the dirigible surpasses the aeroplane as a fighting machine:

It carries a crew of from 10 to 25 men to take observations and direct operations.

Can carry as much as 25 tons of nitro-glycerine cartridges — sufficient to demolish Chicago.

Can hover over a city during night time in silence, and while slower, can outmaneuver an aeroplane, inasmuch as it can hold a stationary position, while an aeroplane must keep moving.

Carries rapid-fire guns which can be aimed with deadly accuracy.

An aeroplane carries four men at best. It cannot carry effective pieces of ordnance and cannot drop bombs with any accuracy.

It can be heard and located by sound a mile distant, while a dirigible painted sky color with motors and lights shut off can neither be heard nor seen at night at a distance of 700 feet.

Plans for Attack Made.

In the war archives of Germany are complete plans for aerial attacks on both Paris and London. Details for such attacks have been figured out with Metz as the base. For an attack on London they calculate upon leaving Metz as darkness falls, crossing the channel at a height of 8,000 feet. Under ordinary circumstances London would be gained before midnight. Then the bag would be dropped to 3,000 feet and the work of destruction begun. Its nitroglycerine cartridges could rander London helpless in a few hours. Furthermore, the English capital is inadequately protected with searchlights with which to detect a night attack.

Any of the nine non-rigid dirigibles in the British service would be unable to cope with one rigid Zeppelin.

Attacks on Paris have been outlined from the same base—Metz. Paris is better protected by sky searchlights than London.

France has 33 dirigibles, but all of the non-rigid type, which cannot be compared with the giant Zeppelins, of which Germany has 16, with as many more dependable dirigibles of other types.

On the Russian frontier Germany will find but trifling resistance to her air fleets.

Germany virtually is impregnable to an air invasion. At Metz, Leipsig, Cologne, Baden Baden, Hanover, Frankfort and Johannisburg she has the most powerful searchlights in the world.

WILD RUSH TO GET HOME

Americans in London Willing to Accept Any Kind of Accommodation Offered Them.

London.—There were more Americans in the west end of London during the days following the declaration of war than Englishmen. They were chiefly crowded about the offices of the American Express company and of the steamship lines trying to get checks cashed and secure passage home.

The express companies were able to afford much relief to those in financial straits and the steamship companies booked hundreds of passages, although no guarantee could be given that British steamers would sail until their safety was assured by the navy.

The greatest demand, therefore, was for berths on American liners. Persons who usually travel in the most luxurious cabins were eagerly buying berths in the steerage which had been secured by earlier visitors to the steamship offices who were offering them for sale, but at greatly increased prices. The main office of the International Mercantile Marine was jammed with Americans, and a like condition prevailed at the offices of the Cunard and Canadian lines, which were still doing business.

Rush on Express Offices.

The express companies' offices, which opened at an early hour, were crowded. They were well supplied with currency and honored their checks up to $50. The American Express company supplied the temporary wants of over 3,000 persons from the time the office opened until 2 o'clock this afternoon. There were still hundreds in line desiring gold in exchange for their checks. They were told to return next morning.

The Wells Fargo Express company, which issues checks chiefly to westerners, was open all day. The cashiers were kept busy honoring checks

BUILDING WIRE FENCE

EXCELLENT SUBSTITUTE FOUND FOR RAILS AND BOARDS.

Not Expensive When One Considers Lasting Qualities of Good Heavy Galvanized Wire and Indestructible Cement Posts.

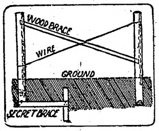
(By P. K. EDWARDS, Copyright, 1914.)

Pigs and the board fence were the the bane of our existence as boys, for no matter how securely we fastened the old boards the pigs would get out just when we were starting for the swimming hole or going berrying. Now concrete posts and wire fencing have become substitutes for the boards and rails and once set up are fortunately there to stay.

"But wire fencing is so expensive!" the reader will say. The reply to that is, "If you do not consider the lasting qualities of good heavy galvanized wire and the indestructibility of cement posts." The writer remembers putting a fifty-five inch woven wire fence around his garden some nineteen years ago, using chestnut posts set twenty feet apart. This fence is still standing and is to all appearances in excellent condition. Regarding the spacing of the posts around this garden, which bordered the highway and required 400 feet of fencing, if we had used a board fence with eight-foot post spacing, thirty more posts would have been required, and as these cost even in those days 15 cents each, a saving of $4.50 was effected. In this particular case the posts being of chestnut (eight feet long) the butts were painted with a creosote preparation and set three feet in the ground.

In using cement posts, which are easily made at home, be sure to have the butts of the corner and end posts extra heavy and then no anchors are needed; also provide for two bolt holes in each post, one near the top, the other near the bottom, to be used for the bolts which hold the wooden strip to which the wire is stapled.

In setting some 800 feet of poultry fencing this past year the writer used modern heavy woven wire, with six foot cement posts set three feet in the ground. To these short posts were bolted five-foot wooden strips three by four inches, to which the wire was stapled. Many of the cement posts in this case had to have extra large butts on account of the hollows in the ground, which had a tendency to pull up the posts.



Brace for Corner Post.

During this time of the year, when the ground is very dry it is sometimes very troublesome while building wire fence to keep the post from turning at the corners. Anchor the corner post about four feet, then dig a trench the same depth toward the second post, nail a two by four scantling to the corner post at the bottom, have the scantling about four or five feet in length, now attach a two by four three feet in length to the scantling, tamp the dirt over this securely and the post will never slip or turn if properly braced at the top. To properly brace the post at the top the brace should be fitted in the post two and one-half feet from the bottom and top, this brace should be of good material with a cross brace of wire as shown in the illustration.

GROUND GRAIN FOR FEEDING

Oat Grain Should Be Crushed and the Ear Corn Ground Into Coarse Meal for Horses and Cows.

A popular grain feed for cows and horses is provender—corn and oats ground together. Corn on the cob and oats for cows is fully as good as shelled corn and oats, and the labor of shelling is saved. Probably the finer they are ground the more completely they will be digested, but there is a point of fineness beyond which the cost of reduction will be greater than the gain secured. Just when this point was reached would depend upon so many things, the price of the grains, the cost of grinding and the value of the dairy product, that no definite statement can be made. But this much may be said, the oat grains should be crushed so as to expose the kernels to the action of the digestive juices, and the ear corn should be ground into a coarse meal.

Experience Essential.

No farmer who has not tried it should engage in the cattle-feeding business on a large scale at the start. He will find, and generally at pretty high cost, that experience and good judgment are needed as much as corn to lay the fat on a bunch of steers at a profit.

Time for Thinning Apples.

When thinning apples thinning should be done when the little apples are about one inch in diameter. Do not leave any apples nearer together than four inches.

THE SUNBEAM.

BY W. G. HUNT.

Published every Friday, at Sunbeam, Pennington County, Minnesota.

Entered as Second-class matter August 30 1905, at the post office at Sunbeam Minn. under the Act of Congress of March 3.1879

It is funny how quick a politician discovers that any newspaper that don't fall over itself to give him free booms for office is a worthless "sheet," that never did amount to much anyhow.

The campaign will open in earnest about September 1st, and then the candidates for county office will begin visiting the common people, who will be very popular from September to November.

Don't get excited about the European war, but attend to saving your crops. Uncle Sam has his army and navy to do the fighting if this country should get into war, while your duty is on the farm. So do not sit on a cracker box talking war, while your crops need your attention to save them from the weather destroying them.

T. P. Anderson is going to make a vigorous campaign for election for County Auditor of this county, and it looks at this date as if our popular (?) County Auditor (in his mind), will have his hands full to win out in November. There is no question of doubt about the honor and integrity of Mr. Anderson, and we believe that the ditch tax payers will get a square deal with him in that office.

Words fail us miserably when we attempt to describe the condition of Europe today. The greatest and most devasting war in the history of the world is at present raging across the sea and there is danger of the whole world becoming involved. Nations are flying at each other's throats like a pack of frenzied wolves and no matter which side wins the result can be nothing less than depletion of money and men of the nations involved. No one can foretell what the result will be. The whole map of Europe may be changed and nations lose their identity. Untold suffering is sure to result and the poor will be poorer still.

The brotherhood of man is lost sight of in the lust for power and gain and woe be to the nation that struck the first blow.—T. R. Falls Times.

O'NEIL AS A REPRESENTATIVE

The Clearbrook Journal is a paper that always considers the interests of the farmers and tax payers first, and Hon. D. P. O'Neil led Mr. Anderson into the same trap two years ago that he caught us in, viz; Dan's smooth talk about how he always looked after the interests of the farmers and tax payers as a member of the legislature. Let's see what Mr. Anderson says about Hon. Dan this year.

"Many of the farmers in this county are beginning to wonder why Dan O'Neil voted for taxing the logs cut in this county in Bemidji, Ada and Thief River Falls. It looks like a selfish move in favor of the big cities, or taking money out of our pockets and giving it to the "City Sports."—Clearbrook Journal.

Correct you are Bro. Anderson, and as we have said before, the only time that O'Neil looks after the farmer's interest is when he is speaking to them in a country school house.

He always considers the cities according to their size, as you can see by that Normal School deal, When Thief River Falls, the city that was entitled to it, wanted it, they were not in it, with the town site boomers of Minneapolis, who wanted it located on the cut over pine land east of Bemidji. Oh yes Dan is a great representative of the people, when he is feeding them "hot air."

BIG PICNIC IN HICKORY.

The Ladies Aid Society of the town of Hickory gave a very successful picnic at Cash Woldrons last Sunday, which drew a large crowd. The picnic was given by the ladies for the purpose of raising funds for a Norwegian school, The Oklee Band furnished first class music for the entertainment of the large crowd present. A matched game of base ball was played in the afternoon, between the Indians of Red Lake Agency and the farmer boys of the town of Hickory, which was won by the farmer boys. A grand banquet dinner was given by the ladies at noon, which was taken good care of by the large number present. Mr. Woldron had the grove nicely arranged for the accommodation of the guests, who spent a pleasant and enjoyable afternoon. We regret our ability to attend the picnic, owing to pressing business in another direction, so we are indebted to a friend for this report.

HIGHLANDING NEWS.

Mr. Frank LaCount is helping Mrs. Overum in harvest.

Mr. Tanner visited Henry Costello and family last Sunday.

Mr. A. Tharaldson our blacksmith took in two days of the County Fair.

Andrew Ellingson imported a four year old mare last Monday. Just what we want in this country, some good imported stock.

A. Ellingson and family took in the Ladies Aid Picnic at C. Woldron's Park Grove in Hickory last Sunday, and they report a splendid time.

Wm. Lindahl and Theodore Rustad attended Ben Zimenski's wedding dance last Saturday, near Rhoda. All that were present report a very pleasant evening.

Fined For Not Voting.

The outstanding feature of most British elections is the large number of electors who fail to record their vote. In some countries voting is compulsory and electors are fined if they do not do their duty as citizens and avail themselves of the franchise.

According to the universal suffrage law of Australia, all those on the register must record their votes, and at the last general election in that country 50,000 electors were fined sums from 6s. 4d. downward because they neglected to go to the polls.

Spain is another country that looks on voting as a national duty, at least in a municipal election. Should a citizen omit to cast his vote his name is published as a defaulter, his taxes are increased by 2 per cent, while if he be in the public service his salary is reduced by 1 per cent. Should he commit the fault a second time he is debarred forever from holding an elective position or an appointment under government.—London Spare Moments.

Wiles of the Waiter.

"I know I am looking like a fright tonight," the woman said.

The man studied her dress, her hair and her complexion closely.

"I don't see anything the matter with you," he said. "So far as I can see, you are looking as well as usual."

"But I am not," she insisted. "There is something wrong, and that head waiter saw at a glance what it was. If I had been up to the mark he wouldn't have put us away over here in this out of the way corner. He would have given us a table right under the chandelier in the middle of the room.

"All the best dressed people are always seated in the most conspicuous places, so as to make the restaurant look more attractive. I am glad to say that that is where I usually sit. The plain people are ranged along the sides of the room, just as we are tonight.

"That is why I know I am not looking well."—New York Times.

A Perilous Experience.

While hunting in the Big Horn mountains two men found a narrow path, little more than a deer trail, leading up to the summit. They dismounted and led their horses, moving very cautiously, for on one side the mountain rose up like a wall, and on the other sloped down a thousand feet to the canyon below. Suddenly both horses pricked up their ears as if scenting a wild beast. When there came a

He had been leading the horse by the reins and when the horse shied and upset him he held on with a death grip. Pigs and a Palace.

King Charles of Roumania made many changes in his Balkan kingdom since he arrived there in 1866 after an adventurous journey in disguise from Germany. Notable among them are the changes in the capital and the royal palace. When he made his triumphal entry as the country's new prince the carriage reached a house before which a guard of honor was stationed. "What house is that?" he asked. "That is the palace," replied General Goleski. The prince, thinking he had misunderstood him, said, "Where is the palace?" And the general was so embarrassed that he could only point silently to the one storied building. The principal feature of the view from the windows on one side was a gypsy encampment, with swine wallowing in the main road before the palace.

THE LOCAL NEWS

Post cards for sale at this office.

E. B. Lanegar, Henry Enderle and Tom Norby of Plummer were Highlanding visitors yesterday.

Bernhard Knudsen and Attorney H. O. Kjomme were up this way interviewing the voters yesterday.

We understand that an attempt will be made to move the Highlanding post-office north to the new railroad townsite.

Wheat took another big jump upward this week, owing to the European war, and meat promptly followed suit.

If we do not get any rain before the stacking is done, plowing will be uphill business, and particularly on clay land.

Postmaster Kratka, John Newbury and John Gonyear, of Thief River Falls, were up this way looking over realestate Monday.

John Polbrook has grown tired of batching on his Deer Park farm, and has accepted a position as hostler at the Witcherman livery barn at Plummer.

The editor is shocking grain this week, and the printer is driving the binder, which makes it uphill business running a newspaper.

Some of the fields of wheat are badly injured by rust, and the early sown grain on fall plowing seems to have suffered the most.

C.L. Clark went down to Thief River Falls after two loads of lumber for T. C. Halverson's new store in the town of Goodridge, today.

Another investigation has been called by congress to investigate the high cost of living. We can tell them what is the reason, it is because there are too many consumers, and not enough producers.

State Fire Warden Edward Singer, was up this way yesterday. We suppose that he was investigating to see if there was any fires around. We heard there was one up at Erie this week started by a farmer's wife, to get dinner.

We drove down to Plummer last Saturday after a new binder, and got it ready to start up Tuesday morning, but owing to faulty constructing the darned thing could not be got to work before Tuesday afternoon, but it is running fine now.

Candidates, for official honors this fall should begin to get their announcements before the voters in their local papers. In going down the road to Thief River Falls, we often notice the placecards of candidates who were eliminated at the June Primaries.

Our popular County Auditor might perhaps rent part of Lewis A. Nelson's farm for next season. As there is lots of grubbing and clearing up of brush land to do on that farm, Mr. Fasel and Nelson could both find plenty of employment, clearing up and breaking land for flax.

Again we wish to caution automobile drivers about rushing out into a grain field where boys, and sometimes girls are driving a binder, with horses that at scared of it. Harvest help is rather scarce in this locality, and it helps to have the youngsters drive the binder, while the old man shocks up the grain.

The new church in the town of Mayfield is beginning to look like a church, as the contractor Oscar Nesland is rushing the work in his usual vigorous manner. The church when completed will be a credit to the people of the town of Mayfield, and particularly the Ladies Aid Society who have materially assisted in building it.

Joseph and Frank LaCount left for North Dakota, today, where they will stay and work through harvest.

Thief River Falls should not be entitled to vote on the office of County Superintendent of Schools, but as they now have the right to vote, they should not bunch their votes to "mob" a candidate out of office that might be satisfactory to the school officers of the county. Or in other words they should divide their votes and allow the country to make the selection of their Superintendent.

One of the Sights of Paris.

The Paris department stores are worse jumbles even than the English department stores. When there is a special sale under way the bargain counters are rigged up on the sidewalks. There, in the open air, buyer and seller will chaffer and bicker and wrangle and quarrel and kiss and make up again—for all the world to see. One of the free sights of Paris is a frugal Frenchman with his face extensively haired over pawing like a Skye terrier through a heap of marked down lingerie, picking out things for the female members of his household to wear, now testing some material with his tongue, now holding a personal article up in the sunlight to examine the fabric—while his wife stands humbly, dumbly by, waiting for him to complete his selections.—Irving S. Cobb in Saturday Evening Post.

A Bird In the Hand, Etc.

The minister had just pronounced the words which made them one. Of course the next thing of importance was the fee.

The bridegroom looked at his bride, then at the minister. Fumbling in his pocket, he produced a two dollar bill.

"Here is a two dollar bill I will give you now," he said, "or I will wait until the end of six months and pay you what I think it is worth, even if it is a hundred dollars. You can take your choice."

The minister studied a moment, glanced at the bride and hastily replied:

"I'll take the $2 now."—Indianapolis News.

The Reconciliation.

The doctor was soon at the child's bedside. Remedies were administered; then the agonized pair watched the fight for life—skill and vitality on one side, fierce disease on the other. When at last the struggle ceased the gray dawn of day was looking in at the window. Life had won. The child slept.

"She is all right now," said the doctor, shaking the man's hand, which had gripped his, and feeling his heart grow warmer under the look of mute gratitude the woman turned upon him.

When he had gone the two stood side by side at the baby's crib, listening to her regular breathing. Then with one accord they turned and kissed each other. And in that kiss the icy barrier between them melted away.—Atlanta Constitution.

Stale Bread Day.

A traveler says that a curious weakness of [illegible] Moors is the love of eating newly baked bread. The caid of Azemmoor, in Morocco, discovered that old bread was thrown away as waste. To waste food is a serious offense in the eyes of a Moslem. The caid of Azemmoor therefore issued a bylaw prohibiting the baking of bread upon one day in each week. The citizens, he declared, must eat up the bread already baked, and he fixed Wednesday as the "khalah," or ball day.

Astronomically Speaking.

Before he became a newspaper man James S. Black was a collector in Flagstaff for awhile. He was given a bill against Director Lowell of the observatory and tramped up the long hill from the town to see the astronomer one hot June morning when the mountain sun blazed its hottest.

Arrived at the top, Black inquired of an attendant if Lowell was there. After the manner of collectors he followed up a negative answer with inquiries as to his probable return.

"Will he be back this afternoon?"

"No."

"Will he be back tomorrow?"

"No."

"Will he be back next day?"

The attendant couldn't say.

"Well," said Black, getting desperate, "do you know when he will be back?"

"Oh, he'll be back for the transit of Venus!" said the attendant.

"That finished it," said Black in telling the story. "Not being an astronomer, I gave up that bill."—Popular Magazine.

Nose Tip Vaccination.

The young Japanese diplomat pointed to his father, the marquis.

"That's father," he said, "the old fellow with the saucer shaped scar on the tip of his nose. All Japs of the older generation have that scar."

"Yes," said the debutante.

"Yes; it's a vaccination mark. In the old days, when compulsory vaccination first began, we Japs vaccinated everybody on the tip of the nose. Why? Well, because it was a good place, where there's no movement to rub off the scab, and also because the vaccination scar on the nose was easily identified by the medical officers of the government. A man didn't have to take off half his clothes in order to prove that he'd been vaccinated.

"Yes; the nose tip vaccination had its good points, but before the modern hankering after beauty it had to go."—New York Tribune.

Spider Racing.

Lord Devon's property was greatly impoverished by the twelfth earl, who squandered nearly all his fortune and terribly embarrassed the entailed property. He was addicted to a most peculiar form of gambling, namely, spider racing, which he played with the last Marquis of Hastings and the eighth Duke of Bedford. Each player selected a spider, which was placed on the table, and then the latter was gently heated from underneath. The warmth caused the insects to run, and the spider which got to the edge first won. But spiders are curious creatures, and it would frequently happen that a spider which was near the edge and looked like winning would double back, traverse the table in all directions and lose its backer the thousands of pounds so nearly won. Lord Devon, Lord Hastings and the Duke of Bedford each of them squandered enormous sums on this game, which contributed in no small degree to the ruin of the two former.—New York Tribune.

The Origin of Algebra.

If Diophantus of Alexandria, fourth century of the Christian era, was not the inventor of algebra, then it is not known to whom the honor belongs. To Diophantus the honor is generally given. The Arabians claim that the invention belongs to one of their countrymen, Mohammed Ben-Musa, who flourished about the middle of the ninth century. Certain it is that the Arabians introduced algebra to Europe by way of Italy through Leonardo, a merchant of Pisa, who had lived among the Arabs of Barbary. Leonardo's treatise was written in 1202.

"You may be getting finnan haddie when you order it at your dealer's," said a buyer for a restaurant, "and you may not. Finnan haddie is smoked haddock. Haddock is of the same family as the cod. It resembles the codfish, but has a black lateral line. The lateral line of the codfish is white. The appearance of this line is not changed by the smoking, and if you take the trouble to glance down the sides of the fish that you are buying as finnan haddie you will often see that the line is white, not black. Cod may be just as good, as the dealer will perhaps tell you, but if you want finnan haddie that is doubtless what you want."—New York Sun.

Ancient Gallantry.

The respect and veneration paid to the fair sex formed an essential ingredient in chivalry. Principle of female adoration so predominently displayed in every aspect of chivalry extended its influence to the laws of the times, for we find James II. of Aragon ordering in this manner: "We will that every man, whether knight or no, who shall be in company with a lady pass safe and unmolested unless he be guilty of murder."

And Louis II., Duke of Bourbon, instituting the order of the Golden Shield, enjoins his knights to honor, above all the ladies and not permit any one to slander them, "because," adds he, "from them; after God, comes all the honor that man can acquire."

SYNOPSIS.

Anne Ives, mascot by reputation, starts from Winnipeg for London to attend the coronation of King George. Her father was the Compte d'Yves of France. Following a quarrel with the comte, Anne's father went to America, where he married. At his death he left Anne a key to a strong box in the vaults of Magniff & Co., Paris bankers. The box is said to contain bonds of the defunct French Panama Canal company. On the steamer Anne meets the dissolute son of Banker Magniff who, not knowing her identity, tells Anne of a proposed scheme to get hold of the Panama bonds and extort money from his father. Anne attends an aviation meet in London.

CHAPTER II—Continued.

But it was not so much the thought that we were attracting attention as the knowledge that she admired this man whom I, always an ardent hero-worshiper, had already in mind appropriated for my own. I don't mean in any vulgar sense, of course. Had he had the audacity to speak to me without a proper introduction, I should have cut him dead, but I admired him as the exponent of a difficult and dangerous art. He drove like a god!—Harry and his little affair at home were nothing to him.

And he did not receive the prize!

We were so disgusted with the judges' decision that we mutually forgave each other and resolved to share our hero in common. As for the unknown, he did not seem to care a bit. He doffed his cap lightly to the clamoring multitudes and, descending, turned to some of his assistants.

"What are they going to do now?" asked Estelle.

"The next act will be the dangerous, desperate and death-defying ascension to an incredible altitude with a passenger," remarked a pudgy gentleman upon the seat beside us.

Of course I turned a cold shoulder upon the impudent fellow, and Estelle only acknowledged his information with the coolest nod. But still we could not help possessing this morsel of knowledge, and I confess I looked forward with a thrill of painful expectation to the hazardous undertaking, and my heart beat faster for the safety of the unknown.

And then a dreadful thing happened. The passenger whom our hero had arranged to take on his ascension had either lost his nerve or his way; anyhow, by the time the others were ready to start he was still being sought for among the audience.

Our hero stood not a dozen paces away from me, his strong, grave face turned upward expectantly, scanning the crowd upon the grand stand, but always in vain. The passenger who was to accompany him was evidently not upon the grounds.

Meanwhile, one by one, the other aeroplanes, with their double freight, were rising slowly, like great birds.

A couple of stewards, in frock coats and silk hats, came over to our unknown. At the short distance at which they stood I could hear every word distinctly.

"Your passenger has not come?" demanded one of the stewards coolly, and I think there was a touch of malicious pleasure in his voice.

"It appears not," answered the unknown, shrugging his shoulders. And then I understood the meaning of that malicious intonation. This man was a foreigner—like myself; and, good sportsmen though they were, the stewards could not but feel a natural pleasure at the possible removal of one of their nation's most dangerous rivals.

"It is possible," began the aviator slowly, searching for his words with painful precision, "it is possible to take up a volunteer?"

"No," snapped one of the stewards; and "yes," answered the other with equal volubility.

"I will look up the exact wording in the book of rules," said the first again, and from his immaculate frock coat he produced a little leather bound book, which he inspected through a pair of gold-rimmed glasses.

"I gather from rule XXV that the personality of the passenger is of no consequence," he announced at last. "So, if you can find one, sir, you may take up a volunteer."

The aviator bowed. "If anyone will accompany me—" he murmured, and the steward advanced directly toward me and cried in a loud voice:

"Will any gentleman volunteer to make the ascent with Competitor No. 6?"

At least a half dozen gentlemen began to rise in their seats.

"The aeroplane will ascend to the highest point possible," he continued—and all but two dropped down again. These remained standing, gazing at each other sheepishly.

"And then descend with the motor cut off," he continued; and both of them fell back with a solid thump that shook the benches.

"I am afraid that no volunteer is available, sir," said the steward, retiring a few steps toward the contestant.

To this day I do not know what possessed me. Was it the sense of fellowship in a strange land, or sporting instincts, or merely contempt for the cowards upon the benches? Anyhow, before I knew what I was doing, before I knew that I had contemplated such a step, I was standing outside the grand stand in the turf field.

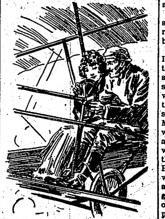
"I will ascend with Competitor No. 6," I said.

I heard a shriek of horror from Estelle Christie; I saw the faces of the spectators turned upon me, each, fringed with its mop of hair, exactly reminiscent of some large and very pale turnip. The stewards ran toward me.

"Impossible!" they cried. "We could not think of such a thing."

"Then, Mr. Competitor No. 6, I congratulate you upon gaining the prize," I said satirically, pointing toward the other aeroplanes that rose in spiral circles and now hummed overhead like angry bees. "Rule XXV makes, I believe, no discrimination against my sex," I continued at a venture.

"My dear lady, it is impossible. Rather would I forego the prize," said the unknown, much agitated. "Your courage thrills me and overwhelm me with gratitude, but no—a thousand times no. I could never accept your offer."



"We Have Outsoared Them All."

"Si monsieur aie peur—" I hazarded. It was not such a long shot, either, for the daring aeronaut looked more French than Italian, and, if so, I knew the suggestion that he was afraid would touch him. It did. He colored like a schoolgirl.

"Mademoiselle is also French?" he cried. "Come then, and we shall beat them all. But what am I saying? No, no, it is impossible. I cannot risk your life."

"Monsieur's machine is not, then, absolutely under his control?" I inquired coldly.

He had turned away, the picture of dejection, but as this new blow went home he came forward again, kindled to new ardor. I looked from his face to those of the stewards. And just then, as matters hung in the balance, the event was turned decisively by a voice from a back seat among the benches.

"Gorn!" it cried derisively. "W'y don'tcher let the lidy ride outside?"

The whole of the grand stand was convulsed in laughter. The stewards threw up their hand is despair; then, while the aviator still hesitated, I took him by the arm and almost dragged him toward his machine.

"Courage, monsieur," I said. "We shall win the prize together."

An answering glance of exultation was shot back to me.

"We shall," he cried, and with those words all hesitation and doubt disappeared. "You shall be safe as a little bird. Step up, mademoiselle. Carefully; do not let the oil-drip from the motor soil your dress. So. Now"—and he flung a furry coat over my shoulders. "It is cold up there, in the dominions of the sun-god," he said gleefully. "Hold fast to that stay, mademoiselle." He shouted an order to his attendants and leaped in beside me. The motor thrilled; we moved—and just then I heard a second and more piercing shriek from the benches, and turning my head ever so slightly, saw that Estelle Christie had fainted away.

But I had little thought of her, for all my energies were bent upon the task of conquering my fear. We were rising; how far we had risen I did not know until, looking dizzily down, I saw the upturned faces of the spectators, apparently almost level with the ground, and the grand stand like a section of slabs laid horizontally upon the turf. Now we were circling the field with long, curving, undulating sweeps. Over our heads, at intervals other aeroplanes hummed.

"Five hundred feet, mademoiselle," said a voice in my ear.

I turned toward him. There he sat, his hands upon the levers, calm, imperturbable, self possessed; and the machine obeyed beautifully each slightest pressure of his fingers.

"We shall win, mademoiselle," he announced calmly. "She behaves better than ever before. Ah, but it takes French hearts to accomplish such deeds as this."

"I am a Canadian," I answered coldly.

"A Canadian!" he muttered, and I saw a look of dejection pass over his face.

"But my father was a Frenchman," I said, relenting. And once more happiness beamed in his gray eyes.

"I knew you must be French," he answered. "Then you can have no fear. No, mademoiselle, I shall take her higher." He pressed the lever and I felt the aeroplane rise upon a drifting gust of air, up, up, till the humming sounded beneath us, and, glancing down, I saw that another aeroplane was fluttering under us like a bird with a broken wing, desperately and fruitlessly endeavoring to win to the higher stratum which we had attained.

Again he pressed the lever, and again we shot upward. Now we were above them all. Under us, from point to point of the field, our opponents struggled and flapped, but never won to that world of silence in which we moved so easily. We seemed to ride upon the air as a swan floats on the water. Far, very far beneath, I could make out the grand stand as a tiny patch of gray upon a field of green, and the spectators were smaller than tiny ants in a hillock. My companion looked at his barometer.

"Three thousand feet," he said; and I saw his teeth chatter.

"You are cold!" I cried, and began to divest myself of the fur coat. "Take this, monsieur," I exclaimed. "You need your strength for the ascent. You must not let your hands grow chilled."

"Sit tight, sit tight, mademoiselle," he answered. "No, I do not need it. Well, then I will take one corner—so." And he suffered me to throw one edge of the voluminous wrap around his shoulders.

"We have outsoared them all," he said. "We shall descend now."

"No, you have a record to make," I answered.

"But we have already won, mademoiselle. Never before has my monoplane ridden so lightly. Assuredly you must be a mascot."

My heart was beating tumultuously. It was a dangerous proximity; and then, too, the unconventionality of the situation had removed the bars of restraint which a hundred generations of women have learned to fasten across their hearts. I am not usually considered susceptible. There was that Mr. Spratt, whom I have mentioned who taught civil and international law, and he had once presumed slightly when riding home with me from the theater. I think he pressed my hand. Poor Mr. Spratt! I had frozen him with a look and he had had to make abject apologies before he found forgiveness. But here, I was conscious of a dangerous emotion which took possession of me, and my companion's hand sought mine and was not discarded. We might have been primeval man and woman riding triumphantly alone there through the ether.

The sun, bursting from behind a bank of clouds, shone into our faces.

"These are the realms of the sun-god," said my companion. "And you," he whispered, "are my sun-goddess."

He bent toward me and looked into my eyes. And what would have happened next I do not know. The mortification, after I reached terra firma, overwhelmed me with remorse and shame. But just at that moment the humming of the motor suddenly ceased. It had stopped—and stopped so suddenly that my companion was not prepared for it. The monoplane trembled and swayed dangerously.

Instantly I was forgotten. Afterward I remembered with a little sense of humiliation how wholly secondary I proved in his estimation to that machine. But I had no thought then, save for our safety. With what consummate skill he righted her and guided her, never losing his head, gliding downward swift as a stone; then, with an upward movement of the planes, arresting that perilous descent; now holding the machine tremblingly, as it seemed, upon some air-wave crest! I saw the ground spring up to meet us; the grand stand broadened and widened into its original form and shape; slowly, and then more swiftly, the ant-like creatures changed into turnip-tops once more. I closed my eyes and clung to the stay, expecting every moment to feel the deadly end to our tumultuous descent. And then—

"She has fainted," said somebody.

I opened my eyes languidly. I rested upon the ground, supported by the intrepid aviator; and near at hand, wholly uninjured, rested the monoplane.

Then somebody led Estelle through the yelling crowd, and she was weeping upon my neck.

When at last they suffered me to depart I looked round for my sun-god. He was not to be found. And it was only after I reached home that I remembered that I was wholly ignorant of his name. It was not in the newspapers where he was entered simply as "Aviator No. 6."

CHAPTER III.

The Man in the Buff Boots.

(I met old friends and enemies at the coronation and forgot to look at the king.)

Estelle was half hysterical when she got home to our London boarding-house after my venturesome flight in the monoplane of the unknown aviator. When she revived she began scolding me.

"Mercy, child!" she exclaimed, when we were settled in her room that evening. "It made my blood run cold, to see you up there, a tiny dot in the sky, circling round the grounds. What notoriety, too! And with an unknown man. Who was he, I wonder? How handsome he was! If the reporters had got hold of your name—"

"I thought you told me that you wanted to be thrilled," I observed meekly. The fact was that a realization of my own audacity had been growing upon me ever since the event, and I could not but admit that my scolding was more than justified.

"But with an unknown man," said Agnes. "And a Frenchman, too. You know what sort of reputation Frenchmen have."

"My father was a Frenchman," I answered coldly.

Estelle kissed me. "Well, my dear, I'll say no more about it," she concluded. "And I must confess you certainly were a mascot, for you won a big prize for him. He ought to have offered you a share in it." Her face lit up. "Ah, doubtless that was why he hurried away afterward without waiting to speak to us—he didn't want to divide with you."

"It is not true," I exclaimed hotly. "He was a gentleman. He knew instinctively that I would not have accepted any share in the prize. He—"

But my protests died away upon my lips. The fact is, I was furiously angry with the unknown; angry first, because I had so passively permitted that airy flirtation on the part of a complete stranger; then, again, because of the unceremonious nature of his departure, without mentioning his name. That was no way to treat Anne Ives, who generally gave as good as she got, better, and was not used to cavalier treatment. Smarting under the sting of my humiliation, I longed for another encounter with the unknown that I might prove to him that he had held me in too cheap estimation.

A few days later on the very eve of the Coronation, an answer came from the Lord Chamberlain to the letter which Estelle Christie had sent him, asking for seats in the Abbey as the accredited representative of Cedar Plank, Iowa. It was of the most formal character, and briefly regretted that he had no seats in the Abbey to place at her disposal. Estelle wept after she had read it.

"It is't for myself I care at all," she sobbed. "But how can I ever face the citizens of Cedar Plank, Iowa, again, and say that I could not obtain permission to witness the Coronation, when they have elected me a special delegate to represent them, by a plurality of seventy-five?"

Estelle had been so sure of obtaining leave that she had not even purchased a seat upon any of the high stands that had been erected throughout the city, from which one could at least obtain a view of the procession. Now it would be impossible.

I had an inspiration.

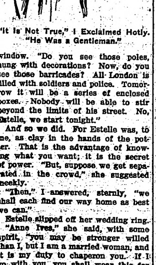
"Listen, Estelle!" I exclaimed. "Do you know what I have always found? That if you want anything done for you you must do it yourself. It's no use applying to anybody else. Dangers exist," I continued, rising to a heroic pitch, "just to be conquered. Let us apply in person at the Abbey doors."

"But suppose they turn us down," said Estelle, ceasing to weep and regarding me with eyes wide with wonder.

"Then, at least, we shall have tried before accepting defeat," I answered, bravely. "But we shall not fail. No, I am confident of success. Have I not told you that I am a mascot? I always bring others luck."

Estelle began to catch the contagion of my mood. "We will," she cried, her spirits rising with the rapidity of the thermometer after a thunder-shower on a warm day. "We'll start tomorrow early, so as to be an hour ahead of time."

I laughed her to scorn. "Come here!" I cried, and dragged her to the window. "Do you see those poles, hung with decorations? Now, do you see those barricades? All London is filled with soldiers and police. Tomorrow it will be a series of enclosed boxes. Nobody will be able to stir beyond the limits of his street. No, Estelle, we start tonight."



"It Is Not True," I Exclaimed Hotly. "He Was a Gentleman."

And so we did. For Estelle was, to me, as clay in the hands of the potter. That is the advantage of knowing what you want; it is the secret of power. "But, suppose we get separated in the crowd," she suggested meekly.

"Then," I answered, sternly, "we shall each find our way home as best we can."

Estelle slipped off her wedding ring.

"Anne Ives," she said, with some spirit, "you may be stronger willed than I, but I am a married woman, and it is my duty to chaperon you. If I go with you, you shall wear this for your own protection. Now I feel more content," she sighed. "I feel that I have done my best to protect you against this madness of yours."

For she had already forgotten that it was she who had been the prime mover in our undertaking.

We slipped out of the house and made our way cityward. Dawn found us waiting in a dense crowd close to the Dean's Yard entrance to the Abbey doors as a triple line of policemen would permit. We had stood there for hours; we had been jostled and mobbed, our hats were askew and our dresses crushed; but we were in the front rank of spectators, and even the hundreds on the grand stands, that had been built close to the Abbey entrance, could see no more than we. By ten o'clock we were scarcely able to stand.

"Is there any chance of getting in to see the Coronation?" I asked a mounted policeman, as he backed his horse into me.

He laughed out loudly.

"Not much there ain't, Miss," he answered. "W'y, all the seats was allotted weeks ago, to peers and their ladies and the foreign princes and nobles. Folks like you and me can't see nothink."

"The impudence of the creature!" murmured Estelle, bridling in her new-found British dignity. "If I had you in Cedar Plank—"

"Hush, never mind," I said. "Listen! Here comes somebody!"

A murmur that came out of the distance swelled into a cheer, which taken up by those in our vicinity, announced that the procession was approaching. Of course the main body of the participants in the ceremony entered the main doors of the Abbey; at the Dean's Yard entrance, where we were standing, the "lesser fry" came in. Nevertheless, their presence was sufficiently imposing, their uniforms and robes awe-provoking, and the equipment of their carriages alone, I could see, impressed Estelle, who was more used to motor-cars and buggies than coaches with out-riders. The crowd closed in round the dignitaries whose vehicles pulled up around the Dean's Yard; but the police quickly massed themselves into a solid phalanx in front of us, and I could only perceive, through the occasional spaces in their blue ranks, the strangely-clad ministers and lesser envoys of foreign states who were not permitted to join in the main processional. Each was saluted with ringing but half-ironical cheers as he descended from his carriage and strode to the entrance, where, after a glance at his card of admission, the watchful guardians made way for him. So dense became the crush that we were swept off our feet, tossed hither and thither, and even the police could barely keep their ranks. Suddenly the cry went up:

"Pickpockets! Look out for your purses!"

I clutched at my handbag. Thank heaven! I had it still, tucked away safely inside. Hastily I inspected the contents. Yes, there lay my precious $500. And there lay the key to the safe in the vaults of Magniff & Co., bankers, of Paris, where lay my Panama bonds, which were so eagerly sought by Magniff, junior, and his villainous associate, Zeuxis. I clutched my purse tightly in my gloved hand, resolved not to let go of it.

"Why should those people enter when we are excluded?" murmured Estelle, plaintively. "Look, look, Anne!" she exclaimed, grabbing me excitedly. "They're letting black men in! Isn't that a shame? Black men, with towels about their heads, and we kept standing here. What shall I tell the folks at Cedar Plank?"

"Estelle," I answered, speaking from some curious interior conviction, "we shall yet find some way of entering. I am a mascot."

She glanced at me incredulously, yet with the pathetic confidence of a small child. Although full ten years older than I, she felt the dominance of my own purposeful nature. I am not lightly deterred from my intentions. And just then, while I was wondering how to make good my foolish boast, I saw an acquaintance.

The police, as I think I have said, had temporarily lost control of the crowd and had been forced back until they were lined up against the carriages which brought up the rear of the procession. At this moment a carriage halted close to us, and its occupants, seeing that it would be impossible to drive up closer, descended, with the object of making the few remaining paces of the journey to the Abbey door afoot. One was a tall, distinguished-looking old man, with snow-white hair and mustache, attired, like the younger man upon whose arm he leaned, in a rich military uniform. A broad sash crossed his breast, which was covered with orders; he wore a cavalry coat, riding breeches and a pair of the highest, widest buff riding boots that I have ever seen, rising far above the knees and ending in wide, gaping, cavernous tops, in which, I thought incongruously, he could have concealed his luncheon quite easily. And the younger was my unknown aviator!

They descended from their carriage and surveyed the mob with some curiosity. Evidently, I thought, the older man represented his government in some military capacity. Then who was the other who had masqueraded as "Competitor No. 6" at the South Northwood aviation grounds? He was quite simply dressed in a silk hat and frock coat; he might have been anybody. They halted immediately in front of us and began conversing in French.

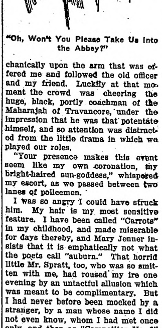
"It is well, Charles," said the elder "that we did not bring your mother with us. She could never have forced her way through this loyal crowd."

"We might have taken some of our friends instead," answered the younger. "Our cards read 'and two ladies.' Who the ladies may be is not specified."

During this brief conversation the pair had been standing almost cheek by jowl with us. Angry feelings, coupled with humiliation, coursed through my mind, and I felt my face flush intolerably. I was endeavoring with all my power to dodge away from them, when, to my horror, I perceived that Estelle recognized the younger man, and heard her, at my elbow, exclaim in plaintive tones:

"Oh, won't you please take us into the Abbey?"

They spun round in astonishment at this unexpected address. I saw a look of recognition come into the aviator's eyes. He turned to his companion and muttered something; both raised their hats, and, with the gallantest of bows, our unknown offered his arm to—me! At the same time the elder man offered his own to Estelle. It was all done so aptly, and took me so by surprise, that I placed my hand mechanically upon the arm that was offered me and followed the old officer and my friend. Luckily at that moment the crowd was cheering the huge, black, portly coachman of the Maharajah of Travancore, under the impression that he was that potentate himself, and so attention was distracted from the little drama in which we played our roles.



"Oh, Won't You Please Take Us Into the Abbey?"

"Your presence makes this event seem like my own coronation, my bright-haired sun-goddess," whispered my escort, as we passed between two lanes of policemen.

I was so angry I could have struck him. My hair is my most sensitive feature. I have been called "Carrots" in my childhood, and made miserable for days thereby, and Mary Jenner insists that it is emphatically not what the poets call "auburn." That horrid little Mr. Spratt, too, who was so smitten with me, had roused my ire one evening by an untactful allusion which was meant to be complimentary. But I had never before been mocked by a stranger, by a man whose name I did not even know, whom I had met once only, and then as "Competitor No. 6" in an aviation contest. Did he suppose American girls to be so shallow and foolish as to accept these half-baked compliments for genuine? I loathed and hated him then more than I had ever hated anybody before.

However, being a Frenchman, he had the perspicacity to read my emotions in my face.

"Forgive me if I offended, Mademoiselle," he said, humbly. "If you delay we shall not be able to gain admittance. See, that policeman suspects us. Let us go in."

I let him draw my arm through his own. A fatal indecision possessed me. I own I did want to see the coronation, and I wanted Estelle to do so, too, if only to save her reputation in her native city of Cedar Plank. Then, too, I was faint from the long standing in the sun, and hardly in full possession of my faculties. As I moved onward toward the Abbey doors, a pace behind the elder man and Estelle, suddenly the cry "Pickpockets" was raised again. I clutched my purse tighter. And then, while I moved on, half conscious, eager only for the cool seclusion of the interior of the building, as in a dream I saw the evil face of the Greek Zeuxis swim before my eyes. The man brushed against my companion. I thought I saw his hand go to his breast pocket, as though to search it. It was the act of a moment; I could not be sure that he had really robbed him, and then the recollection of it was driven from my mind by the most humiliating catastrophe.

Zeuxis swept past me; there was a little rush of spectators; somebody struck my hand, and my purse flew from it and disappeared right in the hollow top of one of the old gentleman's buff boots. And he walked on serenely unconscious of the disaster, carrying my $500 and the key to the vault which held my Panama bonds!

Suddenly the murmur of a thousand subdued voices broke upon my ears, and a grateful coolness relieved my tired eyes. We were within the Abbey, marching up one of the aisles as though by right equivalent with that of the five hundred peers and peeresses in brilliant robes, who sat dandling their coronets upon their knees and looking uncommonly commonplace and unimportant in that vast Gothic building.

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

The Bubble Reputation.

"She may have been wicked. She was at least brave, frank and open. She was no hypocrite." Eleanor Gates, the clever young playwright, was talking about a young and beautiful girl suicide. She resumed: "She was no hypocrite. Thus, at a tango tea, lifting a glass of champagne high in air, I once heard her cry, in answer to certain scandalous and false rumors: 'Oh, what's a reputation, anyway? Half the world waste their lives trying to live up to it, and the other half waste theirs trying to live it down.'"

As Herbert Cory tells it, he went to a dinner once where Andrew Carnegie was a guest.

"After the eating was over and the speechmaking had started," said Corey, "Mr. Carnegie reached in his pocket for something and pulled out a handfull of smal change. A dime got away from him and fell on the floor, and at the first chance Mr. Carnegie got down under the table and looked for it."

"Did he find it?" asked one of the audience to whom Corey was narrating the incident.

"Did he find it?" echoed Corey. "He found 15 cents!"—Saturday Evening Post.

HUBBY GOT THE GOODS, BUT—

It Was in the First Flush of the Honeymoon, and He Says "Never Again!"

"Never again," was the conclusion of a story told by a young bridegroom of a month, after he related his efforts to please his bride by fulfilling her every wish.

Sitting in his office a few days after the wedding he received a telephone call which was something like this: "Dearie, I do so hate to trouble you, but I have run out of lace for that dress I was making, and I can't finish it until I have another yard. Can't you stop at the store and get some as you come home—Oh, I can tell you what it is like—just four leaves, then a sprig, then four leaves, then a sprig, and so on—it's just two threads over an inch wide."

He hung up the receiver and mopped his brow. He walked by the store twice, finally entered and approached the lace counter. She was pretty, but he had been married only a week and was busy repeating in his mind: "four leaves, then a sprig."

"Well, after looking at 500 samples of lace, I got it, but—"—Indianapolis News.

No Airs About Her.

"Airs!" exclaimed the proud mother, and shook her head vigorously. "My Elsie, for all her learning, hasn't any more airs, so to speak, than her poor old dad."

"Then she won't turn up her nose at her old friends?" queried the visitor.

"La, no!"

"How refreshing! Most girls who go through college nowadays will hardly look at you after they're graduated."

"Well, they ain't like my Elsie, that's all I can say," retorted Elsie's ma. "She's become a carnivorous reader, of course, and she frequently importunes music. But stuck up—my Elsie? Not a bit. She's unanimous to everybody, has a most infantile vocabulary, and what's more, never keeps a caller waiting while she dresses up. No, she just runs down, nom de plume, as she is."

Following Precedent.

Pat was servant of a farmer, and in his charge was a donkey which was kept to amuse his employer's children.

The donkey was following the farmer's wife round the yard one day, and the farmer, turning to Pat, said:

"I think that donkey is taking a liking to my wife."

"Och," said Pat, "shure and it's not the first donkey that's took a liking to her, sir."

She Wouldn't Squeal.

KING OF THE CAMP

By JEFFERSON JOHNSON.

There was anarchy in the lumber camp before Jan Sorenson appeared. A lumber camp without a king is like a hive of bees without a queen. When Sorenson's six feet lurched in at the door, however, all knew that their ruler had arrived.

The bosses knew it too and rejoiced, because they would be able to get twice the output daily. There was no attempt to dispute Big Jan's kingship. There was nobody in camp that could have stood up to him for thirty seconds. He was cased in immense muscles that rippled and bulged with every movement.

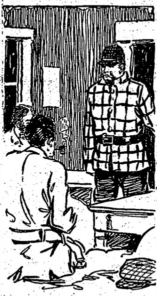
The nearest camp, twelve miles away, had a king too. It was natural that he and Sorenson should meet. Dozens of pairs of socks were waged upon the battle, but it only lasted a minute and a half. At the end of that time Sorenson, with half a dozen yards of footgear round his neck, the trophy of his victory, was sponging the blood from his prostrate enemy's eyes.

After that Sorenson was king as far as the limits of the spruce timber belt, and he reigned unchallenged. A tyrannous king he was, too, a drunken brute without reverence for anything except a man who could stand up and take a thrashing. Big Jan was kindly to the enemies he beat.

Far away to the south spread the rumors of Sorenson's fame. And the next south wind brought back reports of a mighty man of battle in a southern camp thirty miles away. He was a Scotchman, and his name was Andy McTavish. Sorenson heard of him and drank less, and lay awake at night in his bunk, dreaming impossible insults.

It seemed impossible for the two kings to meet. Once Sorenson put on his snowshoes and covered the entire distance between dawn and dusk. But it happened that McTavish was away fifteen miles in the interior, working an engine. Sorenson left his challenge and went back.

Presently the answer came. The two men were to meet in April, when the lumbering season was over, at a point half-way between the two camps.



All Knew That Their Ruler Had Arrived.

Father Flynn, who had heard of the project, tried to dissuade Sorenson. He did not mind a fight, but he objected to one attended with so much bitterness as this must be. Even Sorenson dared not offend the sentiment of the camp, which was warm toward Father Flynn. So he concealed his contempt for the sky-pilot under as decent language as he could muster, but refused.

The two men met at the appointed place. McTavish was an older man, but bigger and even more muscular. They fought for five and forty minutes in the center of a yelling crowd. At last both ceased from weariness. There were still two kings in the lumber country.

"I'll meet you on Christmas day," snarled Sorenson, between his swollen lips, and McTavish, who could not speak, nodded. So the two kings separated and went their ways.

Sorenson did not forget. He ceased drinking in September and devoted himself to training. He did not even smoke. The thought that there might be another king in the lumber country was intolerable to him. The story of the impending fight went all up and down the land.

"Jan," said Father Flynn, "you are going to fight McTavish on Christmas day. You are going to try to maim him, so as to be the strongest man in the country. Give it up, Jan, or you will regret it."

That time Jan Sorenson let loose a flood of blasphemy on Father Flynn's head. All his pent-up rage broke loose, and he felt in the padre an enemy only second to McTavish. Father Flynn waited till he had done speaking.

"Jan," he said quietly, "God doesn't permit a man to grow too big for his boots. You are trusting in your strength and you are trusting in a broken reed."

Sorenson, still cursing, turned into the saloon and drank himself stupid with whisky. Only that way could he find relief for his overwrought feelings.

But for that debauch he might have won. As it was, the two men fought each other to a standstill once more. And Sorenson, staring stupidly from the ground at McTavish, also upon the ground and incapable of movement, swore that he would meet him once more and win. The fight was fixed for April 10.

All that winter Sorenson worked like a demon. His hate of McTavish had become a madness now, and warped his brain. Each of the men was resolved to win or die the next time. They were buoyed up by the mad desire, like that which comes to rival leaders in a caribou herd.

"Sorenson," said Father Flynn, "you have had two chances now. Give up your plan."

Sorenson turned on the padre with an oath.

"If I don't best him I'll never fight again," he said. "I'll come to you, father, and you can make one of your canting, sniveling hypocrites out of me. I'll kneel at the sinners' seat and say I'm one of them. But I tell you I'll kill the dog, padre. I'll mash him softer than the bogs in spring."

Such things, and more, Sorenson had dreamed at night when he lay sleepless in his bunk.

April 9 arrived, and Sorenson, accompanied by his followers, started off along the trail to the meeting place. They were the first to arrive; presently the other party came into sight. In the center was a stripling of eighteen or nineteen years.

"What's this? Where's McTavish?" shouted Sorenson.

"Dead," answered the young man.

"What?" yelled Sorenson wildly.

"Typhoid," explained the stripling. "It generally gets the beefy men. I'm the new king of Watson's camp now."

"You are?" screamed Sorenson, precipitating himself upon him.

That was a Homeric fight, the record of which has come down to this day. For never once did Sorenson's blows land home. He hit the air, and, in return, felt sting after sting upon his face and body. The youth's blows were light as thistledown, but they began to tell after a while. There are no rounds in a lumbermen's battle. Before ten minutes had elapsed the big Swede was glaring at his lithe opponent out of a bloody haze.

"Come on—unless you're beaten," said the other calmly.

Sorenson, with a bull's bellow, rushed at his man. That gave the youth his opening. His fist caught the northern king upon the point of the jaw. Sorenson staggered and collapsed upon the snow. His last memory was of seeing a half hundred gaudy socks borne off in triumph by the men of Watson's.

Late the next afternoon a battered, shamefaced figure staggered into the little mission church.

"I've come, padre," said Sorenson humbly.

THINGS YOU NEVER SEE NOW

Ancient Soapmaking, Attic Bedrooms, Roller Towel, Mackerel Kit, Hog Jowls and Greased Boots.

Suet and soapmaking! Also ash hoppers! Alas and alack, that venerable institution is no more. The modern prospectus for rural habitations and accessories provides no place in the landscape for that once indispensable adjunct to farm life and its blessedness.

Dy'e mind the ash hopper in the back of the house, just around the paling fence? An inverted pyramid it was, into which the debris from the great fireplace was poured, with buckets of water thrown on the latter or else left to the sweet rains from heaven. Then the lye caught in the old iron kettle with the piece broken out of one side—it was once used for making apple butter. After that, the soap boiling—then the soap. Fine stuff, that soap—took the dirt out, all right; removed the hide, too, if you weren't careful.

But the ash hopper has gone, along with the roller towel, the mackerel kit, hog jowls, red apples and winter turnips. The open fire place, too, has passed, before which you used to fry on one side, while icicles formed on the other. Nor is there any attic room under the shingles where the boys slept, with pap's old cavalry saddle in one corner and a sickly geranium roosting precariously on the window sill. Nor do we see the old-time boots, slicked-up with a mixture of mutton tallow and beeswax, which, however, didn't prevent a need for the services of four blackmiths and a plumber to get 'em off o' nights when the bootjack failed. And the bootjack itself—say, when you come to think of it, a department bulletin has got more real sentiment and "insides" between its covers than can be found in Kipling's "Soldiers Three" or than Rossetti ever dreamed of in his visions of Blessed Damozels and that sort of thing. O, you modern housewives!—Washington Post.

The Magyars.

The Magyars made their appearance in Europe about the year 880. They were a branch of the Turanian stock and are related to the Lapps and Finns. The Magyar, or native Hungarian language, is, like the Magyars themselves, of Asiatic origin, and still retains its Turanian features. It is still spoken by most (though not all) of the Hungarian people of the Austrian empire, German being the vehicle of speech and writing with many of the Magyars.

REVELATION WAS TOO MUCH

Picture of "Hollering Jones" at Favorite Diversion Caused Him to Reform.

A well-known illustrator, who makes interesting western pictures, once made the acquaintance of a noisy but good-humored cowboy who rejoiced in the appellation of "Hollering Jones."

In physical appearance this man was typical of his kind, and the artist made several studies of him, both in repose and in his favorite diversion of "hollering." Some of the studies were sold by the artist to an eastern magazine. They showed Jones in his most violent state.

A year later the artist again visited the region. He was soon approached by Mr. Jones himself, bearing one of the pictures, which he had torn from the magazine in which it was printed. Pointing to it, he asked:

"Is that me?"

"Well," replied the artist evasively, "I got the general idea from you, of course, but—"

"Oh, I ain't takin' no offense," Jones made haste to say. "It's all right; only if it's me, say so."

"If you put it to me that way," said the artist, "I can only reply that it is a fairly good portrait of you."

"The men here on the ranch agree with you. So I look like that when I holler, do I?"

"I think you do."

"In that case," said Hollering Jones, "all I've got to say is that Hollering Jones has hollered his last holler. Hereafter, when I celebrates, I does so with a tin horn. In my own opinion, no man has a right to look like that—not round white folks, anyhow."—Youth's Companion.

ROCK COULDN'T FEAZE HIM

Big Stone Bounded Off Irishman, but Killed Polander, Who "Couldn't Stand Much."

Representative Michael E. Conry of New York used to be employed in the coal mines of Pennsylvania. One morning as he was going to work he met another Irishman all fixed up in his Sunday clothes.

"What's wrong?" asked Conry.

"Nothin' wrong," answered the other laborer.

"But what's happened?"

"Nothin's happened. A man's got to show some respect for the dead."

"What dead?"

"Oh, that Polander I worked with died yesterday."

"What did he die of?"

"A rock fell and hit him."

"You don't say! How big a rock was it?"

"Oh, three or four tons, maybe. Them Polanders can't stand much. I purty near got hurt myself yesterday."

"How was that?"

"The rock that killed the Polander hit me first, but luckily it bounced off."—St. Joseph News-Press.

Woman Deserved Sharp Retort.

A white Pomeranian escaped from the arms of its mistress in Surf avenue, Coney Island, the other night and ran in front of an automobile. A newsboy darted after the dog, caught it, and then fell in a mud puddle. He lost a dozen or so of papers but held on to the dog, which he returned to its owner slightly soiled.

"You impudent little scamp!" said the woman. "What made you get the dear little dog so dirty. You ought to be whipped."

"I am mighty glad I didn't save your life," replied the boy, and a score of onlookers applauded him.

Human Documents of Married Life

By Virginia T. Van de Water

Intimate and Human, Intensely Alive, Each Story Presenting a Problem Which Might Occur to Any One of Us at Any Time

WHOM GOD HATH JOINED

OUR greatest sin as a people is sham." The words strike straight home. And to nothing do they apply more trenchantly than to our theories and teachings with regard to marriage. Were we more honest, there might be fewer weddings, but there would also be fewer divorces.

The woman who "brought up" Louise Morton had no such iconoclastic ideas. She was one of the women who had, all her life, called a spade "an agricultural implement." To her, delicacy and what she termed modesty were the requisites to morality and decency—whether they were true or false. Left a widow with an only daughter, she had trained this daughter as if she were preparing her for the life of a nun. When the girl married, bore a child, lost her husband, and died, the mother took the orphaned grandbaby to her lonely heart and held her close there, figuratively, until a man of whom she approved, because she liked his bearing and manners toward herself, and with whom the unsophisticated girl had fallen in love, asked the devoted grandmother to give her darling into his keeping.

It would be untrue to say that the grandparent did not shrink from parting with her grandchild, but the feeling of grief was not unmixed with one of relief that the responsibilities which she had carried alone for so many years were to be shared by another, and that the girl's future happiness was assured. That is the way some parents and guardians think of the marriages of their charges—especially men who can provide comfortably for them. "They lived happily forever after" is their idea of the finale to girlhood, courtship, and marriage. The man or woman who knows life may be pardoned the cynical smile caused by this conviction of the idealist.

Mrs. Phelps was such an idealist, and she talked much to Louise of the romance of love and marriage, the union of two souls, the merging of two individualities into one perfect whole where there would be mutual affection, trust, and comprehension. And Louise, talking with the man who had been won by her fresh young beauty and girlish innocence, told him of these theories. As Tom Marshall was a man of the world, he was glad that his soon-to-be bride knew nothing of the life that he knew, and, to humor her, he expressed his agreement with all her views of the existence they were to lead together.

When the Marshals had been married for a year, they seemed to the outside world to be happy. The disillusion that had come had been received by the wife dumbly. Even her husband did not suspect the inward shudder with which she saw the ideal changed for the actual, the romance for the reality. All the happy anticipation of motherhood of which she had read and heard was hers. She fashioned the tiny garments as she would have embroidered an altar-cloth, and met the anguish of birth as a martyr might endure the suffering that would admit him to glory. When she awoke from the unconsciousness following the pain and found her tiny baby lying beside her, she smiled wanly at her husband.

"I once read," she whispered, "about helping God find a soul in the dark, and that's what I have been doing. But I've found it."

Tom Marshall was glad that she was happy and safely through her trial. Away down in his heart there lurked a shadow of disappointment that the baby was a girl. "But it's a fine kid," he acknowledged to the doctor. "And perhaps the next one will be a boy."

When he said as much to his wife, she looked at him with wondering eyes. "I cannot understand," she said faintly, "how any woman can dare go through such anguish twice."

Yet, two years later, when the second was coming, she wrote to her grandmother—now living in her old home in the south—telling her of the approaching event, and hoping that the elderly woman would try to be as contented as she was at the prospect. "Children are all that makes life worth living," she wrote. But, on reading the letter, she erased a part of the sentence and wrote in its stead, "Children are among the things that make life worth living." Even her grandmother must not suspect the truth.

When the second little girl was a month old the nurse left, for Louise was able to be up and about. She did not confess to doctor or nurse how weak and "shaky" she felt. She would get up, she determined, so that she could take care of Constance, the older baby, herself. She was not satisfied when the little one was out of her sight. She would not trust any ignorant, perhaps coarse, servant with her child. Since her marriage she had grown morbidly sensitive with regard to all things that were not refined, or that were vulgar or common.

So, prompted in all her dealings with her children by her belief in their need of her personal care, she took charge of her babies as soon as the nurse left. On the first night that she was alone with Ruth, the second child, her husband told her he was going to the club. He explained that, during her illness, he had not had the heart to mingle with any of his friends, but tonight, unless she objected seriously, he would like to run out for a smoke and a game of cards. Louise hid the consternation which she felt, and answered colorlessly.

"Of course you must go if you wish to," she said. "But as I am not very strong I hope you will not be out late. I might need you."

"Maggie is at home," he reminded her.

"Yes," she assented, "but when one maid does all the work it is hardly fair to disturb her rest at night."

"That's true," agreed Tom good-naturedly, "but I feel blue this evening and want to get away. It's been lonely here with you sick so much lately."

"It's a bit lonely tonight for me, too," she reminded him gently.

"Ah, yes, but you have your baby," he replied.

"She is your baby, too," she asserted, with a little quiver in her voice. Then she tried to laugh. "Go out, Tom, if you want to. I will get on all right, I think."

Tom Marshall meant to come home early, but a number of his friends were at the club, and most of them insisted on drinking to the baby's health and he drank with them. He found it good to get with men again, and wondered how some fellows seemed satisfied with the company of one woman most of the time. Then he remembered that Louise was waiting for him at home, and he looked at his watch. It was after midnight. One of the men suggested that they start for home, and Tom left the club with a member who lived near him. He stumbled as he went up the steps of his house, and his fingers fumbled so when he tried to fit the key in his front door that his friend took it from him and turned it in the lock.

"Go upstairs softly, Tom," he warned him, "or you will wake your wife."

"And what if I do!" asserted the husband, more loudly than was necessary. "I'm master in this house!"

He slammed the door behind him. Louise, lying awake after several hours of wretched nervousness, heard it all. She also heard him start to come upstairs, and the banister creak as he leaned heavily against it. Springing up, she slipped on her bedshoes and wrapper, and went to the head of the stairs. Her husband, near the top, staggered against the wall and looked at her with a foolish smile.

"Waiting for me, eh? Goin' to kiss me or scold me?"

She turned sick as he came toward her.

"Tom," she said in a hoarse whisper, "you've been drinking too much!"

He frowned. "That's a nice way to welcome a man home isn't it? I tell you I've only had a couple of drinks. You're infernally suspicious, that's the matter with you!"

He started toward their room, the room in which both of the babies slept, but she laid her hand on his arm. He looked at her and gave a short laugh, then threw his arms about her and drew her to him roughly.

"Confound it, but you're pretty with all that hair hanging around your face! You ought to keep it that way all the time! I say, old girl," holding her at arm's length and looking at her with a maudlin smile, while tears reddened his eyes, "don't get mad at me! Let's kiss and make up!"

"No, no!" she gasped. "If you have a spark of decency in you, don't touch me again! You will make me hate you!"

She turned quickly toward the small room in which the nurse had slept while she was with them. "Here," she said hastily, "is a bed all ready for you. Let me help you undress."

The warmth of the house was beginning to have its effect on the man's brain, and he was too stupid to argue. He sat down on the side of the bed while his wife took off his coat and unfastened his collar and necktie. Then he pushed her aside and pulled himself to a standing posture.

"I'm going to sleep in my own bed, Louise," he affirmed, "I won't stay in here."

"Then the babies and I will have to sleep in this small room," she said.

"You're too good to stay near a fellow that's had a drink, eh?" he sneered.

"No," she replied calmly, "but my little daughters are."

The bed looked inviting to the drowsy man, and he started toward it, then stopped and glanced at the door of his own room. "Aren't you going to let me kiss the babies good-night?" he quavered with a silly whimper.

"No," said the wife firmly. Then, as he sat down on the side of the bed, she stooped and unfastened and removed his shoes. The action roused him for a moment to a sense of fitness, and he caught her hand and kissed it.

"Don't do that!" he exclaimed. "That's no work for you! I'll get undressed all right. You go to bed."

With a muttered good-night the wife went into her own room and shut the door. Very softly, that her husband might not hear her, she turned the key in the lock. Then staggering almost as badly as he had done, she entered her dressing room beyond and washed her face and hands, scrubbing with feverish intensity the spot on her hand which the hot and flabby lips had kissed. As she lay down on her bed her tiny baby stirred and whimpered. With a passionate movement she snatched the child from the crib and pressed it to her breast.

"Oh, my baby, my baby!" she murmured, "my poor little woman-child! If it were not for my children I would get out of it all!" And then she whispered the only prayer that had come to her mind that night, "Lord, let me live until they need me no more, until I have taught them to hate the things that I loathe, until I have made them believe in things as they should be, not as they are!"

As years went on Tom Marshall never interfered in the training of his daughters. He loved them and petted them. In return for an uncritical and over-indulgent devotion they gave him warm affection. "Dad is such fun!" they would say as they grew older. "He is always in a good humor." True to her determination to spare her daughters the knowledge of the sins from which she shrank, the mother fostered in them a belief in their father's goodness.

Still, even her most intimate friends did not suspect that there were more thorns in her lot than in that of the average wife and mother. "Perhaps there are not," she would muse. "Perhaps all men are like that." Then her reason would insist that this was not so. She had made a mistake, she acknowledged to her inner self, in marrying a man whose ideals did not coincide with hers.

Once her husband suggested tentatively that she might be making a mistake in the training of her girls. "Constance is sixteen and Ruth fourteen," he reminded her, "and they know just about as much of life and its problems—yes, and its facts—as they did when they were born."

"They know all that is needed," she said defiantly. "They know enough to hate to lie, to tell the truth, to shun vulgarity, and to love God. That will carry them pretty safely through the world."

"It is the kind of training that you had," mused Tom Marshall. "Do you think it fitted you for what was before you?"

"My training was not to blame for what came later," she began, then checked herself. After a moment of silence her husband said, doubtfully:

"Perhaps you know best what girls need, but that kind of teaching, without knowledge of things as they are, would ruin a boy."

"Thank God I have none!" she ejaculated fervently.

It was on Christmas Eve of that year that Louise Marshall, coming suddenly into the drawing room, found her husband standing under the mistletoe he had just hung, his arm about the waist of the pretty governess who had lived with them for the past two years. The suprised pair tried to laugh, and the girl caught Mrs. Marshall's hand and begged her not to be angry.

"It was all in fun, really!" she explained. "But it was a silly thing to do. I did not think twice about it."

In a moment the wife had collected her wits and resumed her usual manner. "I understand," she assured the embarrassed girl, "that at Christmas everybody kisses everybody else." And she tried to laugh.

"Of course!" said her husband, as he stooped to kiss her. Her hands closed upon each other in a sudden grip, but nobody was looking at her hands.

Later, when alone with her husband, Louise asked for an explanation.

"Why, Miss Drayton told you how it happened and that it was just a joke," declared Tom Marshall easily. "Don't make so much of a trifle!"

"It is no trifle, Tom," urged his wife. "For some time I have been uneasy when I saw your attentions to that girl, but I chided myself for being suspicious, and persuaded myself that you would stop short of familiarity. But you didn't. How can you do such things!"

"Well, if you must know," he said, with an attempt at a laugh, "when a woman is a bit in love with a man it is rather hard for him to get out of paying her some little attentions—"

His wife sprang to her feet and confronted him, her eyes flashing. "For heaven's sake," she exclaimed, "don't make me despise you as well as distrust you! Any man who says that a woman cares so much for him that he cannot avoid being dishonorable in his dealings with her is a cad; any man who says such things of a woman years younger than he—for this one is hardly more than a girl—is a cur! You have taken advantage of the fact that she is in your house to pay her attention and to flatter her until you have turned her head, and now you throw the blame on her!"

Tom Marshall shrugged his shoulders and laughed again coarsely. "Well, if she didn't like it I wouldn't do it!" he insisted.

"Good heavens!" ejaculated his wife. "Are men like that? Is that the way they talk of women—of decent, pure women?"

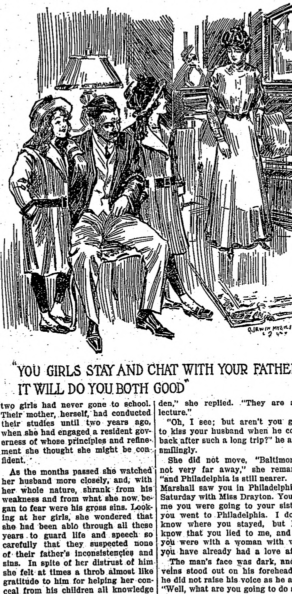
Again her husband laughed. "Your ignorance of men and of women is colossal," he sneered.

"I know many good women, and I know myself," she affirmed stoutly, "and I know—you!"

"I hear the sneer in that last sentence my lady!" exclaimed the angry man. "And I suppose you think I deserve it! You expected to marry a man who was a creature of your imagination, a kind of Sir-Galahad-Lord-Fauntleroy who would think only of his soul and never of his body. And because you didn't find me that kind you feel that you have fallen into the clutches of a brute and a beast. I'm a mere man, that's all I am—do you hear? No better and no worse than hundreds of other husbands whose wives think they are pretty lucky to be so comfortably married. You say you know yourself, and I suppose you think you do. So do I, and I know you are the coldest bit of humanity that ever lived; without feeling, except along the high and lofty lines laid out by yourself—and ideals no mortal man could live up to. Perhaps if you were a bit different I might be, too. There! take that or leave it as you please!"

He flung himself from the room, while she stood white and shaken. Yet ten mintues later, when Ruth came to the door to ask if it was not time to down and light the tree, the mother said cheerfully: "Yes, tell your father that we are all ready for him. Call Miss Drayton, too." And, as the child obeyed, the woman strengthened her faltering will by the thought, "It is for the children's sake!"

It was for their sake, too, that, a week later, she dismissed the governess of whom they were fond. The two girls had never gone to school. Their mother, herself, had conducted their studies until two years ago, when she had engaged a resident governess of whose principles and refinement she thought she might be confident.



"YOU GIRLS STAY AND CHAT WITH YOUR FATHER IT WILL DO YOU BOTH GOOD"

As the months passed she watched her husband more closely, and, with her whole nature, shrank from his weakness and from what she now began to fear were his gross sins. Looking at her girls, she wondered that she had been able through all these years to guard life and speech so carefully that they suspected none of their father's inconsistencies and sins. In spite of her distrust of him she felt at times a throb almost like gratitude to him for helping her conceal from his children all knowledge of his doubtful habits.

People have a way of declaring that there are certain courses that they would never pursue, and of finding themselves suddenly confronted by conditions that put a new face upon these resolutions. Such a time came to Louise Marshall a year after the Christmas when she and her husband had quarreled about Miss Drayton. Tom announced one morning that his sister in Baltimore had written asking him to run on to see her, and that he had decided to go on the following day, Friday. His wife approved cordially of the suggestion. It would do him good, she said, to have a day or so with a member of his own family who loved him as much as did his only sister. To herself she acknowledged that she was glad to know that, during Tom's absence, he was to be in such safe company. He went as planned, assuring Louise and the girls that he would be with them again on Monday evening.

On Sunday afternoon a cousin of Tom Marshall's called at his house, and Louise explained to him that her husband was out of town.

"Yes," assented the unsuspicious relative, "I knew that he was away yesterday, for I caught a glimpse of him lunching at the Bellevue-Stratford when I was in Philadelphia, but I thought it likely that he was coming home last night."

Louise suppressed the start of astonishment that threatened to betray her. It was almost twilight, and her visitor did not notice the sudden pallor that swept over her face.

"I know," she said steadily, "that he meant to lunch there. Did you have any talk with him?"

"No," replied her caller, "I was in a hurry, and he seemed much engaged in chatting with that nice little governess of yours. What is her name, by the way? It has escaped my memory."

Louise moistened her dry lips. "Miss Drayton," she said unfalteringly.

"Oh, yes! When I saw them I jumped to the conclusion that the girls might be staying down there, also," said the cousin.

"No," replied the wife, "they were here. But I asked Tom to take Miss Drayton out to luncheon, as I had a message to send her. She has not been well, and has been visiting relatives in Philadelphia for some weeks. I hope the little diversion did the poor girl good."

Tom returned as expected on Monday evening. His wife had bought tickets for a lecture which she wished the girls to attend, and to which the governess accompanied them. The mistress of the house was thus alone by eight o'clock. She had planned for this, as she would prefer that there should be nobody else at home when her husband returned. It was half-past eight when she heard his latch-key turn in the lock. She sat in the library while he closed the front door, hung his hat and coat on the rack, and came down the hall to the room in which she waited. Then she rose to meet him. He started slightly at sight for her.

"Why, Louise! I was wondering where you all were. Didn't you hear me come in? Where are the girls?"

He spoke unembarrassedly, and, as his wife looked at him, she wondered if long practice had accustomed him to such self-confidence.

"The girls are out with Miss Belden," she replied. "They are at a lecture."

"Oh, I see; but aren't you going to kiss your husband when he comes back after such a long trip?" he asked smilingly.

She did not move. "Baltimore is not very far away," she remarked, "and Philadelphia is still nearer. Ned Marshall saw you in Philadelphia on Saturday with Miss Drayton. You told me you were going to your sister's; you went to Philadelphia. I do not know where you stayed, but I do know that you lied to me, and that you were with a woman with whom you have already had a love affair."

The man's face was dark, and the veins stood out on his forehead, but he did not raise his voice as he asked, "Well, what are you going to do about it?"

"You don't attempt to make any explanation?" Her question was very low.

"Why should I? You know enough to warrant you in believing that I have been unfaithful to you, although you can't prove it. See here, Louise, we may as well understand each other here and now. You think you were cheated when you married me—well, I was cheated, too!"

The woman paled. "I have done my best. I have taken care of your home and your children, and I have been a faithful, honorable wife."

The man sprang to his feet and towered above her. "Yes, and you seem to feel that that's all there is to marriage—to keep the house clean, to care for the children, and to be strictly moral! Have you in all the time we've been married given me a spontaneous caress? Have you ever of your own accord put your arms around my neck and said, 'I love you?'"

"I have never repulsed your demonstrations of—affection"—she hesitated at the word—"except," her voice dropped, "when you have been—drinking."

"And do you think that's all a man wants—a passive submission to his kisses, an enforced endurance of his love?"

For the second time the husband hurled his question at her, "What are you going to do about it?"

"I am going to leave you."

"And what about the girls?" he queried. The excitement suddenly left his manner. He eyed her calmly, calculatingly, like a person who was sure of his ground.

She looked at him in astonishment. "I shall take them with me, of course," she declared. "The law would give them to me, anyway,—and when they know the truth they will want to go with me."

"Who's going to tell them the truth?"

"I shall!" she affirmed. "You needn't try to stop me!"

"I shan't try to stop you," he said slowly, steadily. "But before you make that decision I have something to say to you. Sit down again, please; you look tired."

"Louise, you may, as you say, tell your children all, but I want to remind you what that 'all' will be. Your teaching, year in and year out, repeated over and over, has been, briefly, that the soul is all, the body its servant; that all decent women shun fleshly appetites and seek soul-harmonies; you have told them nothing of marriage except that it is a sort of earthly paradise in which two pure mortals wander hand in hand, and that those who enter it without love sin against God and their own souls; you have warned them that the woman who marries a man who does not regard marriage as she does coarsens her whole being by sinking to his level. You acknowledge that these are pretty nearly the doctrines you have instilled into them, don't you?"

The listener bowed her head. "They are what I believe. That I have not found life what I think it should be would not justify me in lowering the standards by which I want my children to live."

"That is your way of putting it," said the man. "My way would be that since you have found out that some things are shams, it would be well to prepare your children for the same discovery."

"The things that I have taught them are not shams!" began the wife eagerly, but her husband stopped her.

"Wait a moment, please, till I finish. You agree that you have declared all these things which you call facts to your daughters. Now you propose to inform them that the man, who you have told them was a good man, was all the time bad, and that you have known it; that he is coarse and sensual, and yet that you have lived with him, as his wife, mind you!—for almost twenty years. What explanation will you give them of that? For children of their age and with their training cannot understand what you call the mother-love that would sacrifice truth and purity for the sake of the beloved object! How will you explain all this? For, mind you, if you leave me, and take my children with you, I shall tell them the brutal facts as I know them—that you have all along known what I am and that you have lived with me in spite of your high-flown theories; that you have lied again and again to them about me, and that, in fact, you have not lived up to one of the doctrines you have taught them."

"Tom, you couldn't do that, you wouldn't do that! Have you no pity, no gratitude, when you remember all that I have endured for you?"

But the man did not take her hands in his. "You endured it for the children, Louise, not for me. You know perfectly well that had you not had them you would have left me. But I love them, too, and I propose to fight fire with fire. I shall not disgrace them publicly, I promise you, as long as they are under my roof and protection. But if you attempt to take them from me they shall know just why you are doing so. What is your answer?"

The wife started to her feet at the sound of voices in the hall. "Here are the girls now!" she exclaimed agitatedly.

"So much the better!" declared her husband. "For you can answer me in their presence. They will not understand, but I shall!"

She caught at his arm, but he evaded her, and, striding to the library door, flung it open.

"Come in, children!" he called heartily.

They came, flushed by rapid walking in the night air and by pleasure at the sight of their father.

"It's good to get you back again, daddy!" exclaimed Ruth as she threw her arms about his neck, while less demonstrative Constance remarked, "Home isn't nearly as nice when you're away, dad."

The mother turned wearily toward the hall.

"Where are you going, mother?" Constance asked.

Louise Marshall stopped and looked for a moment at the group. Her figure drooped, and her lips twitched nervously. But her eyes met her husband's steadily as she spoke:

"I'm a bit tired, dears, and think I will go upstairs. You girls stay and chat with your father for a while. It will do you both good."

She climbed the stairs with a firm step and head erect. But, when she reached her darkened room and closed her door, her self-control vanished. With a sob of anguish and defeat she fell on her knees by her bed, and a moaning broke from her lips:

"Lord! be merciful to me, a hypocrite!"

Pupils Box and Tango in This Modern School

NEW YORK.—What would you think of a school where children are allowed to do just as they please? Where a boy stealing jam is simply asked to consider whether he has not done wrong?

Where two pupils having a fist fight in the classroom are asked whether it would not show more regard for their teacher and the other boys and girls if they went into the play-yard to battle?

Where a girl dancing the tango in the middle of the recitation room and singing an accompaniment is admonished, but allowed to proceed if she pleases?

Where each boy or girl can do just what particular lesson seems most to his or her liking, and can drop the study of geography to peer through a microscope at will?

Yet just exactly these and even more remarkable doings are on view in the school of anarchists; children in East One Hundred and Seventh street, your correspondent found the other day.. I heard about these things, but scarcely believed. So I went up myself to find out.

As I was talking to Mrs. Cora Bennett Stephenson, the teacher, a boy of twelve got up, whispered in the ear of a girl of ten and led her to an open place. They proceeded to do a very spirited dance, the name of which I do not know. The other pupils applauded furiously.

"Maria, Giuseppe, don't you see that dancing just now causes the other pupils to be distracted from their books? Don't you think it would be more sensible to dance this evening."

"Yes, Mrs. Stephenson"—Giuseppe paused long enough to say—"but me and Maria feel just like dancing right now."

"Very well, your spirits should not be repressed."

At this instant a dark-eyed boy, slightly larger than Giuseppe, left the spectators of the dance and seized Maria, wrested her from her partner and whirled her in a new evolution.

Giuseppe was thrown to the floor, but he jumped up immediately and struck the newcomer a good uppercut on the jaw. The two boys were soon having an excellent boxing bout, much to the delight of Maria, et al.

"Boys, boys, what a foolish thing to fight about. Maria is willing to dance with both of you," said Mrs. Stephenson, but without excitement.

"There, now, you have upset the globe. Didn't you agree with me yesterday that the sidewalk was a much more appropriate place to decide quarrels than the study room?"

"They will see their errors soon; it would be dangerous to their initiative and enterprise to prevent them from dancing or fighting. Children naturally dance and fight. It is not good to stop them."

"But supposing a child said he was going to jump out of the window," I asked anxiously.

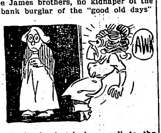
"Well, none of them ever did—but we would simply try to show them the reasons for not injuring themselves. They could jump if they decided to.

"The Modern school has no rules or regulations. It is not authoritarian like the public schools, which cramp the child's mind and body. It is libertarian.

"We believe in the freedom of the child. We discuss with them what is right and wrong, but we never forbid them things and never punish them."

Ghost Brings Wagonload of Police to a House

PITTSBURGH, PA.—No character conceived in the fertile mind of A. Conan Doyle, no bandit of the time of the James brothers, no kidnaper of the type that purloined Charlie Ross, no bank burglar of the "good old days" when bank burglary was a safe and sane pastime, ever proved more elusive to the officers of the law than the creature who has terrorized a section of East Liberty and for whom a wagonload of police searched in vain. There are grave doubts in the minds of the authorities if the perpetrator of several scares in the Howe street-Denniston avenue section ever will be brought before the bar of justice.



In the stillness of the midnight hour there was a shriek that aroused slumberers in that usually quiet neighborhood. A telephone call to the Frankstown avenue police station brought the patrol wagon and a detail of reserves. The officers found in a faint a young woman residing with her mother in a rooming house at Denniston and Howe. She had been enjoying the balmy zephyrs of midnight on the veranda of the house. As she entered, so she told the police, she saw a white figure, with a dark shawl over its shoulders, pass the hallway. That was all she remembered until she was resuscitated. Then, upon seeing a great, blue-coated officer standing near her, she shrieked and fainted again. The officers searched the house from cellar to roof and back again, but nary a trace could they find of the ghost.

There was a decidedly active breeze stirring throughout the East end that night. Lace curtains, in their ghostly whiteness, flaunted startlingly from windows that had been left open.

"We had a vague suspicion as to the identity of that ghost," remarked Police Captain Ford, "but we never can hope to get him behind the bars."

"Whom do you suspect?"

"Old Man Boreas," replied the captain with a smile, "the most notorious and vigorous of all who perpetrate ghostly outrages."

Real Souls Are Scarce; One Found in Detroit

DETROIT, MICH.—Charlie Daniels called up to tell about a young robin that had fallen out of its nest. Charlie has been game wardening around Wayne county so long that he takes a fatherly interest in all young and unprotected things. He's got a sympathetic heart. His voice was tremulous with the emotion that possessed his soul, as he told of the peril that beset this particular birdie.

It appears the fledgling tumbled out of a tree in Mrs. Flannery's back yard at 59 Pacific avenue and she rescued it from a flock of avaricious cats that infest the neighborhood.

"She took that there robin and put it in a cage," said Charlie, "and she kept it in her barn, where the cats couldn't get at it. The mother bird and the father bird soon found out where the bird was and every once in a while they fetched it food—angleworms, fish flies, caterpillars, grasshoppers and such like.

"It was there pretty near a week.

"She called me up and she wanted to know if she was doing the right thing by that there bird and I told her it was all right with me.

"I want to tell you there's a lot of hard-hearted people in this world and when you meet up with a woman that's got a real soul, like Mrs. Flannery has, there ought to be a piece put in the paper about it.

"We decided the little bird ought to be able to fly today, so this afternoon we opened the cage and let him out. He flew right back to his nest with his father and mother."

GEORGE M. YOUNG'S SHORT TERM

Public men have often boasted their long terms of office in some high position; it remains for Representative George M. Young, at present representative from North Dakota, to bear the unique honor of having been governor of a sovereign state of the Union for the shortest space of time than any other man ever held that exalted position—one hour, by the clock!

"The great event happened in the summer of 1912," said Mr. Young. "Our regular governor, John Burke, was away building fences and stringing wires in a convention hall down in St. Louis. The next in succession was Lieut. Gov. R. S. Lewis, a banker of Fargo.

"One slithering hot day a touring car full of friends chugged up to the bank. They reminded Lewis that it was hot, that North Dakota was prohibition, that Minnesota wasn't. So they stuffed him in among them, headed for Moorhead, Minn., and threw on the high speed. Lewis was over the state line just one hour, and meantime, by virtue of my position as president pro tempore of our state senate, the honors, duties, privileges and responsibilities of the governorship fell upon me."

JUST LIKE THE BRUTE

Representative W. J. Cary of Wisconsin was born, at the close of the Civil war, in the city of Milwaukee, and he represents his birthplace now. Left an orphan at the age of thirteen, with five younger children on his hands, his life had a gloomy vista, but he did not despair.

The children were placed temporarily in a home conducted by charitable people, while Joseph went to work as a messenger boy. At eighteen he was a telegraph operator and within a year he had gotten a home, placed his brothers and sisters in it and begun to assume the responsibilities of a father.

Cary was once sheriff of his county, and while going about the farms, soliciting the support of the men, was caught one afternoon in a violent storm, so he drove hastily up to the home of an acquaintance, asking shelter for the night.

The farmer's wife—imagine her name was Mrs. Brown—insisted that Cary come in and use one of the guest chambers. Mr. Brown was not at home, having been caught in town by the same storm.

But Cary was a modest man and refused to enter the house in the absence of a masculine host.

"Just give me a blanket and I can sleep up in the loft," he explained.

The wife insisted that he use a room in the house, but he as ardently refused, so she gave him the blanket and he literally "hit the hay" for a bed.

At dawn he was awakened by hearing a great noise below, and, peeping down through the rafters, he saw the wife belaboring a bull with a spade.

"Get out of here, you brute!" she exclaimed, as she hit the animal a whack on his ribs. "You haven't got any more sense than Joe Cary, for you are just as hard to move!"

AFTER HEIRESSES WHO WED ABROAD

© HARRIS & EWING

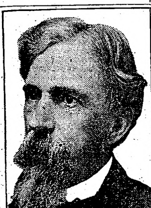
Furnishing a list of 22 American heiresses who have married titled foreigners, Representative Bowdle of Ohio issued a statement the other day in support of his bill to tax the incomes of all American girls who marry men of title abroad.

Representative Bowdle refers to the opposition aroused when it was first proposed to tax inheritances, but says the practice now prevails in most of the states. He concluded:

"But here we have hundreds of millions of dollars removed permanently from America by a lot of shiftless lords and dukes who enjoy it while they live and then hand it on to their progeny who have nothing but contempt for democratic institutions, and they get this from American toil without a penny of tax.

"Under ancient feudalism the overlord at least lived in the center of his estates, but America will shortly be an assemblage of industrial feudal estates whose owners live thousands of miles away. This thing constitutes a distinct peril to the republic."

SCORNS PAY FOR ABSENT DAYS



Diogenes in his search for an honest man would have stopped short at the door of Representative Witherspoon of Mississippi. It has been discovered that Mr. Witherspoon is the only man now on the rolls of congress who has ever refused to take his salary for days in which he was engaged in business not connected with the congress of the United States.

The discovery was an accidental one and is in no way traceable to Mr. Witherspoon.

The fact is that Mr. Witherspoon was absent from Washington four days on private business and when it came time to draw his salary check for the month he had the sergeant-at-arms, who pays the members, deduct the exact amount to cover the four days. The sum turned back amounted to $82.20.

The discovery is of interest at this time because there has been so much heavy bombarding back and forth in the house by members accusing each other of bad faith in pleading for low mileage or no mileage and then accepting all the mileage they could get.

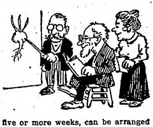
Plan Home Classes in Practical Agriculture

WASHINGTON.—A plan whereby ten or more farmers or farm women can form home classes in agriculture or domestic science and receive the textbooks, lectures, lantern slides, laboratory and cooking equipment necessary to conduct them has been devised by the United States department of agriculture in co-operation with agricultural colleges of certain states.



The object of the plan is to make accessible at home, to men and women who have not the time or means to attend the regular courses at the colleges, practical short courses in agriculture and home management specially adapted to their districts. These courses, which will consist of 15 to 20 lectures, and will consume five or more weeks, can be arranged to suit the spare time and convenience of each group of people.

The courses to be offered at first are poultry raising, fruit growing, soils, cheese manufacturing, dairying, butter making, and farm bookkeeping; and for the women especially, courses in the preparation, cooking and use of vegetable and cereal foods. The department will supply lectures and lantern slides covering these subjects, and the states which have agreed to co-operate in the plan will lend to each group laboratory and cooking apparatus valued at $100 and a reference library. The textbooks and lectures will be made so complete that each group can safely appoint one of its members as study leader to direct the work of the course.

When a group has decided to take up the work, the state which cooperates sends an agent with the department's representative to organize a sample class and assist the leader whom they elect in laying out the work and in showing him the best methods of procedure. The classes commonly are held from eight to twelve in the morning and from one to four in the afternoon, two or three days each week. The sessions are not held every day, so that the members will have time to attend to their farm duties in between the sessions, as well as before and after the instruction period. The classes meet commonly at the most convenient farmhouse. During the morning hours, textbook work is done. In the afternoon laboratory work is conducted, and the women who have elected to take the domestic science courses have practical lessons in cooking.

As soon as a class is established, the state organizer withdraws to start a class in some other district. The work thereafter is left in charge of the leader, who receives assistance by mail from the college or the department in carrying on the work.

As there is no regularly paid instructor, classes can be carried on all over the state as rapidly as the college organizer can visit the groups, and as quickly as the laboratory sets supplied by the college become available. The local leader will preside during the reading of the lectures and references, for which full texts and lantern slides are supplied by the department. He will also be responsible for the laboratory equipment. Every one who completes the course will receive a certificate from the state college.

Trapped While at Work Under a Banquet Table

THE story is just getting around about a dinner given in exclusive Washington society, at which the most tactful person was undoubtedly a plumber in overalls. It was an elaborate dinner. The central feature of the table decoration was a playing fountain. But just before the dinner was to be served the fountain refused to play.

A plumber was hastily called. He crawled under the table and soon had the fountain sending a delicate spray into the air. He was busy tightening the couplings of the temporary pipes under the table when the head butler, his mind relieved of a load of care when he saw the fountain playing, announced in the drawing room:

"Dinner is served."

Before the plumber knew what was happening the guests had entered the dining room, chairs were drawn up, and he suddenly found himself hemmed in by a wall in which trousers alternated with skirts.

It was a big round table, so he was safe from discovery from any shifting foot. He scratched his head and wondered what he should do. He looked carefully around. Neither to the right nor to the left nor between any pair of feet was there sufficient space for him to wiggle through. The only way to get out would be to tap on some knee and—"Pardon me, please."

He didn't know much about the etiquette of formal dinner parties, but he had a hunch that that wouldn't make a hit. He decided that there was just one thing to do—stay where he was until the trouser-and-skirt wall departed. So there he sat.

When the dinner was at last over and the guests had returned to the drawing room the plumber crawled forth

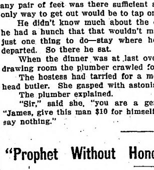
The hostess had tarried for a moment to give a few directions to the head butler. She gasped with astonishment.

The plumber explained.

"Sir," said she, "you are a gentleman." Then to the head butler: "James, give this man $10 for himself." Then to the plumber: "And please say nothing."

"Prophet Without Honor in His Own Country"

THAT "a prophet is without honor in his own country" was very clearly shown the other day at Marshall hall. The day was an ideal one, and a Washington woman, taking advantage of that fact, put some lunch in a basket, took her daughter, annexed two other children and went down the river to let the tots enjoy the fun of pink lemonade and peanuts.



NO'M
DID YOU EVER HEAR OF GEORGE WASHING-TON ?

Presently the children got tired wandering around, peeping at the tomb of the ancient Marshalls, and went to the pony track, where a dozen barefoot colored boys were in charge of the pets. The oldest of them, Virgil, was a round-headed boy with a face as brown as a seal and a mouth that looked like a slit in a watermelon. His main interest in life was the ponies, and such impedimenta as clothing and learning were regarded contemptuously as useless incumbrances. To enjoy the present moment was his only motto.

The Washington woman stood looking over the waves to where the high hill on the opposite shore showed the white porches of Mount Vernon.

"Did you ever hear of George Washington, Virgil?" asked the lady as she watched a whole banana disappear down that personage's throat.

Virgil dug his toe in the dirt, looked around appealingly at the rest of the children, then blurted out:

"No'm, I ain't ever heard er no George Washington, 'ceptin' unless you means my uncle, George Washington, what libes down de road a piece."

Japan Ready to Declare War; Germany Still the Aggressor

JAP ULTIMATUM TO GERMANY TO RESULT IN WAR

KAISER TOLD TO EVACUATE FAR EAST BEFORE SUNDAY, AUGUST 23, OR ACTION WILL BE TAKEN TO ENFORCE DEMANDS.

"FORCED TO ACT" CONTENDS INSPIRED TOKIO REPORT

Position of Great Britain Is Upheld by Ally—Seizure of English Merchant Vessels in Seas of Eastern Asia by Germans Are Arguments Offered to Justify Action Taken.

Tokio, Aug. 18.—Japan has sent an ultimatum to Germany demanding the withdrawal of German warships from the Orient and the evacuation of Kiau-Chau and giving Germany until Sunday, Aug 23, to comply with the demand. Otherwise, the ultimatum states, Japan will take action.

War Is Expected.

The general expectation here is that the ultimatum will be followed by war.

Takaaki Kato, the Japanese foreign minister, simultaneously with the dispatch of the ultimatum, conferred with George W. Guthrie, the American ambassador and made to him a broad statement calculated to assure the United States that American interests in the Far East would be safeguarded and the integrity of China upheld.

Sent by Six Channels.

Owing to doubts whether communications with Berlin were assured, Japan, in order to insure the arrival of the ultimatum, forwarded it to Berlin by six channels, including Washington, London and Stockholm. The government also notified Count Von Reed, German ambassador to Japan, and likewise retarded the time limit for a reply until Aug. 23.

Count Okuma, the Japanese premier, invited the peers, the newspaper men and the leading business men of Tokio to come to his office at noon, at four, and at six o'clock in the afternoon, respectively, when he might make known to them the terms of the ultimatum and announced that he would give out the negotiations in connection with the alliance.

The Ultimatum.

The ultimatum follows:

"We consider it highly important and necessary in the present situation to take measures to remove the causes of all disturbances of the peace in the Far East and so safeguard the general interests as contemplated by the agreement of alliance between Japan and Great Britain.

"In order to secure a firm and enduring peace in eastern Asia, the establishment of which is the aim of the said agreement, the imperial Japanese government sincerely believes it to be its duty to give the advice to the imperial German government to carry out the following two propositions:

"First—To withdraw immediately from Japanese and Chinese waters, German men-of-war and armed vessels of all kinds and to disarm at once those which cannot be so withdrawn.

"Second—To deliver on a date not later than Sept. 15 to the imperial Japanese authorities without condition or compensation the entire leased territory of Kiau-Chau with a view to the eventual restoration of the same to China.

August 23 Date Set.

"The imperial Japanese government announces at the same time that in the event of it not receiving by noon on Aug. 23, 1914, an answer from the imperial German government signifying its unconditional acceptance of the above advice offered by the imperial Japanese government, Japan will be compelled to take such action as she may deem necessary to meet the situation."

Inspired utterances express regret at the inability to maintain neutrality, but say that Great Britain, the ally of Japan, is compelled to defend herself against the aggressions of Germany. Moreover, it is pointed out that Germany is making preparations day and night at Kiau-Chau where it is storing provisions, while its warships are scouring the seas of eastern Asia to the great detriment of commerce and that its converted cruisers are seizing English merchant vessels.

Such actions, it is argued, are directly calculated to disturb the peace of eastern Asia and accordingly, after full and frank communication with Britain, Japan has found herself compelled to send an ultimatum to Germany.

ASSURES AMERICAN INTERESTS WILL BE SAFEGUARDED.

Promises "Eventual Restoration to China" of Kaiu Chau Territory—a Grave Development.

Washington, Aug. 18.—The Japanese ambassador, Baron Chinde, delivered to Secretary Bryan the written announcement of Japan that an ultimatum had been addressed to Germany requesting the latter's withdrawal from her field of activity in China.

At the same time he communicated the assurances of Japan to the United States that the utmost endeavor would be exercised to safeguard the interests of this country and all others not immediately concerned in the present operations.

The United States, it became known after Baron Chinda's call on Mr. Bryan, does not intend to be drawn in any way into the controversy, regarding it as a matter purely between Germany and Japan. The American government considers satisfactory the promise of Japan of "eventual restoration to China" of the territory of Kaiu Chau.

Baron Chinda's conference with the secretary of state was held at Mr. Bryan's residence. The ambassador presented a communication from the foreign office at Tokio, which embodied the substance of the ultimatum and added a strong statement concerning Japan's purposes of maintaining the territorial integrity of the Chinese Republic by restoring to her the territory of Kaiu Chau, originally taken from China by Germany as an act of reprisal for the killing of German missionaries.

While the statement made no direct reference to the United States, it gave assurance in general that the interests of all powers interested in maintaining the territorial status-quo in the Far East would be protected to the utmost.

The news of Japan's ultimatum to Germany was received by officials here as one of the gravest developments in the war situation, bringing for the first time the great military power of the Far East into a range of conflict heretofore held within Europe.

The situation in the Far East has, for several days, been regarded by officials as a delicate one.

BIG RUSSIAN BATTLE IS NEAR

London, Aug. 17.—Reports are coming in of fierce skirmishing on the Russo-German frontier. The Austrians are said to have been badly defeated in Northeastern Galicia.

These events indicate that the huge eastern armies of Germany and Austria will soon be at death grips with Russia's mighty forces.

The sooner the eastern conflict commences the better it will be for the allies in the West, where the main German advance is developing into a great flanking movement in Belgium, which, despite repeated repulses by the heroic defenders, would seem t threaten Antwerp and Brussels.

FRENCH VICTORY; GERMAN ARMY IS PUSHING AHEAD

REPORT OF BATTLE OF DINANT, BELGIUM, IS OFFICIALLY CONFIRMED BY PARIS AND LONDON DISPATCHES.

LOCATES FRENCH ALLIES FOR THE FIRST TIME

Kaiser's Forces on March in Valley of Meuse Prepare for Extensive Operations and Preliminary Skirmishing Continues—French Move Forward All Along Line.

Paris, Aug. 18.—An official note issued by the war office confirms the report of a battle Sunday at Dinant, Belgium. It says:

Report of Battle.

"A division of German cavalry, supported by some battalions of infantry attacked Dinant. The French cavalry repulsed the German troops, who retired in disorder.

"The French troops captured some hundreds of German cavalry horses which were immediately sent to the rear to serve as re-mounts, for the French cavalry.

"The high spirits of the French troops greatly encouraged the Belgians."

Discovers Exact Location.

The war office announces that the news of the victory for the French discovers for the first time the exact location of the French allies in Belgium.

Hundreds of the Uhlans horses were captured in the engagement which was marked by a display of brilliant courage on the part of the French.

The Bavarian forces, according to the same war office's statement, have been pushed back across the border to German territory, losing every position they had gained previously in this

Take Several Positions.

The French troops have taken several new positions notably in the vicinity of Demen and the upper Bruche valley. They have retaken others which they were forced to abandon, forcing the enemy to avacuate Blamont and Cirey.

As reported, they have reoccupied the town of Thann in upper Alsace, which is just before Muelhausen, which is certain to be soon reconquered, it is thought.

On the line from Thienville to Verdanville, near Luxemberg, the Germans still hold the region around Briey and Longwy.

German Prisoners in France.

An official announcement by the French war office says the French troops took over 500 German prisoners on Friday when they occupied several mountains around Donon, also known as Rougemont, on the border of German Lorraine.

Action of German Forces.

London, Aug. 17.—The German forces are pushing forward through the valley of the Meuse, and still more extensive operations are in progress along the Alsace-Lorraine frontier where the French and German armies are in contact.

A Reuter dispatch from Paris announces that it is officially stated that the offensive movement along the line from Sarrebourg on the Franco-German frontier at Luneville in the department of Meurthe-et-Moselle continues.

News of Dinant Victory.

Reuter's correspondent in Brussels telegraphs that the French legation there confirms the report of a victory by the French at Dinant. He says the German troops appeared in force with several quick-firing guns and attacked the French position.

A brisk fight ensued in the course of which the French artillery decimated the German troops. At the end of the fighting, the French occupied both banks of the river.

Forward Movement of French.

Paris.—The following official statement was issued:

"A forward movement developed all along the front from Reichscourt (Rixingen), in Lorraine, 11 miles southwest of Saarebourg, to Sainte Marie-Aux-Mines. We carried the latter and advanced into the region of Saint Blaise.

"The French troops who occupied Donan continue to advance, their progress being especially rapid in the Schiermeck valley. We have taken 1,000 prisoners in addition to the 500 on Friday. Large quantities of equipment had been admitted by the Germans. We also captured this. We pushed as far as Lorquin Height, capturing a convoy belonging to a cavalry division, consisting of 19 automobiles and lorries."

CARRANZA IS NOW PRESIDENT

NAMED PROVISIONAL HEAD OF MEXICO IN AGREEMENT.

Constitutionalists to Fill Offices Until Election Is Held—Many Refugees in Vera Cruz.

Washington, Aug. 17.—Venustiano Carranza was named provisional president of Mexico in the agreement signed outside of Mexico City by General Obregon and representatives of Federal Governor Iturbide, according to an announcement by the Constitutionalist agency here.

The Federal garrison evacuating Mexico City, it was said, will form in groups of not over 5,000 along the railroad to be disbanded and disarmed by Constitutionalist commissioners while the Federal garrisons in certain towns near Mexico City and fronting the troops at Zapata remain at their posts until relieved by Constitutionalist forces. Garrisons in the southern states are to lay down their arms and the Federal navy is to be turned over to the provisional president.

Mexico City Quiet.

Mexico City, Aug. 15.—The capital passed an expectant but absolutely quiet day awaiting the incoming Constitutionalist army. The plan for the dissolution of the Federal army calls for the delivery of all arms and munitions to the Constitutionalists, which seemingly indicates that if it is complied with there will be no fear of a counter revolution on the part of the Federal army.

It is probable the cabinet of General Carranza will be as follows:

Foreign minister, Isidro Fabela; minister of the interior, General Alvero Obregon; minister of war, General Eduardo Hay; minister of public works, Alberto J. Bani.

Orders closing all Catholic churches were issued by the archbishop, who will not permit them to reopen until the new regime is established.

Many clergymen are leaving for Spain.

Flee to Vera Cruz.

Vera Cruz, Aug. 15.—Official estimates fix the number of refugees who have fled from Mexico City to Vera Cruz at 15,000. Several army officers, including General Gustava Maas, who defended Vera Cruz against the Americans, joined the refugees.

WILSON OBJECTS TO LOANS.

President Disapproves of Americans Furnishing Funds to Belligerent Countries.

Washington, Aug. 17.—President Wilon formally disaproved of the plan of American bankers floating loans in the United States for the benefit of belligerent countries of Europe, but expressed no objections to loan made to neutral countries.

Berlin Is Reported Quiet.

Washington, Aug. 15.—The American Association of Commerce and Trade of Berlin, through Ambassador Gerard, has requested the state department to make public the following telegram:

"We would ask the American Press and America in general to be careful in giving credence to war reports, now circulating in the United States, concerning conditions in Germany. The city of Berlin is perfectly quiet. Food prices are normal. Foreigners, especially Americans, are fully protected."

GERMANY OFFERS SHIP FOR U. S. USE

WILL AID IN GETTING AMERICANS OUT OF WAR-RIDDEN EMPIRE BY LOAN OF VESSEL.

OTHER NATIONS MAY FOLLOW

Washington Officials Are Optimistic and Believe Task of Rescuing Refugees May Be Simplified—Transports May Not Be Sent to Europe.

Washington, Aug. 18.—A new avenue of exit for Americans stranded in Europe was opened when the German government offered to place at the disposal of the United States a Hamburg-American line steamer which would fly the American flag to bring home refugees.

Will Accept Offer.

There is every indication that Secretary Garrison, chairman of the government board of relief, will accept the offer and the opinion is expressed that some of the other nations involved in the European conflict will divert liners for the transportation of the American refugees.

How many of the steamers of the nations at war will be available or offered for the refugee service has not been determined, but there are possibilities that sufficient facilities will be found so that the plan of sending United States transports abroad might be abandoned.

Transports for Work.

Several transports now are on their way to Newport News to be outfitted for that service.

A message from Secretary Garrison, asking if some of the German liners now lying idle at New York, could be used to bring home refugees evidently crossed the offer of a ship cabled by the German government. As there are 27 German vessels at New York, Mr. Garrison expresses belief that there will be no difficulty in bringing all Americans in Germany home with despatch. He thinks his request to other countries that refugee ships be regarded as neutral will promptly be granted.

Route Is Suggested.

While the Berlin government has suggested that any German ships employed sail around the north coast of Scotland for German ports, it appears probable that an attempt will be made to agree on a Mediterranean route that would take the ships to French and Italian ports, where the refugees might gather.

By that means all danger of encountering mines would be avoided. Mr. Garrison said the United States would preserve the strictest neutrality of all passenger ships. He asked the American embassies at Berlin and Vienna to determine the number of Americans in Austria and Germany who want to come home.

There are about 10,000 in Switzerland alone who seek transportation.

INVESTIGATE PRICE FIXING

President Wilson's Campaign Against Increase in Food Costs Bears Early Fruit.

Washington, Aug. 15. — President Wilson's campaign against "rapid and unwarranted increase in prices of foodstuffs upon the pretext of conditions in Europe," bore early fruit.

Preliminary reports from United States district attorneys and department of justice special agents, declaring many price increases speculative, unjustifiable and some bearing elements of illegal conspiracy subject to anti-trust law prosecution, began to pour in by telegraph upon the attorney general.

Within a week or ten days Attorney General McReynolds expects to be able to present the report requested in the president's letter whether immediate recourse to the courts shall be taken or a further investigation shall be made jointly by the departments of justice, commerce and agriculture.

A grand jury investigation of increased food prices in the District of Columbia was begun in the federal courts here, directed by the United States district attorney. Local heads of packing companies, the big central markets; wholesale grocers and hotel proprietors were subpoenaed.

To Issue No More Bulletins.

Brussels, Aug. 17. — (via Paris.)—The Belgian general staff states that there had been no engagement near Diest. The number of Germans in Limburg province is declared to have been exaggerated, and the general military situation is described as excellent but for the strategic reasons the general staff says it will issue no more bulletins.

Relief Boats Chartered.

Paris, Aug. 17.—American Ambassador Myron T. Herrick, on behalf of the United States government contracted with the French Compagne Generale Trans-Atlantique for the steamship Espagne to sail on Aug. 19 from Havre for the United States with 950 Americans aboard. Four hundred of these passengers were placed by the American relief committee. Mr. Herrick also arranged for the liner Rochambeau to leave Havre on Aug. 28 with 1,200 Americans.

Did Not Cause Big War.

London, Aug. 15.—The Exchange Telegraph Rome correspondent sends the outline of an official communication from the Vienna government to Rome notifying the Italian government of Great Britain's declaration of war on Austria. The Austrian note says: "Austria's war against Servia, an independent state, and for a cause which did not affect international politics, cannot be considered as the cause for the present European war."

French Driven From Germany.

Berlin, Aug. 14.—(By direct wireless from Nauen, Germany, to the Goldschmidt Wireless Company's station at Tuckerton, N. J.)—The German troops took 120 French officers and 1,110 French soldiers prisoners in the fighting at Muelhausen, Alsace. They also captured four French cannon.

Another 1,000 French officers and men were taken prisoners by the Germans in the fight near Longwy.

German soil is now entirely cleared of French troops.

Gifford Pinchot Married.

New York, Aug. 17.—Miss Cornelia E. Bryce, daughter of Lloyd Steven Bryce, former minister to the Netherlands, and Gifford Pinchot, former chief forester of the United States, were married in the Episcopal church at Roslyn, Long Island. On account of the illness of Mr. Pinchot's mother, only relatives and a few intimate friends were present. A reception followed at the country home of Mr. and Mrs. Bryce at Roslyn.

Reserve Board Active.

Washington, Aug. 12.—The federal reserve board, entrusted with control of the great banking system created by the new currency law, actually came into existence when the five members appointed by President Wilson took the oath of office at the treasury department. Plans for taking over the system set up by the organization committee and opening the reserve banks for business within the next few weeks, already are under way, though the first formal meeting of the board will not be held until Thursday.

AUTO TUMBLES 30 FEET; KILLS MAN

BURSTING OF TIRE CAUSES FATAL ACCIDENT IN ST. PAUL—MARTIN BRENNAN DIES.

THREE OTHERS ARE INJURED

John P. Hoy, M. E. Dawson and W. C. Hall, All of Minneapolis, Sustain Serious Wounds by Falling Over Embankment.

St. Paul.—The bursting of an automobile tire, which sent the car tumbling over an embankment of about 30 feet, caused the death of one man and the serious injury of three others in St. Paul. All of the men lived in Minneapolis. One of the injured may be fatally hurt.

Martin Brennan, 2715 Filmore street northeast, is dead.

John P. Hoy, 521 Fifth avenue southeast; ribs broken, back wrenched and possible internal injuries; may be fatal.

M. E. Dawson, 303 East Fifteenth street; cuts on face and neck, right arm sprained and possible internal injuries; condition critical.

W. C. Hall, 521 Forest avenue; nose broken, cut about face and arms; will recover.

The accident occurred on the Rice street road leading north from St. Paul. According to the story told by Dawson, who was driving, they were traveling south toward the city when one of the tires blew up. The car became unmanageable and before the brakes could be applied it was skidding off the road.

At the place of the accident the road forms an embankment about 30 feet high. The car slid over the edge, while Dawson made frantic efforts to stop it by jamming the brakes. A moment later the machine toppled over on its side and rolled over and over down the slope, stopping only when it struck a barb wire fence.

Brennan was killed instantly, while the others were either unconscious or too seriously injured to assist each other. They were passed by three machines before they were able to attract the attention of Andrew LeMarguard of the Starland theater, St. Paul, who was passing. LeMarguard called the police and the injured men were taken to St. Joseph's hospital, St. Paul.

All of the men are well known in Minneapolis. Brennan and Hoy formerly were members of the city detective force. Brennan conducted a real estate business with offices at 407 Globe building, while Hoy is the proprietor of a private detective agency in the Phoenix building. Dawson is also a real estate dealer. He has offices adjoining those of Brennan in the Globe building. Hall, who is believed to be the least injured, is a teller at the First National bank.

PLAN TO CURB FOOD PRICE

Minneapolis Officials Determined European War Shall Not Supply Excuse For Inflation.

Minneapolis.—City and county officials launched a movement to curb war prices on foodstuffs in Minneapolis. The officials are determined that a European war, no matter how extensive, shall not supply a false excuse for the inflation of local prices on the necessaries of life.

It is probable that the local activities will be carried on in co-operation with the investigation started by Attorney General McReynolds from Washington. The attorney general already has communicated with Alfred Jacques, United States district attorney, whose headquarters are in St. Paul, asking the St. Paul official to forward to Washington information regarding war prices.

Thrown From Buggy and Killed.

Holden, crop expert, is transmitting some of his alfalfa facts and enthusiasm to farmers of this county in an aggressive three-day campaign which began in southern part of county. Lectures are given at farmers' club picnics and on public squares. Where farmers are busy threshing the campaign is carried to the threshing crews and talks on alfalfa and allied topics are made at the noon hour.

PRAISES RURAL AWAKENING

Governor Eberhart Upon Return From Tour Declares Country Districts Are Booming.

O. Eberhart upon his return to the capitol from a speaking trip.

"The agricultural communities are booming," he said. "The farmers are supporting all kinds of social centers and the consolidated schools are being pushed with vigor."

Governor Eberhart has been speaking every day, and sometimes addressed two audiences the same day. His tour has taken him into five states.

"I have told thousands of people of the advantages of Minnesota," he said, "and I think my efforts will bring many people here."

Governor Eberhart will remain in the city long enough to clean up accumulated business. His next itinerary will carry him through parts of Michigan and Northern Indiana.

Arrest Forgery Suspect.

Middle River.—The authorities here were advised by Sheriff Anderson of Pope county that Jack DeVoe, alias John Davis, also known as G. Smith, was wanted at Glenwood for check forgery. A man answering the description was at once placed in the lockup and the sheriff wired of his apprehension. Sheriff Anderson came here the same evening and the suspect proved to be the right man and was handcuffed and taken away. It appears DeVoe had been employed in a printshop at Glenwood and while there secured some blank checks and forged the name of the printer, cashing the checks locally.

Mr. Postlewait has served nearly thirteen years continuously in office here and his advancement comes as a recognition of his splendid services and faithful attention to his duties.

SURE CROP MONEY BRINGS OPTIMISM

BANKERS DECLARE AFTER-HARVEST MONEY FLOW WILL BE GREATER THAN LAST YEAR.

PRICE BASIS MUCH HIGHER

Sale of Wheat, Corn, Barley, Oats, Rye, Flax, Potatoes and Other Important Crops Will Make Northwest Prosperous.

Minneapolis.—With its purchasing power increased enormously by price advances in farm products, and the eventual after-harvest money flow certain to be many millions greater than was indicated two weeks ago, the northwest, as merchants and bankers are finding general sentiment expressed, is quietly awaiting European war eventualities.

Confident that no matter what may happen, the crops will be marketed on a price basis much higher than was considered possible a month ago, business men in Minneapolis and in outlying business centers in Minnesota, North Dakota, South Dakota and Montana are optimistic. The price of wheat, of corn and barley, oats and rye, flax, potatoes and other more important crops, no matter what disturbing elements may intervene temporarily, will make northwest prosperity eventually.

This is the judgment of men of long experience in business in the northwest, many of whom take the view that never before has there been so great an opportunity for business growth in the northwest as that which may be seen in the near background through the smoke of war and the confusion incident to the existing disruption of lines of business communication.

Reports from bankers in the states where Minneapolis trade is heaviest show that everywhere in all the country from the Mississippi to Montana and from Iowa north to the international boundary, recent price advances in farm products make the absorbing topic for country merchants and farmers.

They bring out these points:

Many farmers, especially renters, will sell their grain promptly.

Prosperous farmers will hold back grain for higher prices in many cases.

Country merchants are at this time doing a normal volume of business.

Minnesota corn crop prospects are good.

Less money has so far been needed by the country than last year.

J. J. HILL'S DAUGHTER IS SAFE

Cable From London That They Will Sail for New York on Minnetonka August 29.

St. Paul.—Miss Clara Hill and her sister, Mrs. Michael Gavin of New York, daughters of James J. Hill, are in London, and will leave for America as soon as possible, according to a cable received. Prof. Thomas Shaw wired James J. Hill from England that he had secured passage on the Minnetonka, which sails Aug. 29 for New York. Word was received in St. Paul that Miss Fannie E. Pitts, principal of the Mounds Park school, would leave for New York on the Principe d'Udine from Genoa. In company with Miss Pitts is Miss Anna E. Spates, 800 Hague avenue, also a teacher in the St. Paul public schools.

Identify Murdered Man.

Bemidji.—By means of a laundry mark on an undergarment the young man who was mysteriously murdered across Lake Bemidji has been identified as George W. St. Clair, a printer of Hubville, Mo. The dead man came to Bemidji to seek employment and was well recommended. How he came to be at the scene of the tragedy is not known, nor is the motive for the murder, which was committed by strangling and by wounds inflicted with a penknife. The coroner and sheriff are conducting an investigation.

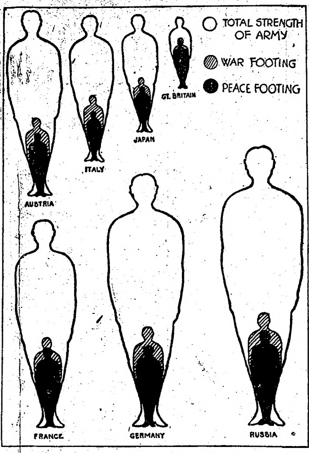
May Wait for Advance.

Albert Lea.—The volume of business with local merchants is greater than last year. The outlook is good, if sufficient funds can be obtained to finance operations and improvements. Money is a little close. Wheat is running from 8 to 12 bushels. Oats about average yield, barley good, and corn is in good condition. Farmers are in good circumstances and may hold wheat for an advance.

No Trace of Missing Girl.

Mankato.—Deputy Sheriff Nerdahl of this city and Deputy Sheriff Johnson of Medo township were in St. Paul trying to locate Miss Mabel Shannon of Medo, who has been missing from the Michael Tweit residence since July 29th. Neither of the deputy sheriffs could locate the girl. While in St. Paul Miss Emma Fuchold, formerly of Medo township, was seen by Deputy Sheriff Nerdahl. She stated that she received a card from Miss Shannon July 2d, but since that time had not heard from her.

ARMIES OF POWERS COMPARED



REAL BATTLE CAPABILITIES OF THE ARMIES OF EUROPE

"Do you know that the contending armies in Europe today are battling upon their peace time footings?" asked a colonel on the general staff of the United States army. "And don't forget that the nation that gets its fighting force up to its full war strength first will gain a material advantage in the present turmoil."

This means that any hasty deductions made upon the basis of fights won and lost up to date may soon prove absolutely misleading.

The question then arises: Which of the struggling armies can reach its war strength soonest, and, with that attained, what are its chances for maintaining that standing in the grueling days to come? The answer is a matter of administrative efficiency first, and then follows naturally the relative merits of the reserve material upon which the nation can draw as battle after battle and disease thin the ranks of those in the field. At present the Germans are virtually fighting alone four other nations, but their initial setbacks are not properly a true index of what is to come in the near future.

Some Figures.

As it is necessary to deal with figures it is just as well to begin now as later. These figures, interpreted in the light of additional information have another meaning, one that comes closer to the facts inspiring the aggressive policy assumed by the kaiser in face of seemingly appalling odds. According to authoritative information the peace and the war footing of the powers named are as follows:

	Peace.	War.	Reserves.	Total.
Russia	771,193	1,079,337	5,400,000	6,497,337
Germany	565,565	844,983	5,000,000	5,844,983
France	535,670	700,740	3,250,000	2,950,740
Austria	343,353	529,524	2,500,000	3,029,524
Italy	211,304	371,496	1,500,000	1,871,493
England	206,626	223,698	215,000	438,698
Japan	182,503	264,300	1,000,000	1,264,200

As between France and Germany apart from the latter's superior war footing, the total of the fully trained reserves in the Fatherland would be the most potent factor in a prolonged struggle and also the justification for a vigorous initiative despite early heavy losses. Both Germany and France have in the last two years increased the period of service from two to three years. In France this lengthening of the term with the colors aroused a great deal of opposition, not to say discontent.

Immediately back of these soldiers are the first reserves, men who but recently have finished their full tours of active service and of course are familiar with the latest practices. Now look at the foregoing figures. Germany's peace footing is only 29,895 men stronger than that of France, but upon the first call to arms this moderate superority immediately jumps to the greater figure of 144,203, giving the kaiser an advantage of nearly 21 per cent. But this is only the beginning of the difference.

Germany's total reserve of fully trained reserves—men trained with peculiar thoroughness—is today quite 5,000,000, while the admittedly less exactingly drilled reserves of France number but 3,250,000 rank and file. Here, as can plainly be seen, the Fatherland leads by 1,750,000—two and a half times the war footing of France, while still having in reserve as many as France would have at best.

Setting aside the question of the relative military value of the training of the German and the French soldiers, those of France carry a magazine rifle of eight millimiters caliber and the German infantrymen repeaters having a caliber of 7.8 millimeters. Assuming the same propulsive charge, the German gun will carry further and travel flatter than the French weapon, making for better marksmanship at all ranges.

Again, the French rifle is heavier than the German, increasing to that extent the stress upon the man who has to carry it on long marches. The soldiers of both nations carry the same number of cartridges, 120. But the saving in weight in the German musket is offset by other weights he has to carry. Fully equipped the French foot soldier has a total burden of 54.58 pounds, while the German infantryman has to bear 58.75 pounds. As a broad proposition the average German is a sturdier man than his French rival, and this greater tax is wisely laid upon him.

French Equipment.

In the French army each company of infantry has the following portable tools: Eight shovels, four pickaxes (double headed), three axes, one folding saw and a pair of wire nippers. The German foot soldier on the other hand does not get off so easily, because each company has to carry 10 small spades, ten pickaxes and five hatchets. Now what does this mean? Simply that the kaiser's infantrymen are able to entrench themselves quicker than their French rivals, and for that reason could hold an advanced position more securely and guard themselves against attack while there better than the soldiers of the tricolor.

Now let us see what Russia represents as a foes to Germany on the Fatherland's northern border. Unquestionably the czar's army is superior to the kaiser's in mere point of numbers in peace, in war and in the total available reserves, and so far as personal bravery goes the Russian soldier is unsurpassed. But battles are not won these days by just numbers; training and handling of the men are of supreme importance.

Broadly speaking, it is doubtful if the Russian forces are any better trained than they were when they measured strength with the Japanese in 1904-05. The infantry are armed with magazine rifles of 7.62 millimeter caliber, and as marksmen they are nothing like the equals of the Germans.

How They Compare.

Russia is measurably superior to Germany in the matter of infantry, cavalry and artillery in the form of field guns, and Germany, in turn, leads France in the vital feature of artillery. Artillery has played a prime part in all great wars, and the popular idea is that it is upon these guns that the tide of battle turns. In a measure this is so, for the field pieces have to protect or support the infantry; but with this done, the decisive outcome of an action depends upon the conduct and gallantry of the foot soldier, for he constitutes the backbone of any military force.

As a matter of history, the French have led in field ordnance ever since the Franco-Prussian war. The French were the first to adopt the long recoil which made it possible to use higher propulsion charges and to secure better practice against the target, and to them, too, is owed the introduction of the spade upon the trail by which the recoil of the carriage could be checked, thus making it possible for the gun pointer to hold his position and to fire deliberately and rapidly. To the French, also, the world is indebted for the higher development of the shrapnel shell with its withering blast of leaden bullets.

CLIPPING THE CLOVER BACK

Good Farming Not to Allow Plant to Produce Seed Year It Is Sown —Cutting Off Bloom Helps.

When a good stand of clover has been secured by sowing a nurse crop, when it has passed safely through the critical period and this crop has been removed, if the conditions are favorable, red clover, alsike and mammoth are all likely to attempt to produce a seed crop the year they are sown, says Wallace's Farmer. We have seen times, when conditions were very favorable, when a crop of hay would be secured from the spring sowing, and in one case we know of, some years ago, both a crop of hay and a crop of seed were produced.

This would naturally convert this biennial into an annual, and it would be interesting to know just what happened to that field the next year. Our belief is that it would act exactly as two-year-old clover after a crop of hay and a crop of seed has been secured the year after it is sown. We do not think it advisable to permit clover to produce seed the year it is sown. It would undoubtedly weaken the stand, as a stalk that has produced seed has served its purpose, and will be very likely to disappear the next year.

We found out by experience that by clipping our clover back, that is cutting it off high enough simply to take off the seed heads, we secure a much better stand the next year. Therefore, we think it is good farming not to allow clover to produce seed the year it is sown. Care should be taken to do this clipping just at the right time, and to set the cutter bar high enough so as not to injure the plant. Cutting off the bloom will not injure, but will help it. Where this clipping is too long delayed, the clippings are likely to make too much of a swath, and unless removed will seriously interfere with the stand of clover by shading it. We had this happen once in our own experience.

BETTER PRICE FOR PRODUCE

Great Many Farmers Make Mistake of Allowing Fruit and Vegetables to Become Too Ripe.

Many farmers allow dollars of possible profits to slip through their hands by neglecting to properly prepare their produce for market. Fruit and vegetables for a nearby market need not be picked until almost ripe, but for a long distance shipment they must be harvested earlier. A great many growers make the mistake of allowing their fruit and vegetables to become too ripe before gathering and as a result the products that look so attractive when starting reach their destination in an overripe condition. For this reason we must carefully consider the distance to market before harvesting our products.

All tender fruit and vegetables intended for sale in a fresh condition should be carefully handled. Bruised fruits and vegetables soon decay and affect other specimens next to them in the package. This destroys the appearance of the products and ruins its value accordingly.

The most important operation in preparing fruits and vegetables for market is the grading. Careful cultivation saves a great amount of grading. Uniformity is the chief requirement to be considered in grading produce for the market. Products should be packed so that they will be uniform in appearance, quality and condition.

There is seldom a time when nicely packed and honestly graded fruits and vegetables will not bring a good price; it is the poorly packed, poorly developed, unevenly ripened products that are a drug on the market. The experienced packer has in mind the general appearance of the whole package rather than a few choice specimens on top. The better the grading the better the price.

Unnecessary Loss.

Coops and egg cases are expensive. Unless sold with the contents, keep a check on them and see to it that they are returned to you promptly. The value of lost coops each season will aggregate a fortune.

Profitable Farming.

Dairy farming is one of the most approved and profitable methods of live stock farming.

THE SUNBEAM.

BY W. G. HUNT.

Published every Friday, at Sunbeam, Pennington County, Minnesota.

Entered as Second-class matter August 3o 905, at the post office at Sunbeam Minn. under the Act of Congress of March 3, 1879

Thief River Falls is right up to date, as they now have local bird man, so if you see a flying machine coming, it is from Thief River Falls.

The campaign for county officers will open about September 1st, after which time the babies will all get kissed, and the old hay seed farmer gets his due amount of praise for his excellent farming methods.

Red Lake County will hold their annual fair on September 1, 2 and 3. A much better date than the Pennington County fair was held, as it will give the farmers a chance to have their farm produce ready for exhibition.

If reports are true C. L. Hanson made the people sit up and take notice of the way the last legislature was run, in his speech at the picnic last Sunday. While Mr. Hanson may not be one of those orator spell binders, yet he has an honest way of placing the cold facts before the voters.

While the wheat crop is a little disappointing this year, yet the farmers can increase their income from it by being careful about how they handle the crop. The grain will be improved immensely by stacking and allowing it to go through the sweat. This will be time well spent, as the price of grain is sure to advance.

We don't understand whether there is an expectation of war with a foreign nation by the present administration or not, but they are going to raise $100,000,000 by internal revenue taxes. There is no prospect of war, but the party in power have placed the country on a war basis in the first eighteen months that they have been in power. Pretty good record, isn't it?

Brother Cutter of the News-Press is after the scalp of County Commissioner Daniel Shaw while Brother Hunt of the Sunbeam, is after the scalp of County Auditor Fasel.—Eleven Towns.

If Brother Lattimore, had been living on Ditch 47, and a neighbor to the poor farmer tax payers on Ditch 42, for the past four years he might have a greivance against the County Auditor, for the way some of these deals have been worked. First the contracts were let to contractors, then some of them re-let to subcontractors, who came in here and bought supplies of farmers, and hired them to do work for them, and beat them out of their pay, while O'Neill made drainage laws in the interests of the Drainage Companies, who only had to make a SATISFACTORY explanation to Fa sel as County Auditor, while the poor farmers and tax payers stood patiently by, losing the use of their land, being beat out of their labor, and the produce they sold to the "dead beat" contractors, while O'Neill builds a mansion of a residence at Thief River Falls, and Fasel starts a bank in the town of Goodridge. Then these two men want four years more in office, and have the supreme gall to say that THE SUNBEAM is lying about them. Some of the "dead beats" gave worthless checks to farmers for oats, and the farmers not only lost their oats but had to pay $3.00 protest fees on the checks. Is not that enough to start most anyone scalp hunting, Brother Lattimore!

Sheriff LaBree's annoucement will appear in our columns about the first of September. Jess is so well known that he hardly needs any introduction, and his opponent has got the strongest man in the country to run against, as Mr. LaBree has certainly filled that position to the entire satisfaction of the people. About the only man that we have so far met, who will not vote for him, is his opponent.

TALKING FROM THE CHEST.

Not Necessary to Put a Telephone Transmitter to the Mouth.

In case one does not care to stoop to a telephone while talking, or does not care to put the transmitter to the mouth, he can make himself heard by very simple means. Simply place the abdomen or the chest against the mouthpiece of the transmitter and talk into the open air, and the sound will get to the party on the other end. The whole chest wall and the wall of the abdomen vibrate in unison when the mouth is speaking, as they are a great sounding board, and they will transmit the proper sound waves to the diaphragm. This is easy to try and astonishing in result.

Another peculiar thing noticed in telephones at times is phantom talk heard in a receiver when one is waiting for central to give connection. Odd scraps of conversations may be heard in this manner. They are probably due to conversations going on over wires lying in close proximity to the one that you are using—such conversations causing small oscillating currents which, by the process of induction, cause small oscillating currents to take place in your line of like character.—New York World.

Few Beds in Bagdad.

About 60 per cent of Bagdad's population possess no beds. These poor people rest on blankets spread on the floors of their houses in the winter and on the roofs in the summer. Owing to the excessive heat of these region sleep is made impossible elsewhere than on the roof or in the open gardens. It is an interesting sight to see how the women at sunset emerge from their houses to prepare the evening meal on the roof and spread the bedding for the night. Inasmuch as the climate is very dry, there is little to fear from exposure to the night air. While a considerable number of the roofs are surrounded by latticework to insure a certain amount of privacy by far the larger number are quite exposed to the gaze of curious and inquisitive neighbors.

Scotland's Patron Saint.

Why was St. Andrew chosen as the patron saint of Scotland? This question has been asked many times, but the archdeacon of whom Dean Hole tells may be considered to have discovered the most satisfactory solution of the problem. "Gentlemen," said he (he was speaking at a St. Andrew's day banquet at the time), "I have given this difficult subject my thoughtful consideration, and I have come to the conclusion that St. Andrew was chosen to be the patron saint of Scotland because he discovered the lad who had the loaves and fishes."—Dundee Advertiser.

THE LOCAL NEWS

Post cards for sale at this office.

Flax harvest will begin next week.

The whistle of the steam thrasher will soon be heard in the land.

We publish on another page the latest war news up to last Monday evening.

The weather has been rather unfavorable for stacking the past week, although the rain was needed for corn and fall plowing.

While shock thrashing may be an easy way of disposing of the labor of stacking, the farmer who stacks this year, will find that he will be well repaid for the extra labor.

Barnhard Knudsen candidate for County Treasurer, and H. O. Kjomme candidate for County Attorney, made the acquaintance of a large number of the farmers at the Mayfield picnic last Sunday.

Oats and barley are a good crop this year, which will insure plenty of feed for the horses and hogs. With the present prices of barley and pork the proper place to market barley is in the pig pen.

The Eleven Towns took an active part in the Republican Primary governor campaign, then jumped the ticket after it was nominated, and turned Democratic. But we must say that they are supporting a good man for governor.

Any candidate for county or state office who expects the country newspaper to publish his announcements at cut rates because he, the farmer publisher, is not located in town, will please not take up our time, as we are busy on the farm.

The price of sugar jumped to ten cents a pound the past week. The Democratic party has certainly made a success, in their minds, at lowering the cost of living. They will soon have the cost up so high that they can't afford to run free soup houses.

We will get out some "no hunting allowed" signs for farmers soon, who wish to post notices to hunters, so they will not run through their flax and destroy it. Some of these city hunters do not care if they destroy an acre of a farmers flax, if they can get a prairie chicken out of it.

Campaign year is the time that the country publisher can get all the free plate he wants, providing he lets the other fellow write what he desires to have published. When we see this plate matter published in a county newspaper, we always think that the editor of that paper had ought to apply to the probate court to have a guardian appointed to look after his interests.

We publish in another column the announcement of T.P. Anderson, for County Auditor. Mr. Anderson is a man that is well qualified for the position, and is not only a good plain English speaker, but can speak to the Scandinavians in their own language, something that will be of great convience to the people of that nationality, who have business to do at the court house, that do not speak the English language well.

The Mayfield farmers had a picnic last Sunday, on the Rairsgard farm. There was a large crowd present, and the farmers had the opportunity to listen to speeches made by C. L. Hanson, candidate for State Senator, and John A. Duffy, candidate for Representative. T. P. Anderson the ditch tax paying farmers' candidate for County Auditor, was also present and made the acquaintance of a large number of the farmers.

James O'Brien has been assisting E. K. Klemmetson with the building of his new grainary the past week.

Some of them ditch contractors had better make their ARRANGEMENTS before January 1st, as there is likely to be a change in that County Auditor's office, on that date.

He Let Her Sleep.

Some years ago a Swansea vessel was caught in a terrible gale. The captain had his wife on board, and when the wind was still rising he told her to go down below and sleep, for all was well. He remained on the bridge till the mate came up and said: "We've done all we can. Hadn't you better tell the chaps to get out the boats?"

"Yes, yes, my lad. If you think so," said the captain, who knew the only choice left was whether to go down with the ship or in a small boat, which couldn't live ten seconds in that sea. The engineers came up with the news that the fires were all out. "Very well, my lads," said the captain quietly; "save yourselves if you can."

"Won't you fetch the wife on deck, sir?" asked one of the men.

"No," was the calm reply; "let her sleep, poor old girl. I am going down to have a smoke." And, smoking by the bedside of his sleeping wife, he went down with the ship.

Great Poets and a Little Girl.

James Russell Lowell used to walk along the gravel paths of his beautiful garden in Cambridge, Mass., hand in hand with a bright little girl, who was his neighbor, and discoursed with her upon fairies, paper dolls, roses and other important subjects. Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, a neighbor of Lowell's and of the little girl's, who wore a velvet coat and a big tie, was also her intimate friend. He used to tell her wonderful stories of ancient heroes and many other marvelous things. It was natural that the little girl should resolve even then to become a writer, and first of all a poet, for it was as a poet that the novelist, Eleanor Hallowell Abbott, first achieved recognition. —Century.

Finnan Haddie.

"You may be getting finnan haddie when you order it at your dealer's," said a buyer for a restaurant, "and you may not. Finnan haddie is smoked haddock. Haddock is of the same family as the cod. It resembles the codfish, but has a black lateral line. The lateral line of the codfish is white. The appearance of this line is not changed by the smoking, and if you take the trouble to glance down the sides of the fish that you are buying as finnan haddie you will often see that the line is white, not black. Cod may be just as good, as the dealer will perhaps tell you, but if you want finnan haddie that is doubtless what you want."—New York Sun.

Ancient Gallantry.

The respect and veneration paid to the fair sex formed an essential ingredient in chivalry. Principle of female adoration so predominently displayed in every aspect of chivalry extended its influence to the laws of the times, for we find James II. of Aragon ordering in this manner: "We will that every man, whether knight or no, who shall be in company with a lady pass safe and unmolested unless he be guilty of murder."

And Louis II., Duke of Bourbon, instituting the order of the Golden Shield, enjoins his knights to honor, above all, the ladies and not permit any one to slander them, "because," adds he, "from them, after God, comes all the honor that man can acquire."

SYNOPSIS.

Anne Ives, mascot by reputation, starts from Winnipeg for London to attend the coronation of King George. Her father was the Compte d'Yves of France. Following a quarrel with the compte, Anne's father went to America, where he married. At his death he left Anne a key to a strong box in the vaults of Magniff & Co., Paris bankers. The box is said to contain bonds of the defunct French Panama Canal company. On the steamer Anne meets the dissolute son of Banker Magniff, who, not knowing her identity, tells Anne of a proposed scheme to get hold of the Panama bonds and extort money from his father. Anne attends an aviation meet in London, and volunteers to go as a passenger with a French contestant who wins the prize, but disappears before Anne can learn his identity. Anne is about to give up her attempts to gain admission to the coronation when the aviator and his grandfather appear. The young man invites Anne to accompany him and while entering the abbey she loses her purse.

CHAPTER III—Continued.

While my mind hurriedly ran through all the possibilities of my situation, the elder gentleman bowed Estelle to the seat which the usher offered them and ceremoniously departed, to take up his station at the side of the French ambassador, among a little group of foreign dignitaries near the high altar. He brushed past me in his high buff boots—and, for the present, at least, my purse was lost to me. I prayed fervently that his duties did not call for his kneeling; I would not trust my property even among the peers and their ladies, should it roll out of his boot-tops!

Well, for the present there was nothing to be done. My escort sat between myself and Estelle, who peered ecstatically toward the altar. We two had not a good sight of the proceedings, but we did not care. We were engrossed with the novelty and piquancy of our situation—at least I know I was, even though my hatred for this man was becoming insupportable.

Whether or not I actually saw the crowning of King George I have not the smallest idea. I know the organ pealed and tenor voices sang anthems, and that from time to time we rose upon our feet and then sat down again. In that kaleidoscopic series of changeful coloring, those swaying, moving, loyal crowds, we were as solitary as travelers in a desert of prismatic sands.

"Will you not tell me your name, sun-goddess?" besought my companion. "I sought you everywhere that afternoon; I was disconsolate—"

"You sought me?" I answered, sharply. "Why, you had not the common courtesy to wait until I had recovered from my fright."

"Fright?" he repeated. "It was the change of temperature that made mademoiselle faint, not fright."

This was ingenuous; in spite of my hate of him, I felt slightly mollified.

"Why didn't you wait?" I asked, and then hated myself for having asked it.

He hung his head, quite like a boy.

"I'll tell you, sun-goddess," he answered. "The fact is—my grandfather is one of the French military embassy, you know."

So that was his grandfather: I had thought the old gentleman his father. He looked hardly over sixty.

"My grandfather is eighty-four," he said, smiling, as though he read my thoughts. "When you have favored me with your name I shall tell you our own; it is a name well-known in the annals of France. On account of some pride of his—you know he has old-fashioned ideas, sun-goddess—he desired that, if I insisted on flying, I should do so incognito. Besides, though I have no official rank here except that of army captain, I am really here on quite an important mission on behalf of the French foreign office. You will understand, therefore, how essential it was that, on the eve of the coronation, our name should not become the common property of the public. Accordingly, I hurried away to change my clothes after the flight, being sure that when I returned to the grounds, unrecognized, I should find you there and be privileged to offer you my most respectful thanks and homage. Imagine my chagrin, then, to discover that you and your companion had disappeared. I was disconsolate."

"You thought more of your machine than you did of me," I said, and next moment I could have bitten my tongue. I hastened to add that it made no difference to me.

It was bewildering, the medley of emotions that this young Frenchman inspired in me. Hate was predominant, but yet, perhaps because of my own French blood, I found his presence stimulating, inspiring. He was so different from Mr. Spratt!

"And now, you will favor me with your name, that I may present my grandfather, will you not, mademoiselle?" he asked.

"My name," I answered, "is Anne Ives. It is a short one, but it serves all useful purposes."

"And—pardon me if I am presumptuous, mademoiselle—but you are an American, making a journey to England unchaperoned, doubtless in accordance with the customs of your charming countrywomen? My mother will be delighted with you. Permit me to offer you my card."

He handed me an oblong piece of pasteboard, slightly larger than the cards that our men use, engraved with a long name which I could not at first discern, owing to the dimness of the abbey after the glare of the hot streets.

But I hardly glanced at it. I had not yet recovered from the sense of humiliation which he had inspired in me; and I thought he needed a further lesson. So I gave him one.

"No doubt such personal interrogations are the custom in your own country, monsieur," I answered him. "Therefore, I will not only tolerate them, but will give you further information." In my agitation I had unconsciously stripped off my gloves, and, as I did so, there flashed upon my eyes Estelle's wedding ring, reposing calmly on my third finger. My companion saw it at the same instant that I did.

"I see," he said, in a voice curiously constrained, "that my use of the term 'mademoiselle' was a trifle premature."

"Monsieur is entitled to draw his own inferences," I answered haughtily.

My triumph was complete. Now for the denouement! What would it be? Should I enlighten him? Of a truth, so bewildered was I by the complexity of my feelings that I did not know what I was going to say or do. I fingered his card idly and waited.

As I did so, for the first time I read his name, and I grasped at the air seeking to save myself from falling. For the name upon the card was that of the Chevalier d'Yves, of Clichy, Normandy, my half-cousin, and his companion was our common grandfather—the man who had turned my father out of his home and sent him to Canada to suffer poverty and despair!

The old hate rose up in my heart again, gripping me so tensely that I could utter no word. I crumpled the pasteboard in my hand and passed out of the pew. I have since come to the conclusion that the archbishop was just then placing the crown upon his majesty's head, for I remember that people looked at me scandalized, as I staggered down the aisle toward the door, and that some cried "Hush!" after me. I remember the blaze of sunlight that beat on me, the eager voices without, the calls for my carriage. Somehow—how I know not—I forced my passage clear of the crowd, seeing and hearing nothing distinctly, crossed Parliament square in the face of a hundred policemen, and at last found myself, at mid-day, in a deserted street close to the Thames embankment.

Even then I did not at first remember that I had lost my purse and key.

CHAPTER IV.

I Sell My Birthright.

(Showing that it is sometimes possible to dispose of what you do not have.)

"Well, Anne," I said to myself, "you certainly have managed your affairs splendidly. Here you are in London, without a penny, and, worse still, without the key to the box in the Paris vaults which contains your fortune."

Angry tears came into my eyes. My scorn for the man who had disinherited my father, and for his grandson, the chevalier, had hitherto supported my spirits; but now, in this realization of my extremity, I felt crushed down by my misfortunes. Oh, why hadn't I taken the advice of my room-mate, Mary Jenner, and waited until we could all make up a party to go to England at the close of the school year!

One thing was clear; I must make my way to Paris at once, key or no key, satisfy the banker Magniff as to my identity, and recover my bonds. Doubtless, at a pinch, he would offer me a fair price for them—enough, at any rate, to make the $500 that I had lost look small. And—this thought buoyed my spirits wonderfully—I should thereby thwart his scoundrelly son Leopold's scheme and prosecute his own revenge against my relatives.

I made my way back to the boarding house. Estelle had not yet returned. When at last she arrived, several hours later, desperately tired but radiant, she clasped me in her arms in a delirium of gratitude.

"Anne, you have saved my reputation," she exclaimed. "If we had not gotten into the abbey, through the kindness of your mysterious aviator, I should, never, never have gathered courage to face the folks at Cedar Plank, Ia., again. Oh, Anne, do you know that old man is a real count, and a general in the army? But why did you run away?"

"I had no wish to continue the acquaintance after I discovered who our friends were," I answered coldly. "The count, as you call him, and my father were not on speaking terms. He is my grandfather."

"Your—your grandfather?" Estelle stammered, looking at me with mingled awe and amazement.

"And I have got to start for Paris by the night train," I continued, without leaving her time to recover her breath. "Do you happen to know of a good pawnbroker round this neighborhood?"

"What do you want a pawnbroker for?" she inquired, staccato.

"To raise the fare," I answered. "My purse was stolen today, and so I want to pawn my watch."

"But you can't go to a pawnbroker," she cried, still more staccato than before, and eyeing me as though I were some new species of animal. "Where are you going to stay?"

"Unless I pawn my watch, you may address my letters to the third bench inside the main entrance to the Bois de Boulogne," I answered, calmly.

"But I'll lend you the money, dear," said Estelle, her mind at once diverted to this new problem. "I've got ten pounds I have no use for." Already she was unlocking a drawer of the secretaire. She took out two five-pound notes and thrust them into my hands. "You must take them, Anne," she insisted. "We don't go back on one another in Cedar Plank. And it's only fair payment for getting me into the abbey and saving my reputation at home."

"You dear thing!" I said, pocketing the bills. "When I get my bonds from the Paris bank I shall return this promptly."

"Where are you going to stay?" cried my companion, branching out along another trail of speculation. "Do you know what a dreadful city Paris is? No single woman should go there, nor any married one, either, until she's thirty-five, at any rate."

"How old are you, Estelle?" I asked.

"Thirty-five," she said, innocently.

I went into hysterics quite suddenly; I suppose it was the reaction from the strain of the morning.

"Now, dear, if you go to Paris, do go to the Pension Anglais," she insisted, when she had shaken and slapped me into sanity, and bathed my face with eau de cologne. "Promise me that and I know you'll be well looked after and come to no harm."

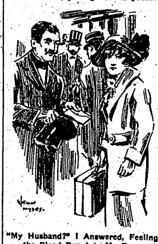
"I—I—I promise," I gasped weakly. "But one thing I won't do," I continued, pulling off her wedding ring. "I—won't wear this."

And then I realized that, instead of laughing, I was crying. And for my life I couldn't tell why, unless it was with anger against the man who had humiliated me.

I had the greatest difficulty in persuading her to let me depart. Especially she insisted that the wearing of her wedding ring would be necessary to my safety in the French capital, of which, not having yet been there, she entertained exaggerated and, I secretly believe, delightful fears. But somehow I eluded her well-meant intentions of detaining me, and eight o'clock found me at Charing Cross station, waiting for the Dover train.

I had ten minutes leeway, and strolled idly up and down the platform, watching with interest the various traveling types. There was a party of Frenchmen on their way home after the coronation who interested me in particular. The faces of more than one seemed half familiar to me, and especially I found myself regarding a tall Englishman, immaculately attired, who, evidently in the guise of interpreter, went busily from one to another, settling difficulties, labeling baggage, and generally smoothing away the little troubles of their journeying. Turning suddenly as I was passing, he almost ran into me, stopped dead, and lifted his hat. Then I knew who he was, and who those others were. They were aviators and their friends, and he was the chief steward, with whom I had exchanged words at the aviation meeting the week before when I volunteered to ascend with the Chevalier d'Yves (then unknown to me) in his monoplane.

"My dear madame, why in the world don't your husband call for his prize?" he ejaculated, pulling out his pocketbook. "I've carried it with me ever since, trusting to run across him. And do you know that to this day I haven't learned your name? Ah! that was a spectacular flight of yours. And clever—deucedly clever!"



"My Husband?" I Answered, Feeling the Blood Run Into My Face.

"My husband?" I answered, feeling the blood run into my face in the most embarrassing manner.

"But didn't you know that he failed to claim the prize of five hundred pounds that he won by his remarkable flight?" he asked. With that he extracted an envelope from his pocketbook, which he handed to me with a formal bow. "With the compliments of the committee," he continued. "And now, if you would enlighten me as to the identity of your delightful husband—"

"But he isn't my husband," I panted, terrified. "My name's Anne Ives, if you want to know, and it's no business of mine who he is, because I never saw him before in my life."

But he absolutely declined to believe me.

"Oh, oh, madame," he said, smiling and shaking his finger at me. "It was a deucedly clever scheme to pretend to be strangers to one another. It made your flight look so much more spontaneous. Of course, I shall not press you—"

"Won't you please take back this money?" I pleaded. "Indeed, you are under a misapprehension."

"Will not madame keep it and hand it to monsieur, if she should happen to encounter him?" asked the secretary, blandly.

Evidently he refused to believe that I was not the wife of the chevalier—the very man whom I hated more bitterly than I had ever dreamed I could hate anyone. The very mention of the hateful word indicating the relationship in which he thought we stood filled me with loathing. I should have flung the money into his face, but suddenly bells rang, and there was a concerted rush for the train. The guard was already signaling to the engine-driver. I dashed into a compartment just in time; the wheels began to revolve, and I sank down into my seat, still clutching the envelope. I looked inside; there were five bank notes, of the value of one hundred pounds apiece. I thrust them into my handbag.

Estelle had packed my suitcase for me, and, when I opened it, a little later, what do you suppose I found on top of everything? Nothing else than that horrid little Mr. Spratt's book on the Code Napoleon, which he had so eloquently presented to me at the moment of my departure from Winnipeg. Poor little Mr. Spratt! The sight of it recalled to my mind vividly Mary Jenner, my best friend, and the life which now seemed so infinitely far away. And it was only two weeks before that I had been teaching a class of overgrown boys and girls the principles of arithmetic! If they knew of my subsequent adventures! I smiled, and then I felt the moisture in my eyes. I thrust the envelope containing the money into the cover of Mr. Spratt's book and gave myself up to somewhat painful meditation until I reached Dover.

The night passage was calm and I slept well until awakened at Calais, where we re-trained for Paris, reaching there at an unearthly hour in the morning. Through the kindness of an old gentleman aboard the train—you know those old gentlemen who are bubbling over with altruism toward the stranger—I eventually found myself knocking wearily at the doors of the Pension Anglais. I was assigned a room by the sleepy night clerk and tumbled into bed without even troubling to undress. When I awoke it was past twelve o'clock, and the noise and stir of the great city was in full swing beneath my windows.

I couldn't bring myself to the performance of my mission for a couple of days. I inspected the cathedral, the Louvre, the shops; I reveled in my surroundings. Indeed, the fascination of the French capital so overwhelmed me that I doubt whether I should ever have brought myself to carry out my purpose of visiting the banker but for a serious incident which suddenly recalled me to a sense of duty.

I was in the Louvre for the third or fourth time, reveling in the beauty of the sculpture there. I had paused before a statue of Praxiteles, an exquisite piece of work depicting the ideal of beauty, the Greek Hermes. I fell into a train of speculation. Were the modern Greeks, I thought, of the same physical type? I mused; had I ever seen a Greek? There must be Greeks in Winnipeg, but . . . And suddenly I felt a pair of eyes regarding me from across the gallery. I looked up with a start, to see a man in a slouch hat, attired like a guide, and yet evidently not one, since he lacked the official badge, regarding me with intense penetration.

It was the Greek Zeuxis, the hanger-on of villainous scoundrelly Leopold Magniff!

But was it? Was not I, rather, the victim of an overweighted imagination? As I stared at him in consternation he moved with stealthy, gliding steps into another chamber. When I had recovered my self-possession and followed him, he was nowhere to be seen.

The shock of this incident recalled me to the duty that lay before me. If indeed I were under espionage, it was my task to obtain my bonds with the least possible delay. I should never feel satisfied until I had disposed of them and taken the train and boat back to England. For the first time I regretted Estelle's absence. My loneliness was appalling; I felt as though some dark, ominous cloud of danger hung over me.

Early the next morning I sought admission to Leopold Magniff, senior, in his banking house upon the avenue. I had anticipated some difficulty in seeing him, but for some reason or other I was admitted almost immediately to the inner room in which he sat alone, surrounded by ledgers and account books. He was evidently toiling as industriously as any of his assistants, for he looked up, nodded the barest greeting, and went on writing.

Five minutes later he put down his pen.

"Now, mademoiselle, I am at your service," he said.

And I told him my story, to which he listened with an impassive face.

I had not thought before of the improbabilities in it. Yet, even as the words left my mouth, I found myself stumbling for explanations and halting like some conspirator concocting a clumsy fabric of falsehoods. Indeed, when I desisted at last, confused and stammering, there was the ghost of a smile upon the old banker's face.

"I congratulate mademoiselle upon her perfect knowledge of French," he answered, and took up his pen again.

"Well, monsieur—" I stammered.

"Pardon me?" he responded, looking up as though I had just stated a new proposition to him.

"You will let me have my bonds?" I asked.

He smiled again; then frowned slightly.

"I am very busy, mademoiselle," he answered. "Why do you not see my friend, Baron Rothschild?"

I felt the color blazing upon my cheek.

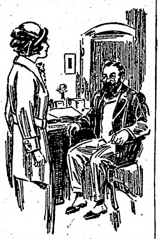
"You don't believe me?" I cried, angrily. "You think I am an impostor?"

"My dear mademoiselle!" he protested. "Do you mean seriously to press this ridiculous claim on me—me, Leopold Magniff, with fifty years' experience of men and women?"

"I certainly intend to obtain my property," I answered.

He pressed the tips of his fingers together and looked at me thoughtfully.

"If mademoiselle insists upon my investigating this claim, the consequence may be serious to her," he answered. "Frankly, I have no money for you. It is too fine a day to spend indoors. Go see the wild geese in the Bois."



"You Really Are an Extraordinary Young Woman," He Said.

I strode forward and stood at his side, quivering with anger.

"Listen to me, monsieur," I cried. "You think me an impostor. Very well, investigate my claim. If I prove fraudulent, hand me over to the police. If I speak the truth, give me my bonds."

"My dear mademoiselle," he protested, "let us assume, then, for the moment, that your story is true. Can you produce anyone who is able to identify you here?"

I shook my head; I was too much enraged to speak. Yet he spoke fairly enough.

"Good. You say that you have come from Canada to claim your bonds. From Canada, observe—a week's journey by a fast steamship. You have no references, no papers. And you have not even the key," he repeated. "And you say the key was stolen from you at the coronation!"

He seemed about to burst into a fit of laughter, repressed himself with difficulty, and suddenly turned to me.

"What is the number of the safe in which your bonds lie?" he asked.

"No. 667," I answered promptly.

He rose, took down a book from a shelf, and studied it for a moment, turning the pages swiftly. Then he returned and seated himself beside me again.

"But, mademoiselle, do you not see what difficulties lie before you in attempting to establish your claim?" he demanded. "First, you must prove your identity indisputably. And then—even if you establish this—we must have a duplicate key manufactured. Our strong boxes do not open so readily as you seem to believe."

"Tell me, monsier," I hazarded, as a new thought crossed my mind, "if one had the key—would it be feasible to enter the vault and take one's property from the safe?"

"Entirely feasible," he answered. "That is, by day. By night none can pass the watchman at the steel gates under any circumstances. But so secure are our locks, so impossible is it to manufacture a key which will fit any of them, that any person having a key and knowing the combination could unlock any box by day—always provided he had the key. By the way, what is your combination?" he asked, keenly.

"It is printed upon the key," I answered. "No. J1025 P. That means MWRO Clichy."

He collapsed in his seat as though he had been shot, and began to eye me furtively—morosely.

"You really are an extraordinary young woman," he said. "Be frank, mademoiselle. You wished to show me that you have knowledge of part of our cipher. You wish to sell your knowledge."

"For the last time," I screamed, in exasperation, "I am neither a thief nor an impostor. I want my bonds."

He looked at me as though he could hardly believe the evidence of his ears.

"I know what agitates you," I pursued, seeing my advantage. "It was the mention of the word Clichy. It recalls to you the home of the unhappy victims of your revenge."

"Mademoiselle!" he cried, starting up, only to sink backward again.

"Listen, monsieur, and let me explain to you," I said. "During the voyage to England, I made the acquaintance of your son, who was a passenger on the same steamship. Not knowing who I was, he made to me the proposal that I should join him in a scheme to obtain these bonds—from myself! That we should procure them at a nominal price by deceiving the victim as to their value; then, that by threatening to dispose of them at a moderate rate to the comte, or in some manner to place him in possession of them thereby enabling him to pay off the mortgage you hold over him, we should force you to purchase them from us at an enormous rate, or lose your mortgage, and, with it, your hold over your enemy. Yes, he told me everything."

"Miserable scoundrel!" cried the old banker, in amazement. "And you told him, mademoiselle—"

"I characterized him precisely as you have done," I answered.

"He was my pride, the apple of my eye," Magniff moaned. "I made him a generous allowance, even after he had disappointed my hopes of some day seeing hm succeed to my interests. But he was wayward from birth. He could not run straight. He is a forger, a thief, a trickster. He has been the despair of my life, the curse of my old age. And now he plans to blackmail his own father!"

His outburst was so sincere, so genuine, that my anger evaporated; I could only feel conscious of a wave of vast pity for the old man, so miserable, in spite of all his wealth.

"Monsieur," I said, presently, "you doubtless are acquainted with the circumstances that drove my father into exile."

He nodded. "I have been your grandfather's banker for forty years," he answered. "It was unjust; the whim of an ancient aristocrat who placed his own pride before his son's happiness. He drove him from his house because they differed in politics. Ciel! What a cause! What a cause for disinheriting one's own son! He could never have done so under the law, mademoiselle, but unfortunately some of the old estates are still controlled by the old feudal customs of the Bourbons—notably in your part of France."

"Then you will understand," I pursued, "that I do not harbor any good-will against my grandfather or his grandson."

He looked up at me hopefully, as though he found cause for rejoicing that anyone should share his hatred.

"You would gladly see them dispossessed—disinherited, as they disinherited your father?" he asked, eagerly.

I nodded. Something within me seemed to rise in protest on behalf of them. I saw the proud old artistocrat in the abbey, I thought of his four and eighty years, destined to end so miserably; then I remembered my father's wrongs and steeled my heart.

"Your revenge shall not be long in tarrying," cried the old man, bringing down his fist upon the table. "For years I have woven my net around them. I was slow, mademoiselle, but very sure. I have them now. In two weeks—unless they meet the interest on the mortgage—they lose Clichy. And they cannot meet it, the dogs! Twelve thousand francs of interest!—and their castle stripped as bare as a hound's tooth. They live like rats in the ruins of their magnificence. And, even if they meet this interest it will be their last. No, mademoiselle, have no fear. Their day is done."

He started and looked keenly at me.

"Mademoiselle," he said impulsively, "either you are indeed the owner or you are the cleverest impostor in Paris. You are ready to make an affidavit?"

"Assuredly," I answered.

"There will be much—what you call 'red tape.' It will be necessary to manufacture a new key. Then an official of the government must be present when you recover your bonds from the interior of the safe. Return three weeks from today, and the safe shall unlock for you."

"Mademoiselle," he continued, "do you know why I am willing to gamble upon your honesty thus? It is not sentiment—it is pure business. It is because, in the working out of my plans, the possession of these bonds is essential to me. And so I will risk the loss of what I offer you for them—50,000 francs."

"Ten thousand dollars!" I exclaimed. (I think I mentioned that I specialized in arithmetic.)

"And," he resumed, "you will here and now execute an agreement to sell me the bonds for that amount. Otherwise—why, mademoiselle, I fear that you will never be able to establish your identity."

"But it is a prodigious sum!" I cried, foolishly.

"They are worth that to me," answered the old banker, quietly. "Are you ready to sign, mademoiselle?"

He brought in a couple of secretaries and dictated the draft of the agreement. In consideration of the transfer of the bonds, I was to receive the sum of 49,274 francs, payable three weeks from that day.

"The deficit is to cover the unpaid rental of the safety deposit box," he explained, suavely.

Mustache for Young England.

Is the mustache coming into fashion again? One will have observed that five of the Oxford crew wear decorations on the upper lip. Cambridge has only one example. That, however, makes six out of eighteen, surely an unusual average today among men who are not long out of their "teens." Leaving the army, in which "face fungus" is compulsory, apart, common observation leads one to the conclusion that about eighty per cent of the male population in England are today clean-shaven, while the majority of the others do not shave at all.

Backache Is a Warning

Nature always gives fair warning whenever anything is going wrong inside the body. When warned of kidney weakness by an aching back or disordered urination, give the kidneys prompt help and avoid more serious troubles.

Kidney trouble is a dangerous thing, because the kidneys are the blood filters, and weak kidneys soon upset the healthiest system, causing rheumatic attacks, gravel, dropsy and Bright's disease.

Doan's Kidney Pills is a most reliable kidney remedy. Doan's are used successfully all over the civilized world and publicly recommended by thousands of grateful people.

A Minnesota Case.

Mrs. Mary J. Miller, Elm St., Norwood, Minn., says: "For eleven days I was laid up in bed with pains in my back. My sides swelled and the doctor said an operation on my kidney was necessary. I kept getting worse and could hardly stand the agony. On a friend's advice, I used Doan's Kidney Pills and they cured me. Doan's Kidney Pills saved me from a serious operation which might have resulted fatally."

The Blanks' maid of all work was a practical young woman of about twenty-seven years. One day when her mistress was making some plans for the future the matter-of-fact Serelda said:

"I don't know, ma'am. It might be that I won't be with you much longer, an' then mebbe I will. I ain't sure yet."

Knowing that a young man had called a good many times to see Serelda, her mistress said:

"Are you thinking of getting married, Serelda?"

Without the least show of embarrassment or enthusiasm Serelda said:

"Well, yes, to tell the truth, I am. Then again I don't know if I will. I've got a good place here with good pay, and he's such a fool mebbe I'll stay on with you!"

US CARTRIDGES

Test after test after test of ammunition has proved the value of the U. S. non-mercuric primer. No mercury in the primer means no harmful, corrosive fouling of the barrel, no destroying action on the brass cartridge case, no varying time of ignition. The U. S. primer is a strictly chemical compound that acts with perfect uniformity.

Where fulminate of mercury is used, ground glass is also used. Ground glass is difficult to mix with mercury and its effect is not only to wear down the rifling, but also to cool the primer flame by absorbing about 16% of the heat.

World's Championship Rifle Teams habitually use U. S. Cartridges.

The Guarantee.

William J. Burns, the famous detective, was talking in New York about the recent dropping of his name from the honorary list of Police chiefs.

"It is easy," Mr. Burns said, "to read the significance of that action. Its significance is evil. It relates to certain graft exposures on my part. Yes, its significance is as evil as the clothier's guarantee.

"A young fellow went to a clothier to buy a pair of flannel pants.

"'The last pair I got here shrunk,' he said. 'I was caught in the rain in them, and they shrunk something terrible. Do you guarantee that these won't shrink?'

"'Young feller,' said the dealer, 'I guarantee them up to the hilt. Why, every fire hose in New York but three has squirted on them pants.'"

No Menace in Sanatorium.

Dr. Edward L. Trudeau, who built the first tuberculosis sanatorium in the United States in 1885, says:

"When I bought the first land on which the Adirondack Cottage sanatorium is built, I paid $25 an acre for it, but the price was then thought absurdly high. My last purchase of five acres cost me $5,000. To my knowledge, there has never been an employe who came to the sanatorium in sound health who developed tuberculosis while there; and a sanatorium can no more endanger the health of the neighborhood in which it is built, even if the residences are at its very gates, than it could if it were placed on top of a high mountain miles away from habitation."

Amazing Case.

"Is there anything special in the case?" asked the reporter of the bank president whose cashier had stolen $17.

"Yes," mused the president, "you may say that we did not trust him implicitly."

DISAPPEARED

Coffee Ails Vanish Before Postum.

It seems almost too good to be true, the way headache, nervousness, insomnia, and many other obscure troubles vanish when coffee is dismissed and Postum used as the regular table beverage.

The reason is clear. Coffee contains a poisonous drug—caffeine—which causes the trouble, but Postum contains only the food elements in choice hard wheat with a little molasses.

A Phila. man grew enthusiastic and wrote as follows:

"Until 18 months ago I used coffee regularly every day and suffered from headache, bitter taste in my mouth, and indigestion; was gloomy and irritable, had variable or absent appetite, loss of flesh, depressed in spirits, etc.

"I attribute these things to coffee, because since I quit it and have drank Postum I feel better than I had for 20 years, am less susceptible to cold, have gained 20 lbs. and the symptoms have disappeared—vanished before Postum."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Postum comes in two forms:

Regular Postum—must be well boiled. 15c and 25c packages.

Instant Postum—is a soluble powder. A teaspoonful dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. 30c and 50c tins.

The cost per cup of both kinds is about the same.

"There's a Reason" for Postum.

CASE OF BULLYING

By FRANK FILSON.

John Barrett and Frank Rogers were of much the same height and build, but when they were at school together Rogers was shooting up into a man while Barrett was still a boy. That enabled Rogers to bully Barrett to his heart's content.

"You coward!" the little boy would scream, as the big one pounded him. "I'll get even with you some day."

"Coward?" repeated Rogers in surprise. "Why, I'm not a coward, Johnny. I'm just bullying you."

"A bully is always a coward," answered the other, dodging away. But, though he had heard the old adage, Rogers did not believe it. He continued to bully Barrett until the latter grew tall. Then he stopped.

When Barrett was as big as Rogers he was the stronger. He could have taken his revenge then. But he had already forgotten—or, if he had not forgotten, he kept his resolution to himself. Barrett was a slow, easy-going fellow, and Rogers a more popular fellow at college. Their paths seldom crossed, except on the athletic field.

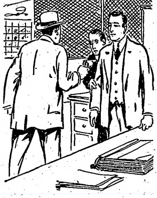
In one of the test games, the result of which was to be the selection of either Rogers or Barrett for the team, Rogers bullied Barrett again. Barrett had injured a tendon of his knee. It was nearly well now and not likely to interfere with his play, unless he received a kick there. Rogers knew about that and, in the scrimmage, he gave Barrett a kick which totally disabled him.

"Sorry, old man," said Rogers, as Barrett lay gasping on the ground. "I didn't mean to hurt you."

"You did, you liar," answered Barrett, "and I'll get even with you for that some day, don't you forget it."

But Rogers, who was elected to the team, speedily forgot. And Barrett, if he didn't forget, apparently bore no malice, though he never played football again and walked with a slight limp ever after. By the time they went into the Kingsley bank together they were apparently the best of friends again.

That is, so far as two such dissimilar characters could be friends. Rogers belonged to a sporting set. He was promoted above Barrett, because he had an "air" about him. He was assistant paying teller, while Barrett was only a clerk. Gifford Kingsley, who owned the bank, had had a failure with a big land company recently and there was a good deal of reorganizing work to be done in connection with the concern. Barrett, as general utility man, divided his time between the defunct land company and the bank.



"I'm Not Mr. Kingsley," Babbled Rogers.

Both Barrett and Rogers had known Ruth Kingsley at college, where they were contemporary with her brother. That was how they got their positions. They called regularly at the fine old house on Madison avenue. Of course it was Rogers who won the girl's love. She had half pledged herself to Barrett, and it was perhaps the love of conquest, which is the bullying instinct to the nth power, that impelled Rogers to cut out his rival.

"I'm sorry, Johnny," said Miss Ruth—everybody called Barrett "Johnny"—"but I find I was mistaken. I don't love you, but I will always be your friend."

"All right," said Johnny, miserably. He did not cease going to the house, even after Rogers' engagement was privately made known. If in his heart he resolved to get even with the bully, nobody guessed his resolution, not even Rogers himself.

"I'm sorry I had to cut you out, old man," said Rogers, "but I just had to. She's a stunner, is Miss Ruth."

Barrett walked out of the room. He did not want to hear Miss Ruth discussed by Rogers.

There had been a good many cases of impoverishment connected with the failure of the land company, and at one time Mr. Kingsley had received threats from various sources. The anonymous letters had ceased, and he no longer guarded himself with a private detective; consequently the thing that occurred at three o'clock on a certain afternoon was quite unexpected.

The bank was just closing; inside, Rogers had stepped out of the teller's cage, and then stepped back as a ragged looking man drew near.

"After closing time," he said. "Tomorrow."

He stood at the door of the cage, and the ragged man, opening the wicket which led to the ladies' table, walked up toward the back door of the cage.

"You've had my money and my wife's life, you dogs!" he roared, "and I'm going to have your life. You're Mr. Kingsley. I know you."

The man was evidently a maniac, or he would have understood the difference between the president and an assistant teller. Barrett, who was working at a desk near by, raised his head; then, seeing the revolver which the fellow was flourishing, he sprang in front of Rogers.

"I'm not Mr. Kingsley," babbled Rogers, cowering behind Barrett as the man raised his weapon.

"I am," said Barrett, advancing with a smile.

"Yes," screamed Rogers, thrusting Barrett forward up to the revolver barrel.

There was a report, a coil of smoke and Barrett was lying upon the floor, blood pouring from his shoulder. The whole affair had been the work of an instant, and in an instant more the madman was seized and disarmed.

A woman rushed forward and kneeled at Barrett's side. It was Ruth Kingsley, who, having come to the bank to cash a check, had seen the whole performance.

Her tears fell on the face of the wounded man, and with her little handkerchief she attempted to stanch the blood from his wound.

"It's only my shoulder, Ruth," whispered Barrett, beginning to grow pale.

Rogers had come forward, trembling, and endeavored to assist. But the girl forced him back.

"Don't you dare to lay your hands upon Johnny Barrett," she cried indignantly. "I saw all that happened. You pushed him forward into the muzzle of the revolver. Yes, and you said that he was father."

"That's right, Miss Ruth!" exclaimed Tommy, the office boy. "I saw him—and I'll swear to it when the case comes up in court."

Barrett raised his hand deprecatingly, but Rogers had seized his hat and was already slinking away. The passage to the door of the bank, under the scornful eyes of the employes, seemed an endless one. When he reached the door he began to run. Evidenly he ran a good distance, because he was never seen in the city again.

"Johnny—Johnny!" whispered Miss Ruth. And, in the presence of everyone, she kissed him.

That was how Johnny Barrett got even, and incidentally proved the truth of the adage.

SMILES ARE RARE IN LONDON

Of Pedestrian Thousands, by Actual Count, Only Eleven Show Other Than Sad Faces.

There is more than a little truth in the criticism by A. C. Carmichael, the Australian politician, visiting England for the first time, that the Londoner's face is sad.

To any one studying the aspect of Londoners the prevalent type is one of extreme seriousness. It is a feature which Londoners themselves—probably because of custom—do not observe; but it is quite possible that strangers are struck by the severe looks abundant in the streets, as was Mr. Carmichael. An hour's perambulation through thoroughfares as different as the Strand, Aldersgate street, and Ludgate Hill yielded an infinitesimal percentage of bright physiognomies. And most of the people who smiled—they were 11 in number—belonged to the poorer classes—newspaper sellers, dingy men and women who in this matter appeared richer than the better dressed middle-class folk. For the most part there is a set expression to be seen on the faces of hundreds and thousands, both young and old, which might be described as the London scowl. Its points are: A frown tracing deep, vertical line between the eyebrows; puckered eyes; moody glance; mouth drawn in tight line, drooping at corners.

Of the 11 people who were seen to smile or laugh three were women (one a costermonger), two girls (by coincidence both were in bright yellow dresses), five men (two stock exchange men and the others newsvendors), and one boy. And the boy's smile was more mischievous than pleasant, because he was tormenting a horse by flicking its nose with a dirty handkerchief.

Sunday Labor.

Does playing an organ and leading a choir in church on Sunday violate the Sunday laws?

Baltimore has been agitating the question and a conscientious alderman has introduced in the city council an ordinance to legalize such industry—happily oblivious of the fact that city ordinances do not go far in modifying state laws.

The city solicitor, however, holds that organists and choirmasters, though working for pay, are not violating the law. "From the time when David wrote his beautiful psalm for the temple service and commanded to 'praise the Lord upon an instrument of ten strings, and upon the psaltery, upon the harp with a solemn sound,' all through the ages and down to the present day," he says, "singing and playing on instruments have been considered a part of divine worship."—Living Church.

Human Documents of Married Life

By Virginia T. Van de Water

Intimate and Human, Intensely Alive, Each Story Presenting a Problem Which Might Occur to Any One of Us at Any Time

WHY I LEFT HOME

I WAS an only child. This in itself would seem to be a sufficient reason for a daughter to live at home. In my case it was not.

My mother was a sweet-faced, soft-spoken woman. One of my earliest recollections is of watching her making my dainty clothes, for she was deft with her fingers.

I fancy I had a happy childhood, as childhoods go. There is a popular fiction that the happiest time of one's life is when one is so young that one is absolutely under the control of one's "governors, teachers, pastors and masters." Perhaps it is, but as a small girl I longed often to have my own way. I told my father this once when I was but ten years of age. He smiled whimsically and patted my head.

"Ah, little girl," he expostulated, "how foolish you are! Here is your dad wishing that he need never decide what is right and what is wrong for himself, but that there was some one in whom he had perfect confidence who would say to him 'you must do this,' or 'you must not do that.'"

I was fond of novel-reading, but read only such books as my parents approved. I have wondered often since how it happened that I was in such complete subjection to my father and mother. I know that there were at school girls who read what they pleased, but when I left home my mother had asked me to peruse only such books as she, my father, or the school principal recommended. I promised and kept the promise. My roommate was a singularly sweet, pure-minded girl, and I cared for no other intimates, although I was on pleasant terms with many of the other scholars. But I think all of them thought me too prim and particular to be much fun. So when I returned to my home at the end of my school career my fastidious mother and my anxious father found me as childlike and unsophisticated as when they had sent me from them. They had decided that I was not to go to college. I knew there had been a little discussion about this matter, but my father had very strong convictions along these lines. He wanted his daughter to be "all womanly," and had a contempt, founded more upon prejudice than upon knowledge, of the typical college woman. While my mother's views did not coincide in every particular with his, she was so anxious to keep me with her that she readily accepted his decision against college. She needed me, she said. She had been "so lonely" since I left and wanted me for her "very own friend and companion now and always."

She told me this the night after I returned to the little home and the pretty room that had been "done over" for me.

"So many of the girls I know are going to 'do things' of some kind," I informed her. "Mother, dear, is there any special line of work you want me to take up? Do you want me to have some way of earning my living?"

"No!" she said impulsively. "What I want is to have you to myself as long as I live, at least," she added, "until you marry. And perhaps you may not do that. Even then I would want you to live near me. I have sacrificed myself, and my own wishes, for the sake of having you educated, and I feel that I have the right to enjoy you now."

"But," I hesitated as I asked the question, "suppose that the time should come when I had to support myself—what could I do then?"

"It won't come, I hope," she insisted. "And if it did—why, you write a beautiful hand. You can be a secretary—or something!"

Several years later I remembered that speech.

The following evening my father and I had a long talk as we sat together on the veranda. Mother had a headache and had gone to her room early, insisting, however, that I help her undress and see her comfortably in bed before joining my father where he sat alone, smoking.

"What have you been doing?" he asked as I came out softly upon the veranda after leaving my mother in a peaceful sleep, soothed thereto by my gentle stroking of her aching head. When I told him he drew me down to a chair beside him.

"Poor little girl," he said banteringly, "you are already getting broken into work, aren't you?"

"Work!" I exclaimed, almost indignantly. "I don't call it work to make poor, dear mother comfortable when she is ill."

"It may get monotonous after a while," he remarked dryly. And then he sighed. I asked no questions, but again in my heart was the old familiar ache for him and for my mother and the old puzzling question as to which I should sympathize with.

Soon our talk drifted to my school days, and, tentatively, I said to him just what I had said to my mother the evening before about my acquiring some way of earning a living. What did he think of it?

He smoked for several minutes before he answered. Then he spoke slowly. "Well, daughter dear, I hope that I will be able to support you as long as I live, and when I die leave you enough insurance to keep the wolf from the door."

"That's what mother thinks," I explained, "but how can you know what may happen? Mother says that all she wants me to do is to live at home and be company for her, and, while that sounds lovely for me, I do feel that one never knows when one may have to support herself."

"So your mother said that, did she?" he mused. Then, as if to himself: "That would be about all she would want, I suppose. And yet, it sounds a bit selfish."

I hastened to vindicate my mother. "Indeed, Daddy, she is not selfish! She only meant that she loves me so much."

"There are many kinds of love, and some kinds are selfish," he insisted gravely.

"And you are willing to have me live right on here, unless, of course, something happens?"

"I suppose that 'something' means your getting married," he remarked, somewhat gruffly. "If I have my way that so-called happy event will not occur for many years yet. On this point at least your mother and I agree. I do not believe she will ever want you to marry, even when you are old enough, which you are not yet, thank heaven!"

An inexplicable impulse emboldened me to ask, "Why doesn't mother want me to marry some time?"

"Because she does not consider marriage a success," he declared; then, as an afterthought, he said, "at least most marriages."

"Hers is an exception," I suggested timidly.

My father made no reply, but he pressed suddenly the hand he held, and I had difficulty in repressing an exclamation of pain. Then he changed the subject, and talked of indifferent matters until, as the clock struck ten, my mother's pleading voice called:

"Bessie! Where are you? Won't you get me a drink of water, dear?"

I rose at once, but not so quickly that I did not hear my father's impatient sigh.

"I am sorry you have to go," he said ruefully. "I find it pleasant to sit here and chat with you, Elizabeth."

"I kissed him affectionately.

"Thank you for calling me Elizabeth, Daddy!" I said softly. "At school everybody called me that, but I just can't get mother to do it."

"One 'just can't get' your mother to do anything she is not in the habit of doing," replied my father.

I hurried away upstairs, wishing that he had not spoken that last sentence. Somehow it almost spoiled my memory of our evening together.

My mother had never been very strong, but after my home-coming she succumbed more often than of old to her sick headaches and nervous attacks. Therefore almost all of the housekeeping tasks devolved upon me. My father used to say that it was too bad that this was the case, but that, nevertheless, he believed it was a good thing for a girl to know how to manage a household, and I voiced no complaint. I soon saw, however, that he did not fancy my taking the part of a sick-nurse. In fact, he protested vigorously against it within a few months after my return from school. It was a glorious October day, and when he came home from business he found me in my mother's room, reading to her. After asking about her head, and regretting that she was "sick again," he turned to me.

"Have you been out today, daughter?" he asked.

"No, sir."

"Why not?"

"I did not want to leave mother alone when she was suffering," I explained. To me the reason seemed all-sufficient. But his face darkened.

"Alone!" he exclaimed. "Isn't Nora downstairs?"

"My mother interposed. "Yes, Tom, of course she is; but downstairs isn't up here. And what good is a servant when one is ill?"

"Just as much good as she has been for the five years that she has lived with us," declared my father. "When Elizabeth was away you managed to survive comfortably with Nora's ministrations. Now this child is always doing duty as a sick-nurse. It is not fair."

I interrupted him with: "Daddy! That is not fair! I love to be with mother, and would stay even if she insisted on my going out."

My mother closed her eyes and lay very still for a moment. Then she put her hand to her head and moaned.

"Is the pain so bad?" I queried anxiously.

"Awful!" she whispered." This kind of thing is killing me. If it wasn't for you I would want to die."

I knelt by her and put my arms around her. "Can I do anything for you before I go downstairs?" I asked her gently.

"Oh, no! I don't wish to detain you from your father for a moment. I know you want to get down to him and that he will be waiting for you. I am used to being alone."

I hesitated. "Dear," I pleaded, "you know that I will not leave you if you are lonely and suffering. I will wait for my dinner until you feel better."

But she shook her head. "No, child, go down. It will only make it harder for me if you don't. But do not send me up anything to eat until you have finished. Then bring it up to me yourself. And if your father goes out tonight will you mind sitting up here with me? I shall be lonely."

"I will come up whether he goes out or not," I said.

I had told my mother that I had been invited to spend the evening with Mary Lane, a girl friend living near us, but she had evidently forgotten the fact. I would not remind her of it.

Nevertheless, being young, I was disappointed. I had anticipated a jolly evening, for half a dozen girls and young men had been asked to Mary's house, and her parents always made her friends welcome. I did not entertain, for my mother was made nervous by the thought of company, and my father, being a mere man, did not appreciate how much girls like good times in their own homes. But he did want me to have simple pleasures and, strangely enough, recollected just as we finished dinner that I had "said something about some affair for tonight." I hastened to state that unless mother was better I would not leave her. I tried to speak as if it made no difference, but he must have fancied a wistful note in my voice, for he said quickly:

"You must go, Elizabeth. I shall be at home all the evening, and will listen for your mother." He glanced at his watch. "What time are you due at Mrs. Lane's?"

"At half-past eight."

"Well, run away and dress at once," he commanded.

"But mother's dinner—" I began.

"Norah will attend to that," he said.

"She doesn't want Norah to take it up, daddy," I expostulated. "I told her I would do it."

"And I tell you you will not," he said firmly. "It is time this nonsense stopped."

I looked at him, startled.

"I mean," he explained, "that when a servant and a husband are on hand to fetch and carry there is no need of you sacrificing yourself both day and night. And while I am here you shall not do it. I will carry your mother's dinner to her."

Although the evening at Mary Lane's was pleasant, the memory of what had gone before it lurked in the depths of my consciousness all the while. My father came for me at the time appointed to take me home. When I inquired how my mother was he replied briefly that she was asleep, and I asked no more questions. But as he kissed me good night at the door of my room he drew me to him in a sudden embrace.

"Dear little girl," he said, "but for you I should be very lonely!"

The words were those used by my mother that afternoon. They repeated themselves to me until I fell asleep.

I went out little that year and the next. I found that my mother really needed me; at least, that she was cheerful when I remained with her, but that, when I had been out of the house for a few hours, she was sure to be depressed, and that her depression almost invariably culminated in a sick headache. But I also learned that my father had little patience with this depression, and, to keep the peace, I pretended to him that society bored me, and that I did not care for teas, receptions, and the like.

Sometimes when my mother would speak slightingly of my father I tried to call her attention to his many good characteristics, but I was always met by a frigid silence or the remark: "You are but a girl. How should you know what men are?"

Thus matters stood for eighteen months after my graduation. On my second Christmas as a home-daughter there occurred a scene which made upon my mind and feelings a lasting impression. My father had learned from Mary Lane that she was again planning for an evening of merriment at her home, and he insisted on my attending the festivities. This he did in my mother's presence a few days before Christmas, adding that as he had an engagement himself that night, he would stop and bring me home on his return. My mother compressed her lips, but said nothing. I had an intuition that she was awaiting developments, and I felt vaguely uncomfortable. Then the matter passed from my mind, until at supper on Christmas evening she said to my father, as if to test him:

"Have you a very important engagement tonight?"

He started slightly. "Only a call I am going to make," he said.

"Upon whom?" she asked.

He met her gaze as directly as she met his. "On Mrs. Framingham," he answered.

"I was sure of that," she asserted coldly.

"Then why did you ask?" inquired my father, with a sarcastic smile.

"Because I could hardly believe what my woman's instinct warned me was true," replied my mother.

I looked from one to the other, puzzled. I knew Mrs. Framingham, a graceful, attractive widow, at least forty-five years old, who had often called at our house and whose husband, dead now for two years, had been my father's friend. What more natural, I thought, than that my father should run in to see her in her loneliness on this holiday night? Father evidently thought as I did, and said as much.

"No explanations are necessary," affirmed my mother, "at least," she added, with a glance at me, "where your young and innocent daughter is."

My father sprang to his feet. His face was pale and his eyes as hard as steel.

"Since you have made that speech," he declared, "where your 'young and innocent daughter' is, you will please explain it to her."

"I decline to do anything of the kind," said my mother. "When she is older she will understand only too well, I fear, what life and men are. Until then, if she can love you I will let her do so."

A wave of angry contempt swept over me. I looked from one to the other as if I had never really known either before. Yet, in the turmoil of emotions that possessed me, I found it within me to see the justice of my father's stand. My mother, not he, had started the discussion in my presence. I pushed my chair back from the table with a brief, "Excuse me!" and started to leave the room. My mother stopped me.

"Stay where you are!" she commanded. "You always champion your father just because I have never told you my side of any trouble between us. Now, since your father seems not to object to your knowing the truth, you may see for yourself how things stand."

"I do not care to see or hear either side," I insisted, frightened at my own temerity.

"You are right, Elizabeth," said my father gravely. "As your mother has just said, you will know life soon enough without being dragged into painful scenes in which you have no concern. You may leave the room now if you want to."

But, as I passed my mother's chair she held out her arms to me with a moan: "Oh, Bessie, Bessie! my only comfort, don't go like this! It will kill me if you, too, turn against me!"

I threw my arms about her and began to cry.

When I lifted my head from her shoulder my father's chair was empty. He had quietly left the room. I know that he did not make the proposed call that evening for, an hour later, when I went downstairs to telephone to Mary Lane that my mother was too far from well for me to go out, I saw under his door a streak of light, and heard him walking up and down for a long time afterward. All that evening I sat by my mother's couch, stroking her aching head, and letting her talk out her griefs. I entered her room a girl, simple hearted and trustful; I came out of it at bedtime a puzzled, distrustful, disappointed woman. And it was my own mother who had wrought this change in me, for she had told me that my father cared more for another woman than for her or for me. She spoke of "love passages" between him and Mrs. Framingham. At first I was too sick at heart to ask any questions. Then my better self asserted its rights to learn what evidence she had against the man who had been a tender father to me, and I asked:

"How do you know these things? What proofs have you?"

"I am no fool," she retorted, "and I have kept my eyes open, and have watched, as any wife should do if she would keep her husband's love."

In the dark I smiled bitterly. Is this the way women keep love? I wondered.

"But, mother," I pleaded, "suspicions are not proof."

My mother laughed sarcastically. "It is my fault, I suppose, that you are so unsophisticated. It is because of my mistaken loyalty to your father that I have held my peace and kept you in ignorance. Now it is your right to know the truth."

"Why?" I queried again.

"So that you may appreciate just what kind of a man he is," she declared, with such absolute lack of logic that I asked no more. Then she went on to say that since I would not believe what she told me I might watch developments myself, if I could not take the word of my own mother. But she had never thought that her "own child would take sides against her."

As usual, weak fear gripped me at the thought of displeasing her. I told her that I did not mean to wound her, that I "only wanted to be just."

"I should think you might trust me in this matter," she complained. "After all I have borne for you, after all I have done for you and sacrificed for you from babyhood, my word ought to go for something!"

I felt conscience-smitten. Peace lay in accepting her statements, and under the stress of her reproaches and tears I found myself yielding weakly and assuring her that I was sorry that I had seemed lacking in sympathy, and that I would "do anything to make her happy—anything!"

Little by little I quieted her, but I did not leave her until after the clock had struck twelve and she had sunk into a deep sleep. Then I stole away to my own room and lay awake through the remainder of the night.

The next morning, after breakfast, to which my mother did not descend, my father told me that he wished to see me alone in the library. He said, as he closed the door behind us, that he did not wish to drag me into any discussions between himself and my mother. "The man who tells anybody, even his own daughter, of his quarrels with his wife is a bounder and cad," he stated. "Moreover, I love you too much to wish to make you unhappy by touching upon any question of which you have not already heard enough to make you uncomfortable. But, child, all I ask is that you will trust me until you see reason for distrust."

I could hold my peace no longer. "But, father, mother is so unhappy! Forgive me, but why do you do the things she hates to have you do?"

"Such as what?" he asked gently.

I stammered and flushed. "I hardly know what some of them are," I admitted confusedly. "But I do know that mother does not like you to go to see Mrs. Framingham."

"Why?"

The question staggered me. I did not know just why, and I spoke timidly. "Well, I think she feels that you belong to her, that you are married to her, and that you should give all your time to her."

"She would be bored to death if I did," he rejoined.

I shook my head sadly. I was puzzled and miserable, and went out of the room without further comment.

This condition of affairs at home decided me to accept an alluring invitation received the following day. A girl whom I had known at boarding school had married a wealthy man and had a handsome home in New York. We lived in a suburban town an hour from the metropolis. Edith Warren wrote asking me to spend several days with her, and although, when at school, she and I had had few tastes in common, I gladly embraced the opportunity of getting away from home and its problems.

As I have said before, my mother was fond of providing pretty clothes for me, and had always taken a certain pride in my appearance. So, while my wardrobe was not elaborate, it was dainty, and I had no need to be ashamed of my costumes in the midst of the more elegantly gowned company in which I found myself at the Warrens'. I recognized at once the fact that what my hostess called "the crowd" that frequented her home were what might be termed a rich Bohemian set—not the refined kind of persons whom I had met in the limited circle chosen for me by my parents. Perhaps because I was unhappy I did not object to the unconventional manners of these people. They made me laugh, they gave me a good time—that was all I cared about. I met one man who encouraged me to talk freely to him when we were alone together. Gradually he learned that I was not content at home, although I did not tell him why. I acknowledged to him that of late I had been longing to be independent, to earn my own living, to come and go freely, as did many women. He listened with sympathy, then asked me what I could do. I told him that all I was fitted for was to be some sort of a secretary. He suggested that he needed in his office a person who could write well. Perhaps if, later, I wanted this position I would let him know. I was half frightened at the offer, but promised to remember it. The salary he mentioned took away my breath, but I tried not to look astonished. I knew nothing of the remuneration received by secretaries without experience, so I expressed no surprise.

On the last night of my visit to New York we all went to the play. The piece was a rollicking musical comedy, and I enjoyed it thoroughly. But as we were leaving the theater, and I was laughing at some witty remark of my escort, the laugh suddenly died on my lips. In the crowd surging out of the doors in front of us I saw my father and with him, chatting gaily, was Mrs. Framingham. Even as I watched I saw father hail a passing cab and help Mrs. Framingham into it, then get in himself. I was near enough to hear him name the restaurant to which he wished to be driven; I heard him call out, "Hurry, for we have a train to make at twelve-thirty!"

My mother was excitedly glad to see me back, but she listened to my account of my visit with what I saw was but half-hearted interest. As I sat in my usual place by her couch —for she had another headache—I wondered if she suspected that my father had taken another woman to the theater and to supper, and had not reached home until the early morning hours, while she lay there suffering with nervousness and, perhaps, wondering where he was. I could not forgive my father this deception. Why did people marry, anyhow?

I had forgotten thus far in my musings when my mother's sharp tone startled me from my seeming calmness.

"I have the proof that you asked for the other night," she said suddenly. "I can show you now what your father is."

She drew from the pocket of her wrapper a letter addressed to my father. Pulling it from the envelope that held it, she read it to me so rapidly that she was half-way through it before I attempted to check her. Then my protest was in vain, for, with a sharp "Be quiet!" she continued. The letter was signed "Ida." I knew that was Mrs. Framingham's first name, but I did not know anyone except the members of her family called her that—least of all my father. It began "Dear Tom," and said that "the suggested plan" suited her perfectly, that she would be ready at the time he named, and added, "You are too good to, Yours gratefully, Ida."

"You see," exclaimed my mother triumphantly, "what kind of a man he is! Now will you defend him?"

"Did he show you that letter?" I asked, perplexed.

She looked at me with amazement. "Show it to me, child? He, a guilty man, show his wife a letter like that? Never!"

I rose to my feet and stood looking at her. "Then," I asked slowly "where did you get it?"

Her eyes did not fall before my questioning gaze. Her habit of self-justification kept her from any sensation of shame.

"The postman handed it to me several days ago. Norah was out, and I went into the kitchen and steamed the envelope over the teakettle, read the letter, then, while the mucilage was still damp, sealed it again, putting it under a book to press it tight shut. I took it out just before your father came home. I handed it to him, and he did not have the grace to blush. Afterward I looked in the pocket of the coat he wore that day and got it out to show to you."

I still stood looking at her. She held out her hand to me.

"You look sick, darling!" she exclaimed. "No wonder you do, confronted with such proof as that against the father you have loved!"

I wet my dry lips with my tongue before I could speak. My voice sounded harsh and lifeless. I did not take a step toward my mother.

"The proof against my father is not all that hurts me," I said. "To think that you, his wife and my mother, should steal his mail, open it, read it, give it to him in an innocent way, then steal it again to prove to me that he is as bad as you paint him—oh, I cannot stand it!"

With a groan, I buried my face in my hands. At this moment the door opened and my father entered. He stopped short at sight of me, and his eyes fell upon the letter lying on the floor between my mother and myself. Darting forward, he snatched it up.

"Where did this come from?" he asked quickly. Then, as no one answered, he turned sharply to his wife. "You stole this, did you?" he sneered.

"I took it to show your daughter just what you are," my mother said sullenly. "The time has come for her to choose between us."

My father glanced at the letter, then thrust it into his pocket. He laid his hand on my arm.

"Child," he said, "there is nothing evil in that letter. I asked a woman friend to go out with me. She accepted, and we went. That is all there is to it. I swear it before Heaven!" He caught my hands in his and drew them from my face.

"I saw you with her," I said dully.

"Where?" exclaimed my mother, starting to her feet. "Tell me where you saw him? Where did he take that woman?"

She sprang at me and shook me as she used to do when I was a little child four years old. Her face was transfigured with rage, her eyes blazed. My father laid his hand on her arm, but she jerked away from him.

"I will have the truth!" she shrilled. "You despise me because I read your father's letter, and yet you aid and abet him in all his evil! Oh, God! And this is the child that I loved!"

I tried to calm her. "Mother!" I expostulated. "Be reasonable! Listen to me! I knew nothing of where father was going, except that I saw him the other day on the street in New York."

I checked myself. Already she was making me lie. What had become of my sense of honor, of my clear ideas of right and wrong? I caught my father's eye and was silent. My mother turned to him.

"Aren't you ashamed of yourself!" she gasped. "But of course you aren't! Not satisfied with ruining my happiness, you hide behind this child's skirts! Now is the chance to tell me the truth, if you ever do tell it. How far has this thing gone?"

"What thing?" he asked, as if to gain time.

"This affair between you and—that woman!" she sneered. "What does that note mean?"

"That she and I are good friends," he said coldly, without any spark of excitement. "That she had a legal matter to attend to in New York, and that I offered to take her to the office of a lawyer who could fix it up for her."

"I wonder if that is true," my mother muttered, looking from my father to me.

"Believe it or not as you please," said he, turning away.

I stood silent until he reached the door. In the moment since he had finished speaking I had made up my mind.

"Father and mother," I said, "I think it is as well to tell you now that I have accepted a position as secretary in New York. I am twenty-one, you know, and old enough to be caring for myself. And I want to leave home."

My mother died five years ago. She never knew the truth of that first fearful year in New York, nor guessed that the man who engaged me as secretary was as bad as he was attractive. I acquired my knowledge of life and evil from personal experience when I was a woman grown. After my mother's death my father came to live with me in my tiny apartment, the rent of which I paid from my salary as social secretary to a wealthy society woman who had been kind to me. When those first hideous experiences were dead and buried, and were only a sickening memory, I told my father a part of the pitiful story. He could not understand how such dreadful things could happen to a girl who had been "so carefully brought up."

Eviction of Cockroaches Is This Man's Specialty

ST. PAUL, MINN.—The pronounced unpopularity of cockroaches in restaurant kitchens has given rise to a strange business, of which Charles Geraint, 9 West Delos street, is the chief exponent in St. Paul. Geraint guarantees complete immunity from cockroaches at a certain fixed rate for the month or the year.

Nothing worse could happen, restaurant-keepers say, than the finding by a customer of a cockroach in his apple pie.

Three hundred young cockroaches at a setting is nothing unusual and a box of breakfast food is one of the most select places for a nest.

When Mr. and Mrs. Cockroach smell the wonderful powder that Geraint uses they telephone for a moving van; pick up all their family, and as much breakfast food, flour and custard pie as they can carry and then leave for the South. Sometimes the mere sight of Mr. Geraint is enough to start a pilgrimage.

Geraint does not pretend to have any influence with mosquitoes, potato bugs, beetles or gnats. One day a customer who had taken out a guarantee contract lebeled "no cockroaches," summoned Geraint, pointed to a swarm of ants crawling over the pantry shelf in the kitchen of the big hotel and looked reproachfully at the cockroach slayer. The ants paid no attention whatever, but kept on sugarward. The hotel man demanded the instant dismissal of the ants or his money back.

"Nothing doing," the cockroach specialist said. "They ain't mine. I don't know of anything that will fix 'em."

For nineteen long years, Geraint has had the cockroaches on the run. He says that cockroaches are distributed about the city on vegetables, in breakfast food boxes, in groceries and in beer and egg cases.

Barber Wants to Know Just Where He Comes In

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.—Rudy Maurath runs a barber shop at the point of Washington street and Kentucky avenue. The other day Rudy called in a plumber to doctor some looseness. The plumber droned along for about three hours at 75 cents an hour. Toward the close of his stay he decided to rest and get shaved.

PLUMBING
#262

"Guess I'll get shaved," he said, at the same time climbing into Rudy's chair. "Red men meet tonight and I've got to look pretty."

Rudy gave him a good shave, bordered with a lot of hot towels, plenty of face lotion and talcum. It must have taken half an hour to get the plumber properly beautified.

The next day Rudy got the plumber's bill. It included the half-hour he had occupied in shaving the pipe doctor. Rudy was shocked, mazed, stupefied!

"Get this," he said to his barbers and the customers. "Get this! I shaved the plumber on his time and he charges 75 cents an hour for it. It took me half an hour to fix him up to go to lodge. I charged him 15 cents for the shave. Now he comes back at me wanting 37½ cents for the time he was in my chair. Say, tell me, where does a poor, honest, home-loving, good Christian barber come in when he's monkeying with a plumber?"

Steady Sausage Diet Wrecked Victim's Nerves

CHICAGO.—Linked sausage, long drawn out, served for breakfast, dinner, supper and between meals, drove Charles Jensen from his home at 3629 Harper avenue. It got on his nerves.

Liverwurst, German sausage, schnapps and bologna is poor diet for a steamfitter who earns $35 a week and wants steak once in a while. It's bad for the nerves.

Charles told Municipal Judge Torrison in the court of domestic relations the other day that he had run away from a sausage, his wife and six children.

"She gave me bologna for breakfast, liverwurst for dinner and German sausage for supper," he said. "Once in a while she changed the diet with frankfurters and schnapps. I want steak once in a while."

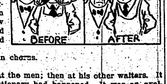
"It isn't sausage. It's another woman," declared Mrs. Jensen. "He ran away from me four months ago and went to another woman somewhere on the Pacific coast. He liked sausage all right until he got 'moony' over the other woman. Sausage may not be good for married men who love other women."

"Sausage or woman—it doesn't matter," said Judge Torrison. "It's just a plain case of nerves. You've looked at each other so long across plates of weinerwurst that you've got on each other's nerves. Cut out the sausage once in a while and you will get along all right. Better read a book on the control of the nerves."

Judge Torrison ordered Jensen to pay his wife $12 a week.

Joker Scares Whiskers From His 25 Employes

NEW YORK.—John T. Fay came home the other day. He keeps an oyster and chop house in One Hundred and Twenty-fifth street, and up to the time of his return had about thirty waiters and kitchen helpers in his place. But when the proprietor entered and looked about he knew something terrible had struck the place.



"John!" he called. "Jake! Jim!" They were his oldest men. Some had been in his service for twenty years and naturally the proprietor wished to give them a cheery greeting on his home-coming. Three men stood before him. He didn't know them. He took several looks, turned to his books for a few moments and once again called the men.

"Here we are," they answered in chorus.

Mr. Fay took a good look.

"What th' "—. He looked hard at the men; then at his other waiters. It was apparent that something revolutionary had happened. It was an avalanche of whiskers. The men led Mr. Fay back to the kitchen. There, in conspicuous place, was a sign reading:

"No one will be allowed to wear a mustache here in the summer."

Mr. Fay took another look. Not one of his faithful old employes had a mustache. When he started away for a few days' vacation they had all kinds of adornments. The joker had scared all the employes and within the last few days the barbers had shaved clean just twenty-five of the employes in the restaurant.

CAUSE OF THE WAR?

Is the "dare-devil of Servia" responsible for the present great war?

Is Prince George, eldest son of King Peter of Servia, instigator of assassination, challenger of war gods, the evil power behind the Balkan states?

Statesmen of Austria and other European countries declare that the royal rake, who is less than thirty years of age, is Servia's evil genius. To the deposed crown prince, they say, Servia can trace the cause of the calamities that have befallen it in the last dozen years, and that there'll never be peace in the Balkans until Servia rids itself of "the worst boy in Europe."

The prince earned his title, "the worst boy in Europe," when he was a youngster still in knickerbockers. Cutting off cats' tails was one of his boyish diversions.

He murdered men by the score, but Servian princes are not bound by law and he was never punished for his crimes; he horsewhipped a prime minister, he paid court to women of doubtful reputation.

His lawless life has been the scandal of Europe, but even his worst enemies never believed the carnival of crime would be brought to a climax with so shocking a catastrophe as the assassination of Archduke Francis Ferdinand. It's the charge that Prince George was an accomplice in this plot of assassination that brought Servia and Austria, and finally all Europe to war.

POLICY MUST BE CONSTRUCTIVE

That the salvation of Mexico will not come through the work of any of the so-called "patriots" who lead their tatterdemalion armies into battle is the opinion of Senor Emeterio de la Garza, one of Mexico's most distinguished lawyers, a member of the Mexican congress and son of a justice of the Mexican Supreme court, who was in New York city recently.

"Mexico's problem is economic and social, rather than political," he explained, "and, of course, can be solved. Land. Finance. They are the two magic words for Mexico.

"A constructive policy which not only will repair the ravages of war, but which will repair the still greater ravages that justly may be laid at the door of the sort of peace—the Diaz peace of the mailed hand, armed with a rifle—which preceded the present days of war must be put in operation before Mexico even can begin to see the light of hope.

"First in this policy must be something of the nature of a financial program, which will temporarily enable the country to transact its internal and foreign business after the anarchy which has come with the protracted war; but even such a policy, were it planned by the greatest genius that the world has ever known, would be certain to be ineffective unless it had as its foundation a reform of Mexico's land laws and the erection as a part of her future governmental plan of some system which not only will correct past evils, but which, by giving the peon—the Indian—population lands of their own, will take the men of Mexico from warfare and make farmers of them.

PRINCE IS TOO DOCILE

The prince of Wales has just completed two years as an undergraduate at Oxford university. Viewed impartially, the prince's career has been neither better nor worse than that of the average titled undergraduate. He has embarked on many of the "manly sports" of youth, and excelled in none. Perhaps the best comment on his good spirit and lack of "side" was the fact that he played consistently at association football with the Magdalen college second eleven.

For a time he was the despair of his equerry, Mr. Cadogan, who is an enthusiastic horsemaan, but as a concession to popular opinion, expressed and unexpressed, he has acquired some skill in the saddle, and with it some of the standing which falls only to hunting men at Oxford.

It is useless to make the prince out to be a rollicking, dashing specimen of a full-blooded young Englishman. Just as King George is not half so popular as was his sporting old father, the late King Edward, so is the prince of Wales even less calculated to appeal to the public imagination than his father.

He is far too docile—almost domesticated.

MOUNTS A SHAKY THRONE

Sultan Ahmed Mirza, the sixteen-year-old shah of Persia, on attaining his official majority the other day, took the constitutional oath of office in the palace of the national council at Teheran. The ceremony took place in the presence of the members of the national council, the royal princes, high state officials, foreign diplomatic representatives and their wives.

The little shah, accompanied by the regent, Abdul Kassim Khan Nesser El Mulk, drove to the palace of the national council in a glass coach drawn by eight white horses. Large bodies of police and troops were stationed in strategic positions along the route.

The Persia of today is only a shadow of the once powerful empire of ancient times. Ahmed Mirza, who succeeds his father on the throne, is a mere puppet in the hands of England and Russia, without any real power. Russia practically owns the northern half of the country, while England took the southern half, when the former shah was driven from the throne and kept a prisoner in Russia.

NATIONAL CAPITAL AFFAIRS

Croquet Revival Has Set In in the Capital City

WASHINGTON.—Croquet is a game that may "come back." Under the sponsorship of Senator Cummins of Iowa, Mrs. Champ Clark and other men and women of distinction in public life a croquet revival has set in in Washington. Croquet is a game so old that its origin is obscure. Like most of the games that men play, it was probably a derivative or revision of an older game—which was also the derivative of an older game, etc.—and which has itself undergone considerable alteration during its present general form. No doubt in the centuries to come it will undergo such changes of form and name that remote posterity may have to turn to antiquarian research to trace it to the game which is played today. There is a kinship between all games that are played with balls and sticks or balls and clubs, and their blood-lines run together at a time so deep in the depths of the past that no chronicles, intelligible to us, survive. There is a strong relationship between polo, croquet, billiards, bowles, cricket, hockey, tennis and baseball, and between these and other games which remain to us only as mere names if we could but securely and certainly trace that relationship.

Croquet in nearly its present form seems to have been introduced into England from Ireland in 1856, and it seems to have been introduced into Ireland from southern France in 1852. In that year it was played on the lawn of Lord Lonsdale, and the story runs that it was played there and then under the auspices of the eldest daughter of Sir Edmund Macnaghten, who had learned it during a residence in France.

Vice-President Marshall Hobnobs With Squirrels

THE fact that the Vice-President and Mrs. Marshall live in a hotel precludes any possibility of their introducing a dog or a kitten into the even tenor of their family life, although the vice-president takes the keenest personal interest in the dogs of his friends.

"I have to hobnob with the squirrels," he said, "and those over here in the park are highly indignant if I am slow about finding the peanuts or the popcorn which I always take to them."

The vice-president is a familiar figure in Lafayette square, where he is seen going in and out among the trees of the park, coaxing the squirrels to come down for a peanut, or sitting side by side with two or three upon a bench, making them beg for their supper, which they know is in his pockets.

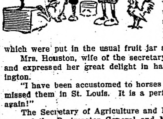
The secretary of state brought his favorite mount from Nebraska, and Rex is a member of the official household in Washington. Secretary Bryan has been in the saddle since he was a boy, and finds no diversion equal to that of a canter through Rock Creek park. When some one asked him if he had other animals that might rival Rex in his affections, he declared that there was no other animal with the same claim upon a man's affections as the horse.

Yet it is not unusual to hear "Bryan's lions" talked about.

The "Bryan lions" are made of stone and were brought from Japan. They are on either side of the entrance to Calumet place, and one lion has his mouth wide open, while the other's is tightly closed.

Some Pets Admired by Cabinet Members' Families

THE Secretary of the Treasury and Mrs. McAdoo have a handsome collie, and little Miss Sallie McAdoo has a small dog named Fifi which is the delight of her life and the avowed nuisance of the family.



The son of the Secretary and Mrs. Lane is the proud possessor of a splendid English bull named Jack, and the younger sons of the Secretary of the Navy and Mrs. Daniels have had all the animals and various kinds of pets that a family of boys accumulate, the most conspicuous of which were some chickens; most satisfactory was a nice, common snake, which served its day and generation and was finally skinned, and the ones longest remembered were some tadpoles, which were put in the usual fruit jar and neglected.

Mrs. Houston, wife of the secretary of agriculture, is devoted to horses, and expressed her great delight in having them when she came to Washington.

"I have been accustomed to horses all of my life," she said, "and greatly missed them in St. Louis. It is a perfect joy to drive around behind them again!"

The Secretary of Agriculture and Mrs. Houston were friends and neighbors of the Postmaster General and Mrs. Burleson when they all lived in Austin, Texas, and their devotion to horses is the same.

The Misses Burleson are both accomplished horsewomen.

Owls Visit Senate Chamber and White House

THERE was a visitor in the gallery of the senate not many days ago, who watched the proceedings from the reserved section, and yet who presented no card of admission. No one saw him enter, and no one was more astonished than the vigilant doorkeeper when he discovered his presence. Inasmuch as it would have created a great commotion to get him out, and because he was a perfectly quiet, well-behaved guest, and apparently deeply interested in the business before the senate, he was allowed to stay until adjournment.

If an owl ever before visited either of the legislative bodies of the United States, it is not recorded in history, so that the one who sat in the senate gallery the other day, blinking confidentially and wisely at the vice-president, established a precedent which other wise old owls may follow.

"And he didn't hoot at us once!" exclaimed one of the members of that distinguished body in mock surprise.

It is quite time for for the ornithologist to discover the fine, psychological reason that attracts owls to politics. No sooner had the excitement of the owl's presence in the senate subsided than another owl was detected in the act of breaking into the White House.

He was on the sill of one of the west windows of the private dining room, evidently puzzled to find it impossible to strut through the screen, although he tried it again and again after some one insisted on driving him away.

HALF DOZEN BATTLES ARE BEING SIMULTANEOUSLY FOUGHT IN BELGIUM

EUROPE'S DESTINY NOW TREMBLING IN THE BALANCE

AT LEAST 2,000,000 MEN LINKED IN DEATH GRAPPLE IN BELGIUM AT THE PRESENT TIME.

FIGHTING LINE EXTENDS FROM MONS TO LUXEMBURG

Hundred Miles of Battle Front Makes Great Struggle far Surpass Any Recorded in History—Million Germans Face to Face With Great Army of Allies.

London, Aug. 25.—Along 100 miles of fighting line at least 2,000,000 men are linked in a death grapple in the first pitched battle of the war.

The struggle is being waged from Mans on the southern edge of Belgium to the Luxemburg frontier.

The British expeditionary force has at last emerged into the open and is fighting at the side of the French. One million Germans of the kaiser's army are face to face with the allied troops and with cavalry charge and cannonade and hand to hand encounter of the infantry, the destiny of Europe is trembling in the balance.

No Details Emerge.

No details of how the issue of the strife goes are permitted to emerge from behind the curtain that envelopes the scene. It will be days and may be weeks before a decisive result has been attained and the world is permitted to know.

Half a dozen battles are simultaneously being fought, any one of which dwarfs Gettysburg or Waterloo by comparison.

At Mons, at Givet, along both banks of the river Meuse, down at Neuf Chateau and along toward Arlon the embattled powers are struggling with varying successes.

Bloody Battle at Luttre.

At Luttre, in Hainsult province where Mons is also located, a bloody battle is in progress. One would say it was the left wing of the allies army that is here engaged, since Luttre is but 10 miles from Mons to the northeast and but five miles distance from Charleroi.

Again between Charleroi and Namur another great struggle is going forward with the French on the offensive, it is declared, and meeting with success.

Bombardment at Namur.

All the while a tremendous bombardment of the Namur fort is under way, the roar of the siege guns shaking the earth beneath the feet of the millions battling for supremacy.

From Namur to Charleroi is another 15 miles. Along this line the contest rages to halt the German advance toward Dinant, but six miles from the French frontier.

Apparently the Germans, having diverted their original plans for the sally north into Brussels, have now suddenly returned to the original plan of campaign and are pouring southward in two main columns converging on Mons, where a union will be made with the German forces which have advanced through Luxemburg.

The German lines are said to extend from Tamise near Antwerp southwest through Puere and Zele, and thence southeast to Gosselies and Charleroi.

Trap Was Laid.

If the adove deduction is correct, it was at Charleroi later in the day that the junction was made with the troops which advanced through Luxemburg, thus completing the battle line from Mons to the Luxemburg frontier, which is now raging.

It will remain for the developments of the next few days to determine whether the trap which the allies claim to have laid for the Germans has been effective.

Paris Official Announcement.

Paris, Aug. 24.—The following official announcement was issued last night:

"A great battle is now in progress along a vast line extending from Mons to the frontier of Luxemburg. Our troops in conjunction with the British have assumed everywhere the offensive. We are faced by almost the whole German army, both active and reserve.

"The ground, especially on our right, is thickly wooded and difficult. The battle is likely to last several days.

Forts at Liege Intact.

"The forts at Liege still hold. Fort Chandefontaine has been the scene of an act of heroism which affirms once more the brilliant valor of the Belgian army."

London, Aug. 24.—A News agency dispatch from Rome says it has been officially announced at Nish that in a battle at Shabatza the Austrian force alone was estimated at 300,000. The Servians were victorious everywhere. They turned the Austrian left wing and the losses of the latter were fully 20,000, whole regiments being wiped out and thousands taken prisoners.

ONE OF GERMANY'S COMMANDERS

AGED AUSTRIAN RULER REPORTED TO BE DYING

Condition of Francis Joseph Such as to Cause Great Alarm in Kingdom.

London, Aug. 25.—A Rome dispatch to the Exchange Telegram company, reports that Emperor Francis Joseph is in a grave condition and may die at any moment.

Paris Gets Report.

Paris.—A dispatch received here from Rome quotes the Messagero of that city to the effect that Emperor Francis Joseph of Austria is dying.

A dispatch to the Havas Agency from Rome says the correspondent has learned from an authoritative source that the Prince of Wied has not left Durazzo, Albania, but that two of his sons have departed.

Japan to Confine Activity.

Washington, Aug. 25.—Viscount Chinda, the Japanese ambassador here, has formally notified the United States that Japan had declared war on Germany. The American government was immediately asked to care for Japan's interest in Germany. Assurances recently given by the British government to the United States that Japan's activity would be confined to the China seas and Eastern Asia were repeated by Viscount Chinda. The position of the United States has met with the approval of Japan.

Details of Ship's Sinking.

London, Aug. 24.—Official news from Paris gives further details of the encounter in the Adriatic about a week ago, which resulted in the loss of the Austrian battleship Zrinyi, a vessel of over 14,000 tons, and a crew of 357 men. The Zrinyi was truck by a shell from a French warship. This projectile exploded in the magazine and damaged the warship so badly that it foundered in a few minutes.

EUROPEAN WAR SITUATION.

The French and British troops are facing the greater part of the German army along a battle line which extends from Mons to the Luxemburg frontier. The allied armies, which have been concentrating at strategic points for the past two weeks, are believed to be strongly entrenched, with powerful forts to lend them support in holding back the invaders.

Reports are current that Emperor Francis Joseph is dying. These reports have been denied, but they are being reiterated.

Japan formelly declares war on Germany when no reply is received to her ultimatum at expiration of the time limit. The Tokio government, following an imperial rescript, orders the opening of hostilities at once on land and sea.

The kaiser orders the governor of Kiao-Chow to defend the German possession to the utmost. The governor declares that preparations are complete for the reception of the invaders.

Ostend is again frightened about the entry into the city of the Germans.

Refugees in Ostend from Brussels say it took seven hours for the German troops to pass through Brussels. They estimate there were 35,000. The Germans are moving toward France. Antwerp is, for the present at least, being neglected.

The Germans are leaving the administration of Brussels to the civil authorities.

An open rupture in diplomatic relations between Italy and Austria is hourly expected. Paris and Malta reports even predict that Italy will declare war on Austria within a few days. Italy has ordered her troops mobilized by Aug. 27.

It is said Greece is sending troops to the assistance of Servia.

While the Liege forts are said to be holding, a telegram from the French government tells of the blowing up of Fort Chaudefontaine by the Belgian commander, after it had been razed by the German guns.

The Servians are apparently driving out the Austrians.

Japan will confine activities to China seas and eastern Asia only.

Return of Kiao-Chow to China declared intention of the Japanese government.

Germans claimed to have checked Russian advance against the eastern frontier of the Fatherland.

Further accounts of the reported Servian victory over the Austrians say that in the fighting along the Drina river the Austrian casualties were between 20,000 and 25,000, while 10,000 prisoners were taken. The fighting lasted three days. The Servian artillery did effective work against the enemy. Nish declares officially that a part of the Servian army has invaded Bosnia and that another battle is expected soon.

Half a million Russians reported 20 miles within Germany. Teutons declared retreating before the advancing Cossacks.

A war tax of $40,000,000 is said to have been levied on the city of Brussels by the German commander.

German Vessel Clears U. S.

Philadelphia, Aug. 24.—Loaded to the limit with coal and food supplies, the North German Lloyd steamship Brandenburg is steaming away bound for Bergen, Norway, according to its clearance papers. The captain says the journey will require about two months. Despite the protests of the British ambassador in Washington, who declared that the Brandenburg is an auxiliary cruiser of the German navy, local customs authorities granted the clearance papers.

Americans Abroad Get Money.

Washington, Aug. 24.—Arrangements have been virtually completed by the national board of relief to transfer to Americans in England the total of all funds deposited to their credit at the state and treasury departments. Negotiations by cable led to an announcement that the Bank of England will make payments in gold to Americans with proper credentials and that these payments will be drawn against deposits made with its branch in Canada.

Supply and Demand Blamed.

New York, Aug. 22.—Local representatives of Chicago beef packers, who testified before Chief Magistrate McAdoo in District Attorney Whitman's John Doe inquiry into the higher cost of food since the war in Europe, placed the blame for advance in meat prices on conditions of supply and demand. They say there was a shortage of beef on the hoof and that competition was keener than at any previous time.

JAPAN DECLARES WAR; HOSTILITIES BEGIN AT ONCE

OPERATIONS BOTH ON LAND AND SEA ORDERED BY MIKADO FOLLOWING DIPLOMATIC BREAK.

KAISER ORDERS DEFENSE OF FAR EAST HOLDINGS

Austrian Warship Hastily Leaves Kiao-Chow, Indicating That Country Will Not Participate in New Entanglement—Tokio Citizens Fired by War Spirit.

Tokio, Aug. 25.—The emperor of Japan has declared war upon Germany. This action was taken at the expiration of the time limit of Japan's ultimatum to Germany demanding the surrender of Kiao-Chow.

Operations Have Begun.

The Japanese government has ordered the beginning of operations on land and sea.

The imperial rescript declaring war was issued Sunday evening. It officially inaugurates hostilities in the Far East as a result of Germany's failure to the Japanese ultimatum.

People Are Thrilled.

The proclamation of the emperor sent a thrill through the country. Japan's entrance upon the fulfillment of her obligations to her ally, Great Britain, responds to the popular will from one end of the land to the other. Cheering crowds assembled before the buildings occupied by the department of foreign affairs and the administration of the navy. There were lantern processions through the streets Sunday night. The popular manifestations, however, do not approach the enthusiasm which preceded the war with Russia.

Count Von Reed, the German ambassador, has been handed his passports.

George W. Guthrie, the American ambassador, will represent Germany.

Diet Is Convoked.

The diet has been convoked in special session for Sept. 3.

The Austrian cruiser Kaiserin Elizabeth, which latterly was at Tsing-Tau, the seaport of Kiao-Chow, is reported to have sailed.

She perhaps will go to a neutral port and disarm. It is believed this action will keep Austria out of the war in the Orient, although unforeseen circumstances may force Japan to change this policy. No action yet has been taken relative to Austria, and the foreign office has explained that Japan will remain friendly unless Austria adopts an attitude which it regards as offensive.

Wilson's Course Pleases Japs.

It is reported here that Germany has been trying to transfer the German railroad in Shantung, China, to America. Tokio believes, however, that the United States, pursuing the policy of neutrality outlined by President Wilson, will not accept. President Wilson's announcement of neutrality has greatly pleased the Japanese.

The newspapers express surprise at the extent of American suspicion regarding Japan's motives in issuing the ultimatum, but leading writers express a firm confidence that a better understanding will be had with the people of America.

Premier Okuma states that documentary evidence will show that England not only requested Japan's assistance, but approved of her entire program.

China Is Satisfied.

A dispatch from Pekin says the German minister and Chinese foreign office were about to sign an agreement regarding Tsing-Tau, when Japan's decision was announced, whereupon the Chinese foreign office decided not to proceed.

Other dispatches say President Yuan Shi Kai is satisfied with Japan's attitude and pledges.

Speaking at Karuizawa Kyu, Sauro Shimada, a member of the opposition in parliament, said he believed Japan had no desire to keep Kiao-Chow. He asserted that it was Japan's policy to prevent a stir up in China.

"The retaining of Kiao-Chow," he said, "would mean the danger of a revolution in China and incurring the ill-will of America. Japan is appreciative of Germany's contribution to Japanese civilization, but is resentful because the kaiser first raised the cry of 'Yellow peril' and Germany directed a combination to oust Japan from Port Arthur in 1895."

The German emperor sent a message to the governor on Aug. 19, ordering him to defend Tsing-Tau to the utmost.

Kaiser Orders Defense.

Tsing-Tau, China.—German preparation on the defense of Tsing-Tau and the territory of Kiao-Chow is complete. News of German victories in Europe has been circulated and has increased the confidence of the defending forces. The governor of Kiao-Chow, Meyer Waldeck, has issued a proclamation, saying:

"If the enemy wishes Tsing-Tau he must come and take it. He will find us at our post. We look confidently into the future and are well prepared to receive the enemy."

WELCOME FOR GEN. CARRANZA

ENTERS MEXICO CITY AT HEAD OF HIS TROOPS.

Not Slightest Disorder Marks Event—Villa Remains in Northern Mexico With 40,000 Men.

Mexico City, Aug. 22.—General Venustiano Carranza, the supreme chief of the Mexican revolution, and now provisional president of the republic, has just entered the capital. He was given an enthusiastic reception by the crowds on the streets.

It is estimated that more than 150,000 persons crowded the line of march of the new president and his followers, which extended from the village of Atzcapotzalco to the national palace, a distance of six miles.

There was not the slightest disorder as General Carranza and his staff passed through the cheering crowds which showered them with flowers and confetti and from which came cries of "Long live Carranza; long live the Constitutional government."

General Carranza was mounted on a superb horse, and accompanied by his staff, and the generals of the northwest, the central and northeast divisions of the constitutionalist army, left Atzcopotzalco, escorted by a squadron of cavalry and the Fourth Sonora battalion of infantry, which acted as the guard of honor. On reaching the city limits the column was met by the mayor and the city council of the capital, who delivered to General Carranza the keys of the city.

After this ceremony the cavalcade proceeded to the historic Chapultepec castle, where two batteries of artillery fired a salute in honor of the new chief executive.

When the procession reached the national theater it halted that the chief executive might receive at the hands of the workmen the flag President Madero dropped at that very spot on the fateful ninth of February, 1913, the date of the Huerta-Diaz uprising.

The president promised a new era of real Constitutional government.

40,000 Men Under Villa.

Washington.—Official reports to the Washington government estimate the number of troops in command of General Villa in northern Mexico at no less than 40,000 men. This is a much larger number than had been supposed and is the result of several weeks of recruiting during the lull which followed Huerta's abdication.

Germans Sink British Ship.

New York, Aug. 24.—News was received in shipping circles that the crew of the British steamer, Hyades, had been landed at Rio Janeiro and had reported that the Hyades was sunk by the German cruiser, Dresden, after the warship's sailors had taken out all the coal aboard. The Hyades, 3,350 tons, placed between British and South American ports. Dispatches from Rio Janeiro also reported the capture of the German steamer Santa Katharina, en route from New York to Brazil, by the British cruiser Glasgow.

Rigid Japanese Censorship.

San Francisco, Aug. 24.—Evidence that Japan is imposing a rigid censorship on dispatches leaving the empire is contained in Honolulu newspapers reaching here.

British Loan Belgium $50,000,000.

London, Aug. 24.—Great Britain has decided to make a loan to Belgium of $50,000,000. The money will be raised by treasury bills, for which tenders have been called.

Says Philippines Are Safe.

London, Aug. 22.—Oscar Strauss, veteran American diplomat and member of the permanent court of arbitration at The Hague, discussing the situation in the far east, said: "Some Americans seem to be unduly excited about Japan's action concerning Kiao-Chow. I do not think the United States has anything to be apprehensive about. Japan has no designs on the Philippines and would not have them. They are not suited to her use. The climate is too hot for the Japanese."

ITALY MAY JOIN ALLIES; ARMY IS BEING MOBILIZED

OPEN BREAK WITH AUSTRIA IS NEAR—GREECE TROOPS GO TO AID OF SERVIANS, IS REPORT.

AUSTRIA QUITS SERVIAN CAMPAIGN TO AID GERMANY

Declared Cossacks Are Invading Kaiser's Domain to Such Extent That Further Defense Is Necessary Russian Victories Are Claimed.

Rome, Aug. 25.—Open rupture of the relations between Italy and Austria is hourly expected. Mobilization of Italy's army probably will be completed on Aug. 27.

Both Sides Active.

Austrian pressure to force Italy to support actively the two belligerent nations of the Triple Alliance is being redoubled and France in an effort to counteract Austria's solicitations have sent respectively Theophile Delcasse and Count Witte, their most distinguished diplomats, to Rome.

Dispatches received here report that a naval engagement has been fought in the Adriatic and that several Austrian warships have been lost.

Greek troops are reported to have entered Servia to fight the Austrians.

Influential Italians living at Malta are said to declare they have good reason to believe that Italian intervention in the war in favor of Great Britain, France and Russia is only a question of days.

Austria Hastens to Aid.

London.—A dispatch to the Daily Mail from Udine, Italy, says that at Vienna it is announced that the Austrian operations against Servia on the river Drina have been abandoned. The Austrians are uniting their effective forces with those of Germany in order to oppose Russia in the east.

Great Russian Victory.

St. Petersburg.—Grand Duke Nicholas, commander-in-chief of the Russian army, issued the following statement:

"Battles in East Prussia on Aug. 17, 18, 19 and 20 were fought with the utmost desperation. The spirit of the troops is excellent. Our battle front extends for a distance of over 40 versts (about 26 miles).

Germans Routed, He Says.

"The Russian troops occupied Goldapp and Ayres. The retreat on Aug. 20th of the German army corps near Lyck resembled a rout. The money confiscated in the treasury amounts to 50,000 marks ($10,000). The enemy's troops are evacuating the frontier in the vicinity of Willenberg. The German population is abandoning the villages and fleeing northward.

"On the Austrian frontier up to Aug. 20 no serious condition occurred. The Russians forced an Austrian battalion to evacuate Burgade and Ravarusse.

"On Aug. 20 the Germans near Gumbinnen engaged three army corps and tried to envelop the Russian right wing where the fighting was intensely fierce. The Russians took the offensive in the center and captured many guns. The enemy demanded an armistice in order to bury their dead, but this demand was refused. On Aug. 21 victory crowned the efforts of the Russian army. The Germans, having suffered enormous losses, are falling back, pursued by the Russians.

Report Is Confirmed.

London.—A Times dispatch from St. Petersburg, confirming the report that the Russians have completely enveloped the remnants of the Germans, leaving the lake region and the line of the German retreat toward the river Angerapp, in East Prussia, and the Maruz lakes in Russian hands, says that the Russians are even now sweeping the environs of Insterburg and have occupied Darkehmen, and thus the line between Thorn and Dansic is now within the sphere of Russian operations.

Ostend Again Frightened.

London, Aug. 24.—Ostend is again frightened about the entry into the city of the Germans, reports being current there that they are determined to capture all three wireless stations on the Belgian coast and cut off communication with England. John MacKenzie, an Englishman, who had been in Belgium for six weeks, came from Ostend to London and said of the situation there: "When I left Ostend at 11 o'clock this morning the populace was much frightened. The British consul had departed and tourists had been warned to leave."

To Indict Price Boosters.

Washington, Aug. 22.—Attorney General J. C. McReynolds expects several indictments to be returned within the next few days as the result of the investigation ordered by President Woodrow Wilson of the increase in food prices since the outbreak of the war in Europe. Mr. McReynolds has been in frequent communication with the White House since the investigation was started and expects to make his formal report soon. The president has directed that prosecutions be pressed

POPE PIUS X DIES OF PNEUMONIA; ILL FOUR DAYS

Rallied After Relapse and Crisis Was Thought Passed.

WAS UNCONSCIOUS AT END

Relatives and Officers of Church at Bedside—Last Sacrament Administered When End Was Thought Near.

Rome, Aug. 20.—Pope Pius X died at 1:20 o'clock this morning.

Already suffering from bronchitis and a weak heart, the worry occasioned by the war involving all Europe brought on bronchial pneumonia, and the aged pontiff is a war victim as truly as if he had been struck down on the field of battle. He was ill four days.

His holiness had lain unconscious most of the afternoon, but rallied in the evening, became conscious for a time, and gave the physicians hope that he might recover. But his strength was gone, he soon relapsed into coma and gradually grew weaker until the end. He died while sleeping peacefully.

Death Followed Relapse.

In the afternoon he suffered a relapse, and he received the last sacrament. His sisters lighted the candles before the miraculous images of St. Joseph and remained prostrate, praying for his recovery.

The ringing of the church bells notified the people of the exposition of the holy sacrament and called them to prayer.

Cardinal Merry del Val, who was called in, left after a few minutes and issued a summons for the cardinals who had left the city for their vacations.

Before the fatal turn for the worse the pope addressed the whole world on the subject of the war. When he was told that the roar of cannon in the Adriatic could be heard in Venice he exclaimed:

"The bones of the doges must thrill in their sepulchers at the familiar sound of battle, recalling the heroic days of old!"

Death Comparatively Sudden.

Death came to the aged pontiff after a battle of a few days, with the leading men of science on one side and the grim reaper on the other.

The streets of Rome, usually gay and filled with clamoring throngs, are quiet. The noise of the market places is hushed. Everywhere eyes are turned respectfully toward the golden dome of St. Peter's, which appeared to have lost its glitter in the dark pall of grief that hangs over the eternal city.

Hundreds of visitors crowded the wide streets leading to the massive gates of the Vatican, where the papal guard stood on silent watch. With bared heads and eyes glistening with tears, the throng gazed at the place where lay the "peasant pope," as he was affectionately called by his Italian countrymen.

Pius X. Was Born June 2, 1835.

Pope Pius X. was a native of the little village of Riese, in the Venitian province of Trevisco, which in 1303, gave to the church a pontiff in Niccola Boccasini, who assumed the triple crown under the name of Benedict XI.

Born June 2, 1835, to a poor and humble family of the name of Sarto, Pius X. was christened Giuseppe (Joseph) and known throughout life by the dialect equivalent of Giuseppe, "Beppo."

The early life of Pope Pius was filled with activity. The district of Treviso is one of poverty, only those who have seen it realizing the struggle for existence that ever prevails.

From an early age Giuseppe, bred to sturdy outdoor life, displayed a bent for the priesthood. The educational resources of his birthplace were soon exhausted, and the lad's studious learnings demanded a wider field for their development. He was sent to a college at Castel, France, and from there was transferred to the Central Seminary at Padua, the world-renowned seat of Italian learning.

On September 18, 1858, the young seminarist received his priest's orders in the Cathedral of Castel-France. That year was a memorable one for Italy. The question of Italian liberation had been forced to the front by the attempt of Orsini to assassinate Napoleon III.

The diplomats of nations assembled, but the youngest priest was not concerned in the movement. He turned his back on the world and took up his duties as curate in the village of Tombelo. He soon was loved by his parishoners, to whom he endeared himself by his unselfishness, his self-sacrifice, and his tireless labor.

Became Parish Priest in 1867.

He was promoted as parish priest of Salzano in 1867, only a year after the cession of Venezia (Venice) to Italy, so that the future pope lived, for the first thrity-two years of his life, under Austrian regime in his native province.

The able discharge of his office recommended the pastor of Salzano to the notice of Monsignor Zinelli, at that time the bishop of the diocese, who nominated him to a canonry in the Cathedral of Treviso. This promotion was supplemented by bestowal of the deanery on Father Sarto and his appointment as Episcopal chancellor. To him also was confided the delicate and important charge of spiritual director of the Seminary of Treviso, in which college he was likewise given a professor's chair and an examinership.

Nor did his activities end here, for he was chosen as a judge in the Capitular Ecclesiastical court, and finally was appointed vicar-general of the docese.

After such an apprenticeship it was not surprising that when the important see of Mantuo became vacant, in 1884, Leo XIII chose Giuseppe Sarto to fill the place. It was no easy task to which he had been called, for his predecessor had allowed discipline to slack. His persuasive powers and administrative gifts were tested to the utmost, but he was fully equal to the ungrateful task.

Severe in personal taste, Signor Sarto showed himself zealous in maintaining the gorgeous ritual traditions of his church, and in 1886 the nine hundredth solemn centenary of St. Anselm was celebrated under his auspices, while in 1891 he presided at a like function in commemoration of St. Louis Gonzaga.

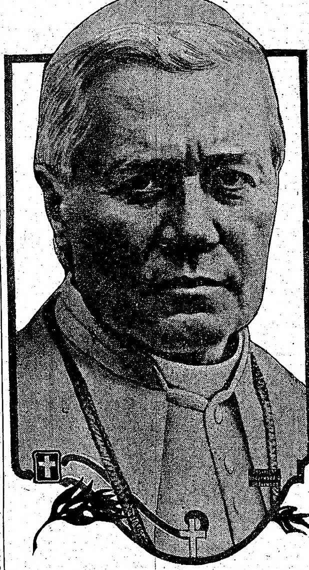
Two years later Pope Leo recognized Bishop Sarto's merits by raising him to the Sacred College, with the title of San Bernardo alle Temme, at a consistory held June 15, 1893.

At the same time he was chosen out of all the Venetian prelates to fill the patriarchate of Venice.

Won Support of the Radicals.

In his nine years' residence in the "seagirt" city the pope of the gondoliers was beloved and a familiar figure.

POPE PIUS X



His firm, dignified, yet genial rule, quickly made him a force to be reckoned with.

Elected as Compromise Candidate.

Pius X. was, as befitted a democratic pope, different in many respects from his illustrious predecessor. Like the fisherman whose place he held, he found his recreation fishing in the Vatican ponds rather than in writing Latin verses. To his saintliness of character and moral worth, independently of all lesser and worldly consideration, memory doubtless will pay homage.

When balloting began to choose a successor to Pope Leo XIII., the name of Giuseppe Sarto was hardly considered at first. As balloting continued, however, the roll of votes in his favor increased. He was then regarded as a compromise candidate, and, finally, on the sixtieth ballot he was elected August 4, 1903, and five days later he was crowned in St. Peter's cathedral, Rome, with all the magnificance and brilliance of ceremonies that distinguishes the coronation of each successor to the apostolic throne.

From the post of spiritual head of gondoliers and peasants, a work that he loved, to the throne in the Vatican was the career of Giuseppe Sarto, Pope Pius X.

And he never had been ambitious to be the head of the Catholic church and the successor of St. Peter. He loved the simple life among his friends.

There was a great difference of opinion as to the qualifications of Pope Pius X. for his office. His election, a compromise, was particularly pleasing to Austria, Germany and France, and in these countries, with the exception of France in recent years, he was highly commended for wisdom and strength.

Brought Church and State Together.

As to Italy, he increased the cordial understanding between church and state, which was not thought wise by Italian churchmen. However, his action resulted in an uplifting of the church in Italy.

The dioceses had been in a most deplorable condition because of the long conflict between church and state.

There was evidence of miserable conditions existing in the Italian emigrants. They have little or no instruction in their religion and paid no attention to it in this country, on the supposition that the Catholic religion did not exist here.

The pope pursued this matter to the proper outcome. He filled up vacant sees, stirred up comfortable bishops, and ordered the teaching of catechism all over the world. He aimed chiefly at Italy. In a word, he deserted diplomacy for the instruction and organization of the people. He gave up governments to look after the lost sheep of the household.

Disappointed diplomats then wailed about his timidity. But the wailing had no effect on the noble-hearted, simple man who was the head of the church.

When the trouble between the church and state broke out in France and the concordat was dropped, the world looked to the pope, speculating what course he would take. What he did seemed to be the only right thing according to the American idea. He ignored the nation.

Before Pope Pius had been on the throne three years he evidenced that young men who dreamed of the career of a courtier in Rome were going to be disappointed. The pope wanted bishops for the different sees, and the way for young diplomats to promotion, it was soon apparent, was through the tiresome but wholesome office of governing bishop.

One great reform Pope Pius accomplished, and it promises to be ever remembered in history. He proved that diplomacy in church matters is a thing of little importance compared with the direct teaching and preaching of the gospel to the poor.

Opposed to Woman's Suffrage.

An instance of his well-known uncompromising attitude against advanced tendencies was afforded in his opposition to woman suffrage as voiced by the pope upon the occasion of his reception of a delegation of Italian Catholic ladies.

"Woman can never be man's equal," he told his fair visitors, "and cannot, therefore, enjoy equal rights. Few women would ever desire to legislate, and those who did would be classed as eccentrics. Scripture, and especially the three Epistles of St. Paul, emphasize woman's dependence on man."

By virtue of one of his documents, known as the "Sapienti Consilio," the congregations composing the Roman Curia of the Catholic church have been reformed and the American hierarchy has been accorded a recognized voice in the government of the church

THIRST FOR NEWS THE ONE PASSION IN PARIS

One of the particularly striking things of this time of stress and excitement in Paris is the eagerness of every human being for a newspaper. The little midinettes who usually read nothing but the serial story, the omnibus conductors, the finely dressed women in their limousines, every one reads every edition of every paper.

Life is full of abrupt changes for a working continental nation where mobilization can call out all types and conditions of men in less than a week. A person's daily acquaintances take on a romantic aspect; for the concierge is an artillery man, I find, and has a medal for being the best gunlayer in his battery. The most obsequious waiter at the Cafe de Paris gives orders in the army instead of taking them. And who could have imagined that the nice young man who marcels your hair is a cuirassier and will perhaps be charging around with a gleaming breastplate and a heavy saber in place of a curling iron with which he will treat heads.

Eat Raw Potatoes.

The German troops in Belgian Luxemburg are said to be starving and many of them are reported to have dropped unconscious owing to their privations. In some of the dead officers' pockets raw potatoes were found, while the soldiers are said to have dug up unripe turnips and beets to eat.

Many horses belonging to the German Uhlans found dead in Belgian Limbourg were declared after a post-mortem examination to have starved to death.

MOTHER OF SCHOOL GIRL

Tells How Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound Restored Her Daughter's Health.

Plover, Iowa.—"From a small child my 13 year old daughter had female weakness. I spoke to three doctors about it and they did not help her any. Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound had been of great benefit to me, so I decided to have her give it a trial. She has taken five bottles of the Vegetable Compound according to directions on the bottle and she is cured of this trouble. She was all run down when she started taking the Compound and her periods did not come right. She was so poorly and weak that I often had to help her dress herself, but now she is regular and is growing strong and healthy."—Mrs. MARTIN HELVIG, Plover, Iowa.

Hundreds of such letters expressing gratitude for the good Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has accomplished are constantly being received, proving the reliability of this grand old remedy.

If you are ill do not drag along and continue to suffer day in and day out but at once take Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, a woman's remedy for woman's ills.

If you want special advice write to Lydia E. Pinkham Medicine Co. (confidential) Lynn, Mass. Your letter will be opened, read and answered by a woman and held in strict confidence.

WITH TRAGEDY IN HIS MIND

Husband Dashed Home in Response to Telephone Call to Find His Worst Fears Were Groundless.

Smithson said a thunderstorm always reminded him of this absurd incident in his early married life. He said it happened when their first baby was only two months old, so he might be pardoned if his solicitude exceeded his sober judgment. He was at his office one afternoon when a terrific thunderstorm broke which crashed enough to frighten anyone, so when the 'phone rang and his wife's voice tremulously asked: "George, dear, can you come home right away?" he said, "yes," quickly, nor paused to question, but frantic with misgivings, grabbed his hat and almost ran through town to his home.

Arriving all breathless, he found his wife awaiting him on the porch, her face the very picture of distress.

Rushing up to her he said anxiously: "Why, darling, what's the matter?"

Much to his surprise came this reply: "Oh, George, dear, we have moths!"—Kansas City Star.

A Good Shot.

A San Franciscan, who has been hunting in the vicinity of Lake Tahoe without bagging any game, came upon a mountaineer who was feeding a caged wildcat he had caught the day before.

"How much will you take for that beast?" he asked.

The captor said $5 and the money was paid over.

"Now," said the Nimrod, "tie one end of a strong cord to that tree and another to the cat's neck, and then open the door of the cage."

This was finally accomplished and the fierce animal stood straining at its tether.

The sportsman, who was watching the exercises from the interior of the cabin, leveled his rifle across the window sill, took careful aim and blazed away. The wildcat gave a joyful yell and disappeared in the forest. The bullet had cut the rope.

WHY WE WILL NOT SUPPORT O'NEIL.

As the temperance people make some political capital out of the fact that Mr. O'Neil voted for County Option, we will this week devote a little space to his vote on moral questions. As we have said before there were many other important questions before that legislature besides County Option.

We quote from Senate file No. 68—Chapter 562. General Laws of 1913.

THE INJUNCTION AND ABATEMENT BILL.

"Senate File 68—to enjoin and abate houses of lewdness, came up in the house on special order April 22, next to the last day of the session and furnished one of the most interesting and instructive contests of the entire session.

The bill had passed the senate with little opposition. But the interested parties were not willing to let it pass the house so easily. Several amendments were offered, all of which were intended to make it easier for the owners of the property or the occupants, but these were all voted down. The vote on G. B. Brown's amendment requiring that all owners, lessees, occupants, etc., should be notified and allowed 30 days to abate the nuisance, is a fair example of the way the house lined up."

Among the votes for this amendment we find the name of D. P. O'Neil. This amendment if carried would have killed the purpose and intent of the law, as affectually as the Drainage Bill was killed by O'Neil's and Brown's amendments, but thank God there were enough fathers of daughters in that House of Representatives on the 22nd day of April 1913, so that the amendment voted for by Mr. O'Neil was lost, and the act was passed and is now a law of Minnesota. His vote went on record for this amendment April 22nd 1913 at about 3:30 o'clock P. M.

Free space in THE SUNBEAM for Mr. O'Neil to deny his vote on this question.

A. H. Fasel has no claim on any political party, or individual for support for re-election to that office of County Auditor. Two years ago after he had received the nomination for auditor by the Republican party, he got scared out of his wits for fear that either Naplin or Bishop would get elected for County Attorney, and thus spoil the 'ARRANGEMENTS that might be made between the county audi or and ditch contractors and bonding companies, so he came out boldly and supported Stanton, the democratic nominee and depended on the strength of the Republican party to elect him. He was elected, and owing to a mistaken division of votes, both Bishop and Naplin were defeated. Then with O'Neil in the legislature to fix up the Drainage laws, our County Auditor has been living in clover for the past two years. He does not even have a claim on the tax paying citizens of Thief River Falls for support, as he has shown that he has no faith in the future of that city, as he has invested what extra dollars he has made, outside of Thief River Falls.

The sudden rise of sugar is attributed to the sudden stopping of production by Germany and Austria, which nations manufactures about one-half of the sugar produced in the world. But it now seems that the United States sugar manufacturers who shut down on account of free trade can afford to open their factories.

Full detailed and latest war news are published on another page.

The worlds war is the latest name suggested for that little scrap that started between two small nations of Europe.

Congressman Hammond will certainly be a busy man this fall, attending to his state campaign and holding down his seat in Congress at the same time.

Preus and Rines will not have their election contest completed before March, at the present rate they are going. Perhaps it would be best to let them have plenty of time to fight it out and elect Sam Iverson with stickers in November.

Congressman Steenerson is still absent on official business in Norway and Sweden. Steenerson has made his campaign by his excellent record in Congress, and his friends will look after the details, such as votes in November, during his absence.

Farmers should remember that if the game laws permits the shooting of prairie chickens after September 7th, that it does not give hunters the privelege of trespassing on your land, and tramping through your flax fields. Post notices at different points along the road, reading "No Hunting Allowed," you can print or write them on a board or obtain them free of charge at this office. We have some special ones printed with black lines near the bottom and the following reading notice, "Mourning lines for the first hunting dog that we catch running through this flax."

We do not take as active a part in the election of governor as does Brother Lattimore of The Eleven Towns. But it seems to us that there was about as bitter a fight in the Democratic party for the nomination as there was in the Republican party, and as Lee has a little over 30,000 Republican majority to start with, and with what dissatisfied Lawler Democratic supporters he can pick up, he can afford to loose quite a number of the dissatisfied Eberhart supporters. Then there are those 33,455 Collin's Progressive Republican votes to be considered, and while there was much dis-atisfaction in the party two years ago, over the nomination of Taft, we do not hear much about Progressive Republicans in Minnesota this year. While some of the leaders in the Eberhart fight may oppose the election of Lee, yet the rank and file of the party will support the Republican ticket, and the result in November can easily be foreseen.

THE LOCAL NEWS

The Young Peoples' Society of the town of Mayfield, will be held at the residence of Gunde Austad next Sunday, afternoon.

It is reported that some of the winter wheat thrashed in Deer Park township yeilded as high as thirty-four bushels per acre.

Ed Rustan thrashed out the winter rye for M. D. Hyland Monday, and will thrash the winter wheat and rye for Wm. Swanson as soon as the weather permits.

The Young Peoples' Society of Deer Park and Highlanding, will hold their next meeting on Sunday September 6th, at the residence of Eddy Hyland, in Deer Park township, two miles south of Highlanding.

We understand that Edward Singer has been appointed as assistant game warden. By the way this is the same Singer who got up the big Pennington County law suit, over a fire deal, that happened in Highlanding township.

The Young Peoples' Society held at the Olson church last Sunday was well attended by both young and old people. A very good program was rendered, the singing was by the Young Peoples' choir, and was very fine.

Read the record of Hon. D. P. O'Neil on the amendment to the abatement bill published in another column. Mr. O'Neil voted to put liquor out of the reach of the old man, but he thought it was all right for the daughter to be in a bawdy house, for at least thirty days, if we are to judge him by his vote on that amendment.

Game warden Wm. Munch, was up from Crookston, this week looking after any violation of the game law. He did not find anyone shooting in this locality, and it would be a dreadful crime if a farmer should happen to shoot a chicken a day or two before the season opens, as they should all be saved for the city folks when the season opens.

There is some disease that is killing off the full grown hogs in this locality. It does not have the appearance of hog cholera, as every hog seem to have a different sickness. We lost a fine one last night, which we are inclined to think, was caused by being fed too much green corn, but we never heard of a hog dying from overfeeding before. We understand that Morgan Vaughan has lost seven which is certainly a heavy loss for a farmer with pork at its present prices.

The visit of the game warden this week has certainly stirred up the farmers, and "no hunting" signs will be seen posted thick in this locality before the hunting season opens, as the farmers understand that this game warden was summoned, and sent up to see that the farmers did not get a mess of prairie chickens before the time came for them to come in with their trained dogs and get them all. Post notices on your farms, and if you catch any trespassers promptly notify us, and they will find a farmer that can promptly prosecute them.

The new Electric Line running east from Thief River Falls will be ready soon to have regular trains running as far east as Goodridge. The opening of this new line will make quite a number of changes in the mail routes on the north side of Red Lake River as post-offices will be established at all the new townsites and the mail service will be either rural or made by loop star routes, to leave the railroad stations and make a round trip back to the stations, as the government will not keep a star route in operation running parallel to a railroad.

The weather has been very unfavorable for stacking grain the past week.

Attend to it and get your "No Hunting Allowed" signs up before September 7th.

Anderson Is On His Trail.

The scrap for the auditorship promises to be a warm one, and the wise ones are predicting that the present auditor is going to have the "time of his life" to land. Some weeks ago Fasel was touted as an easy winner, but according to reports things have changed, and it is alleged that one of the reasons for said change is the present auditor's inclination to "knock" some other aspirants for office and his penchant for "pickin" a row with those who differ with him on things political and otherwise.—T. As to County Option.

The story has been sprung on candidate Lee, that he has switched on the County Option issue. This Mr. Lee indignantly denies. However we cannot see that County Option, is such a great issue, so far as the governor is concerned, for either Lee or Hammond would sign a County Option bill if it was passed by the legislature, in fact we do not see how they could do otherwise. But of course there is the temperance committee of the Senate to appoint, and they have a good deal to do with it, but if the people elect a good majority in both houses, favoring County Option, the law will be passed, as the time has gone by when a member of the legisture can pledge himself to favor certain legislation, and then go back on his word after he is elected, unless he is looking for a good location to dig his political grave.

Great Poets and a Little Girl.

James Russell Lowell used to walk along the gravel paths of his beautiful garden in Cambridge, Mass., hand in hand with a bright little girl, who was his neighbor, and discoursed with her upon fairies, paper dolls, roses and other important subjects. Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, a neighbor of Lowell's and of the little girl's, who wore a velvet coat and a big tie, was also her intimate friend. He used to tell her wonderful stories of ancient heroes and many other marvelous things. It was natural that the little girl should resolve even then to become a writer, and first of all a poet, for it was as a poet that the novelist, Eleanor Hallowell Abbott, first achieved recognition.—Century.

First Opera Glasses.

The single opera glass was first used in the time of Louis XIV. It became the rage, and everybody used one. The double opera glass (Jumelle) was invented in 1825, but did not at first find favor with women. A treatise was written in the early part of the nineteenth century on l'art de lorgner, in which it was shown that a woman with fine arms would hold the glass with both hands, if she were blessed with fine hands she would take off her gloves, if her neck were long she would recline back in her chair, and so on. It was quite a treatise on coquetry.

SYNOPSIS.

Anne Ives, mascot by reputation, starts from Winnipeg for London to attend the coronation of King George. Her father had come to America following a quarrel with his father, Comte d'Yves of France. Anne's father, at his death, left her a key to a strong box containing bonds of the defunct French Panama Canal company. The box is in the vaults of Magniff & Co., Paris bankers. On the steamer Anne meets the dessolute son of Magniff, who, not knowing her identity, tells her of a scheme to get hold of the canal bonds and extort money from Magniff. Anne volunteers to go as a passenger with a French contestant at an aviation meet in London. The Frenchman wins, but disappears without disclosing his identity. She meets him again in the crowd at Westminster abbey and accompanies him to the coronation. She learns that he is her cousin, Chevalier d'Yves, and that his companion is her grandfather, Comte d'Yves. Sharing her father's hate for the family, Anne abruptly leaves the abbey. She losses her purse and bororws money to go to Paris. On the way she meets an official of the aviation meet who, thinking her the wife of the winner, forces on her the prize of 500 pounds. She learns that Banker Magniff is extremely bitter against her grandfather and holds a mortgage on the ancestral home. Magniff tells her a new key must be made for the box. He induces her to sign an agreement to sell him the bonds for 50,000 frances.

CHAPTER IV—Continued.

I appended my name to the document and walked out of the office like one in a dream. With economy, my money would last easily for three weeks. I should never need to worry about my landlady's bill any more.

My happy thoughts were speedily to be dispelled.

"There is a gentleman waiting to see you, madamoiselle," said the landlady of my pension as I entered. "He has waited two hours in the reception room. Mademoiselle is Canadian—she would doubtless wish to meet him without a chaperon," she simpered.

Somehow my heart failed me as I turned the handle of the door. I was convinced that it was the scoundrelly Greek Zeuxis, who had followed me home.

But it was not—it was Leopold Magniff, the banker's son!

He bowed low and his countenance assumed a sneering deference as I ignored his outsretched hand and stood facing him in silence. I did not deign to offer the least greeting.

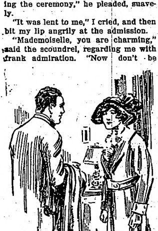
"Miss Ives, you've been to see my father," he volunteered. "It's no use to deny it; my agents have been on your trail since you posed as the wife of the Chevalier d'Yves at the coronation."

"I have no intention of denying anything—to you," I said, contemptuously. "But if you dare insult me with your falsehoods again, you shall be thrown from this hotel."

"At least mademoiselle will acknowledge that she wore a wedding ring during the ceremony," he pleaded, suavely.

"It was lent to me," I cried, and then bit my lip angrily at the admission.

"Mademoiselle, you are charming," said the scoundrel, regarding me with frank admiration. "Now don't be angry. I have come here as a friend. And to prove it, allow me to restore you this."



"Mademoiselle, You Are Charming," Said the Scoundrel.

He reached into his coat pocket and pulled out the purse which I had lost in so humiliating a manner inside Westminster abbey. He handed it to me, and, taking it gingerly, I opened it. There, within, lay my hand mirror, my powder puff, and my five hundred dollar bills. But the key—the key was gone.

"I gather from your expression, mademoiselle, that you realize that you are in my power," he said.

"If you mean that you have stolen my key—" I began.

"Your key?" he repeated, in feigned astonishment. "I know nothing of any key of yours, mademoiselle, except that this purse was discovered at the entrance to the abbey doors by a servant of mine."

"By your spy, Zeuxis," I interrupted, bitterly. "I thank you for your honesty in restoring my money, at least. Good afternoon, monsieur."

"But, mademoiselle," he cried, in real alarm. "I thought, now that I have convinced you of my power, that you would be willing to join forces with me. Otherwise, you will be ruined. Assuredly you will be ruined. My coup has succeeded beyond my expectations—the one I told you that I had in prospect. And I will marry you tomorrow—tonight, if you insist on it. You will be made for life. And I shall worship you. I am sure that we were made for each other. Ah, mademoiselle, do you suppose that you will have such a chance again? Are you thinking of that beggardly chevalier? Why, he is a pauper, wiped out—besides, he is a libertine, a rake. They say—"

Something in my expression must have alarmed him, for he suddenly ceased speaking, took his hat, and sidled toward the door.

"Remember, mademoiselle," he said, grinning nastily, "I am ready at any time to renew my proposition to you. But unless you accept you will be ruined—positively ruined, believe me."

The sight of his grinning face horrified me; the memory clung to me for weeks afterward.

When I gained my self-possession I sent a hasty telegram to the banker. It ran as follows:

"Your son and confederate have key to my safe. Seal it and place a guard over it instantly."

This communication elicited no response. But I felt sure that it would effect its purpose—unless the bonds had been already stolen.

I awaited the termination of the three weeks with ill-concealed impatience.

CHAPTER V.

New Friends and Old Enemies.

(In which I learn that my relatives are not so black as I painted them.)

Here was I, alone in Paris, under the surveillance, as I was positive, both of Leopold Magniff, Jr., and his rascally sycophant Zeuxis, with three weeks to wait before the opening of the safe in which my precious bonds lay hidden. And in three weeks my enemies could work incredible harm.

Magniff had threatened me with ruin unless I accepted his advances. But how could he fulfil his threat? Only in one way, clearly; by utilizing the key which he had stolen from my purse to open my safe and to abstract the bonds. Would he dare? Had the safe already been rifled? But even so I should at least be no worse off than when I had arrived in Paris. As the days wore away, and the memory of the man grew fainter I came to despise and disregard his powers for mischief.

It did seem unnecessary that I should have to wait three weeks while Magniff, Sr., was fashioning a new key for my safe. But I inferred that he was in reality utilizing this period to make inquiries in Canada concerning me; consequently I became more tranquil in mind. I sent my friend Estelle Christie the ten pounds which she had lent me and settled down to live frugally at the Pension Anglaise with my remaining $450. At the worst I should have enough with which to return to Winnipeg.

A little more than a week of my probationary period had elapsed, when one morning our landlady announced that two gentlemen were awaiting me in the reception room. Instantly I thought of Magniff and the Greek.

"Tell them that I will not see them," I answered.

The landlady appeared shocked.

"But, Mees Ives, they are of the quality, assuredly," she protested. "An old gentleman and a young one. And the latter—what build, what figure! I thought to have the pleasure to congratulate mademoiselle," she continued teasingly.

The comte and the chevalier! It could not be! And yet, whom else did I know? But, if it were they, how could they have discovered my abode?

"They sent up no cards?" I asked my hostess.

"No, mademoiselle. But see, only see them and certainly you will not refuse them an interview. 'Ver' important business'—those were their words."

"Tell them I will be down in a few moments," I answered, and began to arrange my hair for the interview. In the midst of brushing it I halted angrily. My heart was pounding in my throat in the most discomfiting way. Why, I asked myself, sternly, why did I go to this trouble about my personal appearance for the sake of such mortal enemies? And why was I so agitated? I could not solve the problem, and twisting up my hair hastily, I descended the stairs, trying to regain control over my nerves.

It was as I had surmised. The comte and the chevalier were waiting for me in the reception room, both faultlessly attired in morning clothes. They rose, each with a low bow, upon my entrance. Both looked extremely grave, and neither evinced the slightest sign of having previously seen me. I motioned each to a chair, but they remained standing.

Now, though I had determined to greet them with the barest courtesy, this turning of the tables upon myself affected me almost to tears of rage. It is a woman's privilege to control the temperature of acquaintanceship; and this immaculate young man, playing whatever part he might be, whether of aviator, diplomat or anything else, seemed always to have the advantage over me in the maneuvering.

"What can I do for you, gentlemen?" I asked in my most disdainful voice. They did not know how wildly my heart beat.

"First, mademoiselle, let me say, in case you suspect us of espionage, that we obtained your address through your friend, Mrs. Christie," said the chevalier.

I nodded coldly. "I am not in the habit of accusing persons of espionage," I answered.

"Then the old saying is false," he answered. "Evidently, in this case, like does not turn to like."

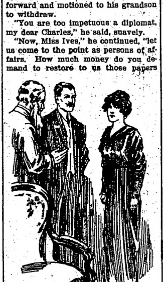
"What do you mean, sir?" I demanded indignantly.

"I mean," said the chevalier, doggedly, "how much do you want for those papers?"

I looked from one to the other, inquiringly. The old comte now came forward and motioned to his grandson to withdraw.

"You are too impetuous a diplomat, my dear Charles," he said, suavely.

"Now, Miss Ives," he continued, "let us come to the point as persons of affairs. How much money do you demand to restore to us those papers which you pilfered from my grandson's coat pocket while he was entertaining you as his guest within the abbey?"



"And So," I Said Bitterly, "You Suspect Me of Being the Thief?"

I gasped for words.

"How dare you insult me!" I stammered—and the observation seems trite enough now, when I recall it. Perhaps it was my intonation, my expression of outraged innocence, that disillusioned him. At any rate he seemed perceptibly embarrassed, and as he hesitated, I recovered my composure.

"Will you have the goodness to explain yourselves in full, gentlemen?" I said, with withering scorn.

"With pleasure, mademoiselle," answered the comte. "The facts are simple. As you should know, my grandson here accompanied me to England, recently, ostensibly as a member of the French military mission in the coronation; actually to negotiate an important treaty between England and France, in which three foreign powers are vitally interested.

"We were warned that emissaries of these powers were prepared to go to all lengths to obtain a draft of the treaty. To render it absolutely secure, my grandson kept only a few rough jottings of the French government's proposals upon a piece of paper in his coat pocket. He thought that none would have suspected he would carry it there. This paper was stolen from his pocket at the doors of Westminster abbey."

"And so," I said, bitterly, "you suspect me of being the thief?"

He was silent from courtesy, but I could see that I had not shaken his conviction.

"What else should it be, mademoiselle?" he asked, quietly. "Remember, when we extended our impulsive hospitality to you we did not even know your name."

Here was my chance. How I had longed for it! And every word should now go home at last.

"If I am a spy and thief and traitor," I answered, "then I dishonor a noble family as well as myself. Shall I tell you from whom I am descended?"

He bowed with deference. "If mademoiselle pleases," he answered.

"I am of French extraction," I responded. "My father's name was Jules d'Yves"—I saw him start—"and his father was, and is, Comte d'Yves of Clichy."

There was a dead silence in the room. Then, as the haze floated from before my eyes, I saw both men gripping their chairs, regarding me with amazement, blended, I think, with fear.

"Yes," I went on bitterly, not caring what I said, "my father was driven from his home, disowned, and left to starve in a foreign land by those who should have been proud to acknowledge him. I am his daughter, and I am proud to be. And I am neither thief nor spy. Good morning, gentlemen."

Just as I had reached the door the comte found voice.

"Come back!" he pleaded, in such an altered, abject tone that my anger died away and pity succeeded it. A sudden vision came to me of the lonely old man, perhaps torn with secret remorse for his unfatherly crime, perhaps longing for those approaches which my father had been too proud to make to him.

"You are Anne d'Yves?" muttered the old man, approaching me with outstretched arms. Suddenly he took my face between his hands and gazed into my eyes with such benignance that I felt my own grow wet. "Charles, come here," he said. "She has the eyes of my son Jules. It is true. See—why, do not weep, child!"

His arms were round me now, and I—just at the moment of my completest triumph—I was crying. And it was upon his shoulder, too. He sustained me like a lover. O, my dear grandfather, I recall now with what a practiced hand you wiped away my tears. How many women's tears had you wiped away when you were young—young, like the chevalier?

What I have always wondered at is that neither of the two for the least moment disturbed me.

"My dear grandchild," said the old comte, when I grew calm, "the memory of my treatment of your father embittered my whole life. Often I sought to find him, but he was too proud to be reconciled. Now it is too late. But I shall lavish on you the tenderness that I have lavished on him so often in imagination."

Then, at his request, I told him the entire story of my visit to Europe, not omitting mention of Leopold Magniff and Zeuxis. I ended with a brief account of my interview with the old banker.

"Describe this Greek, this Zeuxis," he said, when I added that I thought I had seen his face in the crowd at the coronation. "Has he a scar running diagonally across his cheek, from mouth to eyebrow?"

"He has!" I cried. "You know the man?"

"I do," answered my grandfather, and the chevalier nodded his assent. "You have described a well-known spy in the service of the Italian government. Beyond all doubt, Charles, it was he who stole the papers from your coat pocket. He is a sleight-of-hand expert, and was once a pickpocket, I believe, though now he flies at higher game."

A sudden revelation came to me.

"Then this must be the coup of which Leopold Magniff boasted to me," I cried. "Undoubtedly the scheme had been already hatched on the boat when he let it out to me in a drunken moment."

They both assented.

"You are right, my dear child," said the comte. "But now, the point is, how can we recover the draft of the treaty? It may have been already sold to the triple alliance; on the other hand, it is in so fragmentary a condition and reveals so little that the conspirators may be holding it back with a view to obtaining a higher price from France."

"If they have already obtained possession of my bonds," I hazarded, "they may hold them as the price of immunity."

"They cannot dispose of them," said my grandfather. "At least, they can but conceal them and prevent you from obtaining them."

Then I told them of my agreement with the banker, omitting nothing, not even the motive that had inspired me.

"And so you wished to help him in his designs against Clichy, little Anne," said the old comte mournfully, when I had concluded. "God help us all; the old estate must pass to this arch-conspirator. It is now nearly a year since he unveiled his motive to me. I, he says, snubbed him in his younger days, when he purchased the estate next mine. Well, perhaps so, and thus I am rightly punished. Times change greatly, and the old order passes. But it will be hard on your mother, Charles."

"He told me that he will have your property within two weeks," I said.

"Unless twelve thousand francs of interest appear mysteriously out of a clear sky, I think he will," the comte answered. "And doubtless you understand now why he was so anxious to purchase your bonds, and why he has apparently succeeded."

"Yes," I replied. "He feared that I should place you in possession of them and so enable you to pay off the mortgage on Clichy."

The comte shook his head mournfully.

"But that is the reason that his son Leopold gave me when we talked on the boat," I exclaimed.

"Is it possible that either of that shrewd pair believed you to be so altruistic as to be willing to present them gratis to an old man, to save his lands, Anne? No, my dear. It is because, so long as those bonds were in your possession, you could have rendered him bankrupt."

"But he has millions!" I cried incredulously.

"And your bonds are worth, potentially, billions," answered my grandfather. "Let me explain the matter to you, Anne.
